

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. ## MOTIONS.

CATTLE DISEASES ACTS—IMPORTATION OF FOREIGN ANIMALS—RELSOUTION—

Moved, "That this House desires to urge on Her Majesty's Government the importance of taking effectual measures for the suppression of foot and mouth disease throughout the United Kingdom, and it is of opinion that, while for this purpose it is necessary that adequate restrictions, under the powers vested in the Privy Council, should be imposed on the movements and transit of cattle at home, it is even more important, with a view to its permanent extinction, that the landing of Foreign live animals should not be permitted in future from any Countries as to which the Privy Council are not satisfied that the laws thereof relating to the importation and exportation of animals, and to the prevention of the introduction or spreading of disease, and the general sanitary condition of animals therein, are such as to afford reasonable security against the importation therefrom of animals which are diseased,"—(Mr. Chaplin) .. 1020

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all the words after the word "That," in order to add the words "the recent prevalence of foot and mouth disease calls for the continued and vigilant exercise on the part of Her Majesty's Government of the powers entrusted to it, not only with reference to the movement of live animals at home, but in regard to their importation from abroad, but this House does not consider it necessary, under present circumstances, to make further provision by legislation on the subject,"—(Mr. Arthur Arnold),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question :"—After long debate, Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out all the words after the word "That," in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the working of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts 1869 and 1878, and specially as to whether it is possible to take further steps for preventing the introduction of contagious diseases from Abroad, without unduly interfering with the supply of food; and also whether the provisions for preventing the spread of disease can be made more effective,"—(Mr. J. W. Barclay),—instead thereof .. .. . 1083

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD SUDELEY moved, as an Amendment, to withdraw the name of the Woolwich and South-East London Tramway from the title of the Bill. He said that the Board of Trade had power, under the Tramways Act of 1870, to grant Provisional Orders, provided they had the consent of the local and road authorities. When the matter was brought before them, it was alleged by the agents that the Woolwich Local Board were the only local authority, and their consent was produced. It afterwards—when the Bill was before the House—transpired that the Metropolitan Board of Works claimed to be the local authority under the clause of the Act. Under these circumstances the Board of Trade decided to have the question argued before them, and the decision they arrived at was that the consent of the Metropolitan Board was necessary. As the matter now stood, therefore, the Order was ultra vires, and the Board of Trade had no other course but to ask the House to allow this Order to be withdrawn.

LORD BALFOUR said, he maintained that there was no reason for imputing any fraudulent intentions to the promoters of the Bill. The Woolwich and South-East London Tramways were already in operation, and the Provisional Order in question only related to about 12 chains of a new line. The Company was advised that the Board of Works was not the local authority. It was, no doubt, a legal question whether or not the claim of the Metropolitan Board of Works was well founded; and it would be a hard case on the promoters to lose the benefit of all the expense which they had incurred in relation to the Bill.

LORD SUDELEY observed, that on the 12th of February the Tramways Company received notice from the Metropolitan Board of Works stating that they considered themselves to be the local authority.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

House resumed; and to be again in Committee on Tuesday the 10th instant.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD LAMINGTON, in rising to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he has received any official information that the Victorian Government, in concurrence with the other Colonial administrations, is taking steps with the view of urging on the Imperial Government the importance of annexing the New Hebrides, the Solomon Islands, and other groups in the Pacific; and if he will state how far any colonial government is justified in annexing territory, or even in advising a policy of annexation, without the previous consent of the Imperial Government; and to move for Papers, said, the question was a very important one. It was perfectly clear that it had originated with the Victorian Government, in consequence of what occurred in Queensland with reference to the annexation of New Guinea. From what occurred, from time to time, in "another place" he understood that Her Majesty's Government had not made up their mind yet whether they approved or disapproved of the policy of the Government of Queensland. As far as his own feelings went, he must say he thought this question of annexation a very dangerous one. He really did not know what right they had to talk of annexing certain islands one day and an enormous extent of country another day. The word "annexation" was a very grand word, just like the word "suzerainty." They were governed by grand words; but annexation, to his mind, seemed almost spoliation. He did not see what right they had to act so, except upon the principle—"That they may take who have the power,

And they may keep who can."

The noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Derby), as far as he could gather from observation of what occurred, agreed with his view of annexation. The noble Earl, in answer to a deputation from the Aborigines Protection Society, that waited upon him last February, with reference to the proposed annexation of the New Hebrides, used these words—

"All I can say is, that I am glad to observe that no suggestion has been made by any speaker, that we should ourselves annex these islands or establish a Protectorate over them. Annexation is not looked on with favour in this country."

He was glad to hear that from the noble Earl. At the interview to which he referred, the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was present, and the noble Earl undertook that the Government would endeavour to come to a formal understanding with France to preserve the independence of the New Hebrides. The real object of these annexations was one connected with the Free Labour Question. What, he asked, occurred the other day in Queensland? As soon as the annexation of New Guinea was effected a ship was sent from Port M'Kay to look for labourers, whose condition, if not slavery, would certainly amount to servitude. There was abundant evidence to show that servitude would be their unhappy lot. One of the most distinguished of our Colonial Governors—Sir Arthur Gordon—in answer to a deputation which waited upon him on the eve of his departure for Fiji, said—

"I trust that, in the exercise of the large powers with which it is, I believe, intended to intrust me, on Her Majesty's High Commission in Western Polynesia, I may be enabled materially to check, if not wholly to suppress, those acts of piratical violence which have excited such just and general reprobation throughout the civilized world."

An influential paper published at Melbourne said—

"Another wail of sorrow and disgrace has reached us from the South Sea Islands—another series of catastrophes has to be chronicled—another page in the history of traffic in regard to Polynesian labour has to be written in blood. The news received last week, on the arrival of the Rhoderick Dhu, labour vessel, at this port, is perfectly appalling; but such is the deadening power of being accustomed to the recital of such scenes, that the effect appears to have been but small in the minds of the community generally, and in the Legislative Assembly more particularly. In the House we find what is in effect a defence of the hideous system by the Premier of the country."

And Commodore Wilson used these words—

"I can hardly imagine anyone not interested in getting cheap labour for a moment countenancing the labour trade, or the employment of Natives by traders and others. Only a few years ago (1860 and 1865), and even later, much indignation was felt in England because the French Government sanctioned what was known as the 'engage trade' between their Colonies and Africa. Such was, I know, from personal observation on the spot, nothing but the Slave Trade under a new name; but I ask what is the difference between the engaged African and the Native labourer recruited from the South Sea Islands? I certainly can see none. If anything, as the African originally cost more, being the more valuable animal, his plight was probably the best. It would, undoubtedly, be best entirely to stop what is known as the Polynesian labour traffic."

New South Wales from 1876 to 1881 was 2,345; into Victoria, from 1873 to 1880, 1,959; into Queensland, within a comparatively few years, the large number of 17,329; into New Zealand, from 1871 to 1881, 338; into Fiji, between 1864 and 1869, 1,649, and between 1874 and 1880, 7,395. The Melbourne Argus said—

"We have good reason to believe that the Imperial Government is elaborating a scheme for the better government of the Western Pacific and the regulation of the labour traffic. It can hardly be doubted that under existing arrangements many atrocities are perpetrated on the Islanders by labour collectors and their agents. After making every allowance for exaggeration, sufficient evidence remains to show a state of affairs that cannot be allowed to continue without disgrace to civilization."

It was said that New Guinea had iron mines, gold mines, and so on; but was that a good argument for annexing it? The same kind of argument might be used to justify the breaking into a rich man's house. He now came to the second part of his Question, which was—what were the powers and what the limits of authority of Colonial Governments? If this kind of action was tolerated, one Colony after another might proceed to make annexations. He would ask, were Colonial Governments to be allowed to put this country into what might be called "a fix?" He should have thought that any Colonial Governor, before pursuing such a policy, would have to ask the permission of the Colonial Office. He confidently hoped that the noble Earl opposite would be able to say that the Government were not disposed to sanction this policy of annexation. He begged to move for Papers on the subject.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for further papers relating to the proposed annexation of New Guinea."—(The Lord Lamington.)

LORD NORTON said, he wished to express a somewhat different opinion from that of his noble Friend. He wished to protest against the assumption that annexation by British Colonies of adjacent unoccupied territory, subject to subsequent approval by the Crown, was so unprecedented a thing as his noble Friend seemed to suppose. The policy which his noble Friend had called into question had marked every period of our Colonial history, especially the most brilliant. A very considerable number of the Colonies we once had in America, which were now, in consequence of an unfortunate episode of contrary policy, independent States, were annexed to the British Crown in that way. Those Colonies were, indeed, self-maintained and self-defended, and had contributed their Forces to aid us against our common foreign enemies. It was because we had lost that high spirit of colonization that such fears were expressed. It was because we looked upon Colonies now rather as Dependencies which we had to support than of a growth of Empire of equal freedom with ourselves that we were afraid of annexation. The first great sign of the decadence of the Romans was their restricting and drawing in the outskirts of their Empire, considering that those spreading extremities were a burden upon them, and were unable to support themselves. If, however, we adopted the same principle, we should not have the same fate, because our Colonies had too much of the spirit of growth in them to be stifled by a repressive spirit at home. The British Sovereign could not persistently refuse the offered allegiance. The only question was, whether, when annexation became necessary, the Colony itself should undertake the work, or the Imperial Government should assume the actual government of the new territory and constitute it a Crown Colony; in short, whether the annexed territory should be a new Colony, or should form part of an old one? He could not agree with the noble Lord that Colonies would be likely to misuse their power in annexing countries half occupied by barbarian tribes by maintaining the Slave Trade, or by confiscating Native property; but were we to assume that even if any attempt were made to take such a course, we should be powerless, through their local government, to prevent it? Why could not the Queenslanders take slaves from New Guinea now if they desired? His only objection to the taking of Fiji was that it was made a Crown Colony instead of being annexed to New South Wales. Possibly, the now proposed annexation would be better made by an united Australian action. He held that it was better that old Colonies anxious to annex practically unoccupied territories in their own neighbourhood, and to bring them safe from foreign interference within their own administration, should be allowed to do so, than that we should have innumerable little Crown Colonies scattered all over the world, involving the British Government in a thousand intricate questions and responsibilities, hindering commerce, and placing on the shoulders of the British taxpayers an enormous and useless expenditure, and all this in the teeth of our experience in the best Colonial policy which this country had ever known.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that the Motion of his noble Friend (Lord Lamington) referred to two questions. First, to the possible annexation of the New Hebrides and the Solomon Islands; and, next, to the instructions that were to be given to Colonial Governments and Governors. The islands in question were, no doubt, closely connected geographically with Fiji, New Zealand, and the Australian Continent; but, as it appeared to him, their annexation was not a matter of pressing importance. If the Government received any application or recommendation on the subject from the Colonial Governments, it was to be hoped they would carefully consider it, and watch the course of action of any other Power with a jealous eye; but he would not at this moment urge the case of the New Hebrides upon that point. He now passed to the terms of the Motion, which embodied some of the most extraordinary propositions he had ever heard. The Notice began by asking the Colonial Secretary how far any Colonial Government was justified in annexing territory, or even in advising a policy of annexation, without the previous consent of Her Majesty's Government. In ordinary circumstances, a Colonial Government was, of course, not justified in annexing territory proprio motu, and without communication with the Imperial Government; but extraordinary circumstances might not only justify, but even compel such an act. Indeed, the whole history of our Colonies showed that they had been originally acquired by the voluntary and spontaneous action of captains, Government officers, travellers, and commercial adventurers, necessarily without the knowledge of the British Government, by whom they were afterwards accepted and taken over. The Government was free to accept or decline the annexation of new territories, and they always had the final power in their hands; but to lay down an abstract principle contained in the Question of his noble Friend was too preposterous to be considered for one moment. The next part of the Notice—that, namely, which asked whether Colonial Governments were justified in advising a policy of annexation without the consent of Her Majesty's Government—was so surprising that he was at a loss to know whether his noble Friend could be serious. It would be foolish, indeed, to issue such an Order. The question of the annexation of the Southern Coast of New Guinea was vital to the Australian Colonies; and if it was to be stopped, what else was to be put into the category of prohibition? The Colonists of Australia were just as loyal as we were, and they desired the right of free speech; and his noble Friend must know extremely little of the temper and condition of the Australian Colonies when he made such a proposition. Could his noble Friend possibly think that Colonial Governments ought to be forbidden even the expression of their opinion, or that they would be rendered dumb by an Order from the Colonial Office? But, perhaps, his noble Friend alluded rather to Colonial Governors than to Colonial Governments. The position held by Colonial Governors was a peculiar one, and if they were required to act according to the strict letter of their instructions they would often fail to fulfil the great functions they had to discharge. The position and duty of a Colonial Governor varied considerably—in some cases he was a sort of Constitutional Sovereign, in others he acted as an Adviser of the Colonial Government, and also of the Home Government; and many a Governor whom he had known had stood in this trusted position between the Colonial and the Home Governments with the confidence of both. Therefore, if the noble Lord meant that the Colonial Governor was to withhold the expression of his opinion to Her Majesty's Government, that was a proposition equally preposterous to the previous one. He wished now to enlarge somewhat on the terms of the Motion, and to ask what was the opinion of the Government on the subject of the annexation of New Guinea? He was a little surprised that no announcement had yet been made on this question, especially as a long interval had now elapsed since the discussion of the subject in the House, and the Government could not be supposed not to have come to a decision. In the course of the discussion to which he had referred, he had guarded himself very carefully against expressing a definite or distinct opinion as to what should be done; but the Papers that had since been laid on the Table of the House had made it possible to form a decided conclusion. Everyone, probably, would admit the unwisdom of sanctioning the annexation of the whole or part of New Guinea to the Queensland Government, because Queensland, though a prosperous and thriving Colony, had not more than 250,000 of population, and £2,000,000 of income, and had not at present developed her resources sufficiently to enable her to bear so great a burden; but the time had, in his opinion, come when the Government might determine what steps should be taken with regard especially to the Southern seaboard of Australia. As to slavery or abuses in the labour trade, it was very easy to rake up extraordinary stories from the Colonial newspapers; but the importation of labour was placed under very strict statutory restrictions. The Governments and Governors were doing their duty in that part of the world; and there was not much fear of real abuses. His noble Friend had confounded the action of half-a-dozen Colonial Governments. To talk of labour trade in New Zealand was absurd; and as to the abuses in Fiji, the matter was admirably regulated there a few years ago, and he had never heard of anything to lead him to believe there had been any retrogression since. The simple reason why the Australian Governments desired some action on the part of Her Majesty's Government was, that they dreaded the establishment of any Foreign Power on the Southern Coast. It would be a monstrous thing if any Foreign Power were to take up a position on the South Coast of New Guinea. When the question was raised in 1876, he, as Colonial Secretary, had no fear of the action of any Foreign Power; the Government had taken the precaution to satisfy themselves; they stated so publicly, and their confidence was justified by the result; but a great change had occurred since that time. It was impossible for us to shut our eyes, and still more for the Australian Colonists, to whom this was a matter of life and death, to shut their eyes to the recent action of France, whose rulers had publicly proclaimed their desire to have a Colonial policy, and who were taking action in Tahiti, the Congo, Tonquin, Madagascar, and possibly other parts of the world. The establishment of a Penal Colony by France or any other Power on the Southern Coast of New Guinea would be simply an intolerable nuisance, and the establishment of an armed fort would be a menace to the Australian Colonies. Torrens Straits would cease to be English territory, and the result would be to throw an enormous military burden on the Australian Colonies. We could not understand this question as the Australians did; as it was to them a matter of life or death, they could hardly view the matter from our cold and impartial standpoint. Another reason why the matter could not be overlooked, and why definite action on the part of the Government seemed to be necessary, was that there was great risk of a sort of Alsatia growing up on the coast. The two shores were 60 or 70 miles apart; the quiet summer sea could be crossed in open boats; commercial intercourse was growing up; and there was every probability of disputes arising between the Natives and the White population. Sir Arthur Gordon was alive to this danger, and reluctantly came to the conclusion that it was incumbent on Her Majesty's Government to consider whether they should not take some steps in the matter. It was absolutely necessary that some discipline should be enforced on the coasts, and the question was how it was to be done. In an analogous case we had enforced discipline by means of what was called the Pacific Islanders Protection Act, which had worked admirably. It gave power to the High Commissioner of Fiji to exercise very large powers indeed, and the result had been to put a stop to most of the practices which his noble Friend seemed to think existed at present. There were three classes of persons requiring to be brought under discipline — Englishmen, Natives, and foreigners; but this Act applied to Englishmen only; and it was clear that, unless its powers were greatly enlarged, it would not be adequate to meet all possible risks; there was an analogous power on the Gold Coast, which was British territory, and it worked admirably, because English officials had full powers on the coast, the interior being left to take care of itself. The question first came distinctly into view in 1876, when he was Colonial Secretary, and when applications were made for the annexation of the whole or part of New Guinea. The Fiji Islands had just been annexed. He had thought it his duty to propose to the Australian Colonies that this fresh addition to Imperial liabilities should not be undertaken solely on the responsibility of this country. It did not appear to him to be reasonable that the British taxpayer should be required to pay for it exclusively; and he proposed that each of the Australian Colonies should make a moderate contribution to the outlay. That proposition was declined, though the general sense of the Colonists was very far, indeed, from being unfavourable to it. Soon afterwards a question was raised as to New Guinea; and he repeated the proposal he had made in the case of Fiji, pointing out that it would be unreasonable and unjust to impose the burden on this country exclusively. He explained his views fully, and intimated that he was not discouraged by the answer he had received, and that he considered the question of annexation by no means closed; and, in fact, as only in abeyance. In a few years his anticipations had been completely justified. The Australian Colonies had adopted, in the case of New Guinea, the policy he had invited them to adopt in the case of Fiji; they had expressed themselves ready to accept the entire burden of the expense, and to leave the administration to Her Majesty's Government. In all the circumstances, it seemed to him that it was the duty of the Government to consider whether they could not meet the Colonists. The question was, comparatively speaking, little understood at home, and we could scarcely appreciate the interest it had for the Australians. He hoped the noble Earl the Colonial Secretary would not only weigh his words carefully, but would show that he had hearty sympathy with these great and noble Colonies.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said he did not think there was anything improper or preposterous in the Question which the noble Lord (Lord Lamington) had asked. He only asked for information. The subject was one on which there had been no official declaration for a long time, and Parliament and the public would be glad to hear what were the views of the Government as to the relative positions of this country and the Colonies. In his opinion the noble Lord had done good service by bringing the subject forward.

THE DUKE OF MANCHESTER said, it was a gratification to hear the declaration of the noble Earl the late Colonial Secretary in favour of annexation. He was certain, from his knowledge of those countries, that the noble Earl did not say a word too much; and he hoped that those arguments would have weight with Her Majesty's Government in whatever decision they might come to on the point. The noble Lord who brought forward this subject had observed that the labour traffic was a mere subterfuge for slavery. He could assure the noble Lord that that was not at all the case. The inhabitants of Queensland were no more inclined to practise slavery than any of their Lordships. In Victoria and New Zealand there was no coloured labour at all. In Queensland the labour was very jealously guarded. The electoral franchise was very low, and the majority of the electors, who belonged to the labouring classes, were very jealous of any coloured labour. They had imposed a tax of £10 a head on immigrants from China, and the coloured labour was restricted to the sugar estates on the coast in the tropical part of the Colony. The coloured labourers were introduced only for a period of three years; they were subject to inspection; and at the end of the term they had to be sent back by the persons who employed them. True, there were abuses of the labour traffic in some of the Islands; but the only way to stop these abuses was to take the Islands and govern them. In fact, this was an additional reason for annexing them whenever it appeared practicable.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he thought that the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) took rather a rose-coloured view of the state of the labour traffic in these territories. He wished to take exception to the expressions of the noble Lord (Lord Norton), who found fault with the manner in which the noble Lord who introduced the discussion had blamed annexation. "Annexation" was a word entirely foreign to the English language; it was invented by the Americans to make that which was wrong appear to be right.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I do not know that it would be of any advantage that I should take part, either as a disputant or as an umpire, in the interesting conversation which has been carried on on the other side of the Table. I quite agree with my noble Friend (the Earl of Carnarvon), who was formerly Secretary of State for the Colonies, in one proposition which he has uttered as to the terms of the Question which has been put to me. My noble Friend opposite (Lord Lamington) gave Notice of his intention to ask me to state how far any Colonial Government is justified in annexing territory, or even in advising a policy of annexation without the previous consent of the Imperial Government. Well, my Lords, I apprehend that the right of offering advice, or, rather, as I should say, of expressing the wishes and feelings of a Colonial community, is one with which no one could desire to interfere. It is most essential that we should know, whether we agree with it or not, what Colonial feeling is upon questions of this kind; and I am very happy to find that the system which has been of late established of giving to the Agents General for the self-governed Colonies what I may call a quasi-diplomatic character and position has made it much more easy than it formerly was for any person holding the Office which I have the honour to hold to obtain accurate and constant information as to the opinion which prevails in the Colonies themselves on local matters. I do not think there is any use in discussing the general argument as to whether annexations are desirable or not, and if they are to take place, whether they should be effected on the responsibility of the Colony, or on the responsibility of the Home Government. You cannot lay down in such matters any hard-and-fast line. Circumstances differ so much that no two cases resemble one another, and no one case can be quoted as a precedent for others. Speaking generally, I should say—and I think it is the universal feeling of this country—that our responsibilities are already heavy enough, that our Possessions, scattered, as they are, over every part of the world, are sufficient to require the utmost care and vigilance, and that it is not desirable to increase either the one or the other. No doubt, if, as in this case it has happened, a Colonial community itself, desiring an increase of its territory, undertakes to bear the burden, and to take upon itself the administration and the expense, that is a circumstance which alters, to some extent, the position. At the same time, I think that my noble Friend on the second Bench (Lord Norton), who has taken for many years past a warm interest in Colonial subjects, carried his doctrine of Colonial independence a little too far when he contended that a Colony should be left free in its external policy, as well as in the administration of its internal affairs. There is a very wide difference between the two. Whatever a Colony does with regard to its own affairs affects principally—indeed almost exclusively—those by whom the legislation is undertaken; but when you come to the question of external policy and of annexation, or of extension, other considerations come in, since the annexation even of an island in the Pacific may raise a question of foreign policy in which the Imperial Government is very deeply concerned. I do not think, therefore, it can be denied that questions of this kind are questions on which the Imperial Government ought to have, as it actually has, a controlling power. Now, my Lords, passing from these general considerations, I think the best answer I can give to the Question of my noble Friend will be to state briefly, and with no more comment than is absolutely necessary, what has actually taken place. When I last spoke on this subject some weeks ago, I told your Lordships all that I knew; but I knew very little. I knew nothing more than that a ceremony, purporting to be an annexation of New Guinea, had been gone through at the order of the Government of Queensland, and that an explanation of that singular and unusual proceeding was about to be sent home. Well, of course, before expressing any opinion upon the matter, it was necessary to hear the explanation that would be given. I have now received it, and I am bound to say that it does not throw much fresh light upon the transaction, and that it does not in any way satisfactorily account for the action that was taken. The explanation given comes to no more than this—I shall shortly lay it on the Table—that there were strong reports throughout Australia of the intention of some Power—nobody knew what Power—to seize upon some part—nobody knew what part—of New Guinea. I endeavoured to ascertain the origin of these reports; but it does not appear that there was a shadow of evidence forthcoming to substantiate them. They were simply a creation of the anxiety felt by the Colonists in this subject; and, as a matter of fact—and, of course, I have taken all possible pains to inquire—we are tolerably well assured that, as regards the leading European Powers—that is to say, the only Powers that are at all likely to interfere in such a matter—no such intention is entertained. My noble Friend who was formerly Colonial Secretary (the Earl of Carnarvon) referred to certain designs which he ascribed to France, and he used an argument which seemed to me to cut both ways, and rather to tell against his case than in favour of it. He said—“Look at what the French are doing to build up a Colonial Empire in other parts of the world—in Tonquin and Madagascar.” If the French Government, whether with or without the will of the French people, have already undertaken two considerable Colonial expeditions, and, in all probability, have involved themselves in two Colonial wars, that is about as good a security as we could have that they will be not in a hurry to have a third complication of the same kind on their hands. To return, however, to the original question, considering that telegraphic communication existed between Queensland and this country, it would not have involved a delay of more than 24 hours to have asked for the sanction of the Imperial authorities before proceeding to this act of so-called annexation. If, therefore, the Queensland authorities did not apply for leave, it can only have been in consequence of their entertaining decided and, perhaps, a reasonable apprehension that the sanction they asked for would not be granted. And now, my Lords, as to the effects of this formal proceeding, the noble Earl (the Earl of Longford) wants to know—and he has a perfect right to know—what are the rights and powers of Colonial Governors in such matters. I apprehend that the effect of the action of the Governor of Queensland is simply null. A Governor or any official holding authority under Government exercises that authority within the limits of the jurisdiction assigned to him; but beyond those limits, as I understand the matter, his commission does not go; beyond those limits he ceases to be invested with any official power, and an act, therefore, done by him beyond his jurisdiction is of no more validity, in regard to its legal effect, than the act of any private person. The action of the Governor of Queensland, therefore, in this matter, has left things where they were. Of course, it may be said that any person, even though not invested with official power, may take possession of a newly-discovered country in the name of the Czar; but it cannot be contended that New Guinea is an undiscovered country, and I do not think it will be contended that if any passing traveller, of whatever nationality, were to claim that he had taken possession of New Guinea such an act would be held to be valid according to International Law. Now, then, the question arises, what is the course which the Government will be prepared to take? My Lords, I may say, at once, we are not prepared to undertake the annexation of New Guinea. I do not suppose that that decision will be any great surprise to your Lordships or to Parliament. The enormous extent of territory, the absolutely unknown character of the interior, the certainty that the large Native population, numbering several millions, would object to foreign annexation, and the enormous expense of undertaking to administer such a territory, are all reasons which, I think, will be admitted as valid against that course being taken. Even, if upon the general question of annexation, we had come to a different conclusion, I think your Lordships will agree that it would be practically impossible that the Government of Queensland should take upon themselves the work of holding and administering that country. Queensland has already vast unsettled territories. It is a very prosperous and promising Colony; but it is a Colony whose population is exceedingly small in comparison with the extent of the country. I think if you look at the map you will see that the capital—Brisbane—is something like 1,000 miles distant from the nearest point of New Guinea. If, therefore, anything is to be done in the way of conquering and administering New Guinea, one thing is clear—that it must be done by the Imperial Government, or by the Australian Colonies acting together, or by both those agencies combined. New Guinea is too important to be made the Dependency of any Colony. I can quite understand the Australian feeling as to the Coast of New Guinea being a country which lies within the scope of British influences and interests. I purposely use vague and general language; but undoubtedly we should not view it as a friendly act if any other country attempted to make a settlement on that Coast. Further than that, we shall be prepared to strengthen the hands of those charged with preserving order in the Pacific Islands; and we shall consider, with the help of the Colonial Governments, the different means which may be tried for better securing the order of the country, so far as British adventurers are concerned. It may be said—"It is quite true you may get jurisdiction over British subjects, and perhaps over Natives; but you will have no jurisdiction over foreigners." It is a question how far we may obtain jurisdiction over foreigners; but that can only be done by means of negotiation. As to the Natives, I believe it would be seldom necessary to exercise jurisdiction over them, if their rights or their lands were not interfered with. I do not know that I have anything to add, except that I shall be prepared to lay upon the Table in a few days the Correspondence that has passed. There is not very much of it, because I have already given your Lordships and the other House of Parliament the earlier Correspondence. I ought to mention, in further answer to the Question my noble Friend has put to me, that I have received within the last few days a suggestion or proposition very much larger than that for the annexation of New Guinea only. I had an official representation made to me by the Agents of the various Australian Colonies, speaking, and authorized to speak, in the name of their Governments, to consider proposals—first, for the annexation of New Guinea; secondly, of the New Hebrides; thirdly, of the Solomon Islands and the Islands in the neighbourhood of New Guinea; and, fourthly, of those very large and almost entirely unknown islands which lie to the north and north-east of New Guinea, and which occupy, collectively, an area larger, I should think, than that of France or Germany. I could not hold out any great hope that Her Majesty's Government would see that question in the light in which it would be viewed in Australia; but I am bound to recognize the fact that the Australian people in general, although they certainly do not want any extension of territory for their own sake, are very strongly impressed with the danger which they suppose to lie before them if any Foreign Power, great or small, were to establish themselves in a settlement some hundred miles from the Australian Coast. I cannot say I share in that fear. I think they underrate their own powers and their own importance, and that they have really no such cause for fear as they suppose. But, at the same time, the existence of a general opinion of that kind among the great majority of the inhabitants of such a country as Australia is a thing that no wise Minister in this country would ignore; the question which they have raised will have to be considered in all its bearings. They did not ask for any immediate action to be taken; they simply wished to lay their views before Her Majesty's Government, and I have asked them to place those views on paper, so that they could be laid before the Cabinet for the consideration of my Colleagues. What I said to these Colonial Agents I will repeat now—

“If the Australian people desire an extension beyond their present limits, the most practical step that they could take, the one which will most facilitate any operation of that kind, and diminish in the greatest degree the responsibilities of the Mother Country, would be the confederation of those Colonies in one united whole, which would be powerful enough to undertake and to carry through tasks for which no one Colony is at present sufficient.”

I do not dwell upon that point. I only throw it out here as I did to those gentlemen who did me the honour to call upon me; but I think that is really one of the points of the greatest possible importance in dealing with this subject, and certainly in dealing with other Australian questions which are certain to arise in the future.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: There is one question I should like to put in regard to extension. I understood it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take some measures to enforce better discipline on the Southern Coast of New Guinea. I should like to know whether it is proposed to do this by any fresh Act of Parliament, or simply by an Order in Council?

THE EARL OF DERBY: It only requires an Order in Council. I do not apprehend that any further Act of Parliament will be required.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON: Do you propose to proceed by the same machinery—the High Commissioner of Fiji?

THE EARL OF DERBY: At present in the same way. If that machinery is defective, it is open to us to consider in what way it may be remedied.

Motion agreed to.

TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN, LEASING AND PERPETUITY ACT, 1851.

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

LORD ZOUCHE OF HARYNGWORTH, in rising to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into and report as to the position, under the Trinity College, Dublin, Leasing and Perpetuity Act, 1851, of the grantees and sub-grantees in perpetuity of lands held under grants made in pursuance of the said Act, and as to the position of the occupying tenants of such grantees and sub-grantees; and to inquire and report as to the variations effected in the rents reserved by such grants made subsequently to the date of such grants, and as to the provisions of the said Act regulating such variations; and to inquire and report as to the justice and expediency of further legislation to alter or repeal any of the provisions of the said Act,” said, he was in no way personally interested in this business—indeed, he had no property at all in Ireland. He had been asked, as an independent Member of the House, to bring forward the question by an enormous body of men who were the tenants and sub-tenants under Trinity College; and solely with the view of removing the hardships from which they suffered he submitted this Motion. The estates of Trinity College were very large, comprising some 200,000 acres. These had been for some hundreds of years let to about 40 or 50 tenants, who had afterwards sub-let them to several hundred other tenants. The original plan of the lettings to the head tenants was by 21 years' leases, renewable on the payment of an annual fine of 5s. 6d. in the pound. This fine was paid every year, so that the tenant always had a period of 21 years before him. The incomes of the Senior Fellows of the College were made to depend upon these fines, and it was alleged that they could not be altered because the Fellows would suffer thereby. Subsequently, these leases were corrected and altered by two Acts of Parliament—one was an Act passed in the Reign of Charles I., and the second in the Reign of George III. The old system continued down to the year 1848, the year of the Famine, when the tenants had difficulty in paying the rents; and the consequence was that the governing members of the College became alarmed, and made an application to the Government to change the constitution of the College, and enable these fines and rents to be paid into the College, and the Senior Fellows to be paid out of the general fund. The Government, however, refused to grant their request, as it would be unfair to the tenants, and enable the College, by abolishing the renewal fines, to run out the leases, and practically to amend them. They promised to see justice done. In 1850 a Bill was brought in by the Government, which was backed with the names of the Chief Secretary (Sir William Somerville) and the Solicitor General for Ireland. This Bill did not pass into law, but was followed the year after—1851—by a Private Bill, brought up practically by the Government, but which was not backed by the Members of Parliament then sitting who were tenants of Trinity College. It provided, amongst other things, that instead of 21 years' leases with the old annual fine, perpetuity leases should be given to the grantees on payment of an extra rent, and there was a covenant which bound the grantees to give perpetuity leases also to the occupying tenants. The immediate effect of the change was to increase the original rental of the estates by about one-fifth. The rents were subject to a decennial valuation based upon the prices of certain articles of agricultural produce; but among them potatoes and flax, two of the staple articles of Irish production, were omitted. He maintained that the valuation of the property, as authorized by the Act of Parliament, was unfair and unworkable. He did not mean it was unfair in the ordinary sense of the term, but that a very odd standard of valuation was adopted, which was one certain to increase the rent without having regard to the general prosperity of the country. The result of the valuation and the consequent increase of the rents of the immediate grantees was this—that if they should ask a proportionately high rent from the sub-grantees they would ruin the latter, and if they should refrain from asking a high rent they would be ruined themselves. Moreover, the fact of these persons being householders precluded them from receiving the benefit of the Land Acts; so that on one side of a hedge they might have a person with his rent reduced by the Act of the Land Courts, and on the other side a man whose rent was raised by the Act of 1851. The question did not affect merely a few persons, but an enormous number of people; the sub-grantees were several hundred in number, and their case was certainly one of great hardship, and ought to be inquired into. It might be suggested that inquiry was not called for, because if the grantees found themselves in a difficulty it was their own fault, as they had entered into a contract and they must abide by it. To that he replied that no proper contracts had been entered into by the parties whose cause he was advocating, and that the transactions which had occurred were such as did not leave them free to contract or not as they might wish. But though the tenants protested, they were advised to accept the conditions, and practically they had no other alternative. There were several other points which he would have liked to have entered into; but he would not trespass too long on the House. He appealed to their Lordships whether this was not a matter more or less for their consideration. The justice of the case, he thought, would best be met by the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the facts. He felt sure their Lordships would not be willing that injustice should be done to a worthy class of people, even if they were few in number, and much less so when they numbered hundreds. He therefore appealed with confidence to the House to agree to his Motion, which he should press to a Division.

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into and report as to the position, under the Trinity College, Dublin, Leasing and Perpetuity Act, 1851, of the grantees and sub-grantees in perpetuity of lands held under grants made in pursuance of the said Act, and as to the position of the occupying tenants of such grantees and sub-grantees; and to inquire and report as to the variations effected in the rents reserved by such grants made subsequently to the date of such grants, and as to the provisions of the said Act regulating such variations; and to inquire and report as to the justice and expediency of further legislation to alter or repeal any of the provisions of the said Act."—(The Lord Zouche of Haryngworth.)

EARL CAIRNS said, he must compliment the noble Lord on the clearness, and, from his point of view, the fairness of the statement by which he had supported his Motion. He was obliged, however, to dissent from the noble Lord's conclusions. It was very doubtful what could be the object of a Motion of this kind. The noble Lord asked for a Royal Commission to inquire as to the provisions of the Trinity College Act of 1851, and the positions of certain parties under it. But there was no need of any inquiry whatever. The Act of 1851 was as plain as any Act of Parliament that was ever passed; and there could be no possible dispute about the position under the Act, either of

"The grantees and sub-grantees in perpetuity of lands held under grants made in pursuance of the said Act," or of the occupying tenants, or about "the variations effected in the rents reserved by such grants made subsequently to the date of such grants," or "as to the provisions of the said Act regulating such variations."

There remained only one other thing—and that contained the gist of the noble Lord's Motion—namely—

"To inquire and report as to the justice and expediency of further legislation to alter or repeal any of the provisions of the said Act."

At first sight that demand seemed a very just and reasonable one; but, to those who looked below the surface, it was plainly a suggestion to Parliament to recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the expediency of breaking certain leases made under Act of Parliament. Such a proposal was not likely to find much favour on his (Earl Cairns's) side of the House. It was the same as if it were proposed to have a Royal Commission to inquire into the expediency of revising the conditions of any of their Lordships' leases. The property was chiefly situated in the North of Ireland, and was leased out. The rent which Trinity College received was £33,000 a-year, which was considerably under the Poor Law valuation; and, therefore, the rents could not be said to be excessive. The Act of 1851, which was mentioned in the Question of the noble Lord, had its origin, like many other Acts, both English and Irish, in the unthrifty and unsatisfactory dealing with property by ecclesiastical bodies. In old times, it was the habit of Ecclesiastical Corporations, when not restrained by law, to let their lands below their proper value, and to compensate themselves by the imposition of large fines. This course, however, was interfered with by legislation, which provided for the proper duration of leases, and ordered that the rent reserved should be at least half the value of the land. The result was the renewal of leases from year to year, on payment of an annual fine for renewal. In the year 1849 or 1850 considerable difficulty was experienced by Trinity College in obtaining payment of these fines; and, after an application by the Provost and Senior Fellows to the Lord Lieutenant, a scheme was arranged in accordance with which the whole question was settled by the Act of 1851. It was to be noticed that this Act contained many provisions extremely favourable to the tenants, and that it gave effect to many of the suggestions of those who acted for them in the negotiations. That Act laid down the conditions on which leases were to be granted; and, as the rents were partly based on the current prices of produce, permitted the revision of rents as the prices varied. Ten years after the passing of the Act, prices having risen very considerably, the College thought themselves entitled to a revision of rents, and a revision was made, the cost of which, amounting to £3,000, was paid by the College. The middlemen, having had their rents increased, passed on their increase, and required it to be paid by the occupying tenants; and, under the Land Act, the occupying tenants had come into Court against the middlemen, and had had their rents reduced. The middlemen, therefore, no longer received augmentation of rent from the occupying tenants. The College did not shrink from inquiry into the management of its property; but there was no necessity for it, for all the facts were upon the surface. This being the case, he could not support the present Motion.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he thought the case was one for inquiry. The inquiry need not be a long one, but would be one attended with satisfactory results. There was no suggestion of any breach of faith on the part of the College; but there were many facts too complicated to be brought out in debate, and which ought to be inquired into. The whole case seemed to point to the expediency of the purchase, by a public authority, of the estates of Corporations in Ireland. He was a Member of one which, finding its income reduced, was obliged to withdraw many of the grants it had hitherto made to schools and for educational purposes.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, it was not his business to enter into the merits of the question as between Trinity College and the grantees. The Government did not think it their duty to advise Her Majesty to issue a Commission of Inquiry; that was the view of the Lord Lieutenant when the grantees addressed him not long ago, and the Government did not see any reason to differ from him. He did not agree that inquiry would be short and simple, and would easily dispose of the matter. The facts of the case were perfectly easy to ascertain, and were on the face of the documents that were always accessible to their Lordships. The real object of inquiry was not the desire to obtain additional information, but the desire to recommend fresh legislation for the purpose of obtaining the revision by Parliament of the terms of the Act of 1851, under which the arrangements were made between the College and the tenants. The Government did not deem it their duty to take a step which would involve them in such a responsibility on the application of one of the parties. They were told that the action of the Government in 1851, in introducing a Bill, was a reason why the Government of the present day should accede to this Motion. But he did not agree in that inference. There was no doubt the Government of that time did take a considerable part in the arrangements between the College and its tenants. But that action, which was in the nature of mediation, was taken at the request of both parties, and not upon the application of one party. The Government was now asked to proceed on different lines at the request of one party. A word or two had been said as to the bearing of the Land Act on this question. In his opinion, the Land Act and its operation had practically nothing to do with the question. He admitted that rather an unpleasant light had been thrown upon the standard of valuation under which the College exercised its powers of altering the rents. The College, under the provisions of their Act of 1851, did possess very formidable powers of increasing the rents of their lessees; but those powers had been exercised moderately. And, Land Act or no Land Act, it was clear that the occupying tenants would not have been able to pay the full rents. It must, however, be remembered that the tenants were not coerced at all to accept the arrangement. If there were any coercion at all it lay in the undesirable nature of the property, which was very different from that of land held in fee simple. Although the facts would not justify the Government in interfering in the way in which they were asked to interfere, yet those facts furnished a motive to the College for great moderation in the exercise of their powers—moderation which he was bound to say the College had thus far shown. It was impossible for the Government to assent to the Motion of the noble Lord.

LORD FITZGERALD, in supporting the Motion, remarked, that the system of sub-grantees gave the College a better security for their rents. This was a matter involving the interests, not merely of 38 tenants—that might be a small matter for their Lordships' attention—but of an enormous number of sub-grantees also; for he knew that in one county alone—Armagh—the number of sub-tenants was 500. The decennial valuation based upon the price of produce was a most unwise power to have given the College. In justification for having used the word "unwise," he might quote from the inquiry by the Devon Commission the evidence of a witness who represented Trinity College, and who was one of the ablest men of his day—namely, Dr. Longfield. Being asked if he considered the prices of produce a fair test for the giving of rent, Dr. Longfield replied that he considered it perfectly impossible to form an accurate opinion of the proportion existing between produce and rents, adding, the political economists all agreed that there was no fixed proportion between them, and the rent must depend upon the state of the country at the time, and, at the same time, upon the state of the land. He (Lord Fitzgerald) had no doubt whatever the arrangements of 1857, as embodied in the 12th clause of the Act, authorizing those decennial valuations, was too liberal towards the College side. It might not have been unfair at the time it was made; but let them see whether subsequent and changed circumstances had not made it a great injustice. Up to 1870 there was no difficulty; but, since that Act passed, it had been impossible to exact from the occupying tenants the rents demanded by the increase which had been made. Since 1851, no less than 32 per cent had been added to the rental of the College. The College was entitled to exact the full average value of the land; but the value of the land did not mean now what it meant in 1851. This was not a private estate. It was an estate granted to Trinity College for great public purposes, and the whole community, as well as the immediate tenants, were concerned in the question. The tenants were not asking for any abatement or decrease of rent. They were not seeking to break any lease or perpetual grant. They asked only that these decennial increases should cease. He regretted the decision of the Government; but an inquiry must be held some time. It was obvious that an injustice existed. They were bound, in some way or other, to meet it; and the remedy ought to be preceded by a short inquiry.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, he thought that, as everybody's holdings were being interfered with, and leases were frequently set aside, Trinity College ought not to be the only privileged body in Ireland.

LORD ZOUCHE OF HARYNGWORTH said, he felt bound to press his Motion to a Division.

QUESTIONS.

BOARD OF INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (IRELAND)—RESULTS FEES, 1881-2.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What portions of the sum of £21,778 6s. 9d. entered as "results fees (1881-2)" in the income account of the Intermediate Education Board, which has just been circulated, were gained in each of the years 1881, 1882?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the respective portions of this sum were—in 1881, £15,771, and in 1882, £5,997. The hon. Gentleman will find a pretty full explanation of these sums in the Report made by the Education Board, which has been presented to the House.

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—HOSTILITIES AT BRITISH SHERBRO.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether any information has been received at the Colonial Office which can enable him to say whether the account in the "Standard" of the 26th instant of the fighting at Talliah is correct, in which it is stated that our native allies after the enemy were routed pursued them into the country; that no quarter was given or expected; that the wounded were murdered as they fell, and that the horrible custom of mutilation followed; that they took many prisoners, the males being ruthlessly killed in cold blood; and that the per centage of wounded who escaped our relentless allies would be small indeed; and, whether he will cause an inquiry to be made as to the truth of these allegations?

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If he will inform the House whether Mr. Pinkett, in the absence of the Governor in Chief of the West African settlements, is responsible for the direction of British policy in British Sherbro, and for the military operations lately undertaken against the Chief Gbow at Talliah; what previous experience in dealing with Natives he has had, and who appointed him; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will cause an independent inquiry to be made into the administration of affairs in British Sherbro during the past twelve months?

MR. RICHARD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, With reference to a Despatch addressed by Lord Clarendon to Sir Rutherford Alcock, in 1869, containing these words:—

"Her Majesty's Government cannot leave with Her Majesty's Consuls or Naval Officers to determine for themselves what redress or reparation for wrong done to British subjects is due, or by what means it should be enforced. They cannot allow them to determine whether coercion is to be applied by blockade, by reprisals, by landing armed parties, or by acts of even a more hostile character. All such proceedings bear more or less the character of acts of war, and Her Majesty's Government cannot delegate to Her Majesty's servants in Foreign Countries the power of involving their own Country in war."

And also with reference to Lord Granville's communication in 1880 to Mr. Consul Easton, on the West Coast of Africa, to this effect:—

"I am to observe that Her Majesty's Government would deeply deplore the recurrence of warlike operations against Native tribes whose progress in civilisation they desire to assist, and I am to impress upon you the importance of exercising the greatest caution against the adoption of hostile measures on your own responsibility, whenever it may be possible for you to refer home in the first instance for instructions;"

whether, at the same time, Lord Northbrook, as First Lord of the Admiralty, addressed Mr. Commodore Richards, prescribing certain rigid formalities before those commanding Her Majesty's ships should for the future lend themselves to such operations against Native tribes, and especially enjoining them not to take action, wherever there is any doubt, without previous reference to Her Majesty's Government; whether similar instructions were at the same time sent to all consular officers on the West Coast of Africa, and to all commanding officers of ships on the same Coast; and, whether those instructions are still in force as respects British agents and officers abroad, and whether they were observed by those in authority previous to the recent expedition from Sherbro, as described in the "Standard" newspaper of June 26th, which led to the total destruction of two Native towns, the slaughter of between three and four hundred Natives, and the commission of great atrocities upon the wounded and upon prisoners by the Native Allies of the British Forces?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, the late operations in British Sherbro were undertaken by the officer administering the Government of Sierra Leone against a Chief named Gbow, who, with his war boys, occupied a place named Talliah as his central stronghold—a little outside of British territory. He has for years been the terror of the district, commanding, as he did, a floating body of marauders, who went from one place to another wherever strife could be stirred up and plunder obtained. The peaceful inhabitants were mercilessly harried, and, when caught, were sold into slavery. Latterly, he has turned his attention in our direction. In the early part of the year, a British boat that was passing up the River with the pay of the police at outlying stations was seized and plundered. Shortly after this, British territory was invaded at a place called Mo-saipah, within view of Bonthe, the head-quarters of the district. The property of British subjects was seized, and 25 men and women were carried off. This was the third raid, and other places, I believe, in British territory were threatened. The Expedition which, in consequence, was sent out, was directed to the destruction of Gbow's stronghold, and the dispersion of his band. There were no less than 1,500 armed men in occupation of the stockade; but the whole place was speedily destroyed. The newspaper account to which the hon. Member refers, of the events in the Sherbro district, is, as such accounts are apt to be, much exaggerated. The official Report, which we have received, contains no corroboration of the worst details contained in the Question; but it confirms the statement of the large number of Gbow's warriors who were killed in the bush. It appears that when the enemy evacuated the fort, and fled into the surrounding country, the Natives all round who had long been suffering from their acts flocked from all parts, and fell upon the fugitives. As to Mr. Pinkett, he is, undoubtedly, in the absence of Mr. Havelock, responsible for the direction of affairs in British Sherbro. He was appointed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) to be Crown Solicitor, and Master of the Supreme Court at Sierra Leone; he was afterwards promoted to be Chief Justice. He has, therefore, been about four years in the Colony, and has already before now administered the Government. Inquiry will be made as to the allegations which have been made in the Press as to the conduct of the Native allies; but until the Government has received further information, they cannot say what steps will be necessary. Papers will very shortly be laid upon the Table of the House. With reference to the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Merthyr

(Mr. Richard), I would point out to him that the instructions to which he refers were all addressed to Consuls, or Naval officers, by the Foreign Office and Admiralty respectively, and presumably point to operations in countries entirely outside British territory and jurisdiction. This affair at Sherbro was partly on British territory and partly beyond; and it may be regarded as one of self-defence to repel actual or prevent anticipated attacks. However, as soon as we heard of it, we sent a despatch to the administrator reminding him of the necessity of avoiding generally, as far as possible, such actions until the Home Government could be communicated with, and their sanction obtained.

MR. GORST: Can the Under Secretary say whether the Government has any confirmation of the news of the destruction of the town as distinct from the destruction of the strongholds?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: No, Sir. The town and the stronghold are identical. They consist of three stockades—one within another, the huts inside being occupied by the Chief's men.

TRADE AND COMMERCE—BROKERAGE ON SHIPPING (FRANCE).

MR. CHARLES PALMER asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What progress has been made in the negotiations with the French Government on the question of Brokerage on Shipping?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, Lord Lyons has been instructed to make a further representation to the French Government, inviting them to bring the French law respecting the rights and duties of shipbrokers officially to the knowledge of their Customs authorities, to adopt the Havre scale of fees as maximum rates, to provide for a favourable treatment of vessels in distress, and to take measures to prevent partnerships among the brokers, and such other abuses as may be shown to exist. The various Associations interested in the matter have been informed of the action about to be taken, and have been told that if they think fit to send any duly authorized persons to Paris to put forward their views, Mr. Crowe, the Commercial Attaché to Her Majesty's Embassy, will be instructed to place himself in communication with them, with the view of obtaining their advice in his dealings with the proper French authorities.

PALACE OF WESTMINSTER — HOUSE OF COMMONS—THE POST OFFICE IN THE LOBBY.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER asked the First Commissioner of Works, If he has decided upon the proposed enlargement of the Post Office in the Lobby of the House, and when it is likely to be carried out?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, that, with the assistance of the Speaker, he would be able to provide a better Post Office accommodation in the Lobby of the House next year. The work would be carried out during the Recess.

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)—WESTMINSTER UNION WORKHOUSE —CASE OF ANN KANE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether a woman, by name Ann Kane, aged 78 years, applied recently at 9 p.m. for admission to the Westminster Union Workhouse; whether the master refused to admit her, and whether it be true that she lay on the pavement outside the gate all night, until the police interfered, when she was admitted at 7.30 a.m.; and, whether the infant of a Roman Catholic, named Duff, was allowed to die without the rites of the Church, viz. baptism, though the relatives begged that the priest should be sent for, the said infant having lived 13 days?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, the Local Government Board have communicated with the Guardians of the Westminster Union as to the case of Ann Kane, and they are informed that the woman was refused admission to the workhouse on the night of the 9th ultimo. It is stated by the workhouse master and porter that she was at the time wearing the clothes of another Union, and was very drunk and abusive. The night porter alleges that the woman left after she had been refused admission, and that he was not aware until 6.30 the following morning that she had returned. The woman, however, says that she was lying on the pavement all night. With regard to the infant Duff, the Board are informed that on Sunday, the 17th ultimo, the grandmother of the child having expressed a wish that it should be baptized, the porter was requested by the matron to draw the attention of the Roman Catholic priest to the case when he came to the workhouse. The priest attended in the afternoon of the following day; but the child died somewhat suddenly in the morning of that day. The Board have directed one of their Inspectors to visit the workhouse and make further inquiry, with the view of ascertaining what blame, if any, attaches to the officers in these cases.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 (SUB-COMMISSIONERS)—“LISTING.”

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been directed to that portion of Professor Baldwin's evidence before the Select Committee of the House of Lords appointed to inquire into the working of the Land Act of 1881, which represents the great loss of public time and the serious inconvenience to the tenants caused by the frequent adjournments of sittings of the Sub-Commissioners before the number of cases listed for hearing have been heard; and, if he will suggest to the Chief Commissioners the advantages likely to accrue by having all cases listed for hearing at each sitting heard before the termination of such sitting?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have brought this question under the notice of the Land Commissioners. They state that it is always a matter of difficulty to decide how many cases should be listed for hearing at a Sub-Commission. It is impossible to tell beforehand the number that will be settled by consent, withdrawn, or struck out, and which, therefore, will not take up the time of the Court. Neither can it be known how much time will be consumed at the trial of each case. The Commissioners make the best calculations they can, and list for each sitting the number of cases which experience shows is likely to be disposed of in the time allotted for the sitting.

MR. KENNY: Have the Land Commissioners under consideration the suggestion contained in the latter part of my Question?

MR. TREVELYAN: The attention of the Commissioners has been more than once directed to this point.

COLLECTION OF TAXES AND RATES (IRELAND).

MR. KENNY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is a fact that the Barony Constable of Upper Bunrath, Mr. C. Armstrong, collects the taxes assessed on the farm of Mr. Thomas Corbett, of Ballagh Quin, county Clare, direct from the landlady, notwithstanding that the tenant has been duly rated for the farm which has been in his possession for upwards of two years, while the deputy collector, Thomas Daffy, collects the same taxes from the tenant; if it is the fact that the agent to the property, who is secretary to the county Clare grand jury, directed the rate collector in March of last year to receive the poor rate of the same farm in the name of the landlady; and, whether the conduct of the public officials meets with the approval of the Irish Government?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the hon. Member is, no doubt, aware that the gentlemen named are local officers, and not under the control of the Government. I have, however, communicated with them, and have received replies which I will send to him. If, after reading these letters, he thinks there is a case for the interference of the Government I shall be very glad to answer a public Question.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—“REGINA v. MADDEN.”

MR. KENNY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he will state the reasons why the case of the Queen v. Madden (a gamekeeper to Mr. J. C. Delmege, J.P. of Castlepark, near Limerick city, county Clare) was not proceeded with at the last March Assizes; if it is a fact that a large number of witnesses were present to prove the charge of perjury against Madden; and, if it is a fact that a memorial was presented to the Lord Lieutenant, signed by Mr. J. C. Delmege, J.P. and a number of other magistrates, praying not to let the case be proceeded with?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER) said, this case was not brought on, because, on looking over the depositions, he saw that it was not one to prosecute. The alleged perjury consisted in a statement that two persons charged with poaching had been on the lands of Mr. Delmege in pursuit of the game. The persons charged admitted that their dogs were on the land, and raised a pheasant which they killed, but denied that they themselves crossed the boundary. He was not aware of any witnesses having attended at the Assizes. Those who made depositions were duly informed that they would not be wanted. Mr. Delmege sent a Memorial to the Lord Lieutenant; but it was not signed by any other magistrate.

CHILI AND PERU—RUMOURED TREATY OF PEACE.

MR. COMPTON LAWRENCE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been directed to a letter from Rear Admiral Garcia y Garcia, in the “Times” of June 27th, containing a copy of the bases of a treaty between Chili and Peru, by which it is proposed to cede to Chili all deposits of guano except those actually being worked at the present time; and, whether Her Majesty's Government is aware that all deposits of guano are mortgaged to the Peruvian bondholders, and whether it is intended to take any steps to protect the interest of British subjects?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have received no official information of the conclusion of a Treaty between Chili and Peru; and until they have received such information it will be premature to say what steps, if any, they may be called on to take.

LAW AND JUSTICE (INDIA)—JURISDICTION IN CIVIL CAUSES.

MAJOR CURZON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Resident at Khota, in Rajpootana, did adjudicate upon a civil case, touching personal property of the value of £30,000 or thereabouts, in favour of one Chotalal Tribhonandass; whether the said case was subsequently tried by a Native Court, and the judgment of the Resident at Khota reversed; whether Mr. Kavanagh, counsel for Chotalal Tribhonandass, petitioned the Indian Government to have the case heard on appeal by an English Court; and, whether the Resident at Khota is still in possession of the property, and that the Government of India has declined to interfere in the matter?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, the case in question appears to be an ordinary civil suit, and information in regard to such cases is not sent home by the Indian Government.

SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND—THE RESERVED TERRITORY.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to the statement made by Mr. Shepstone, the British Commissioner in the Reserved Territory, in his letter of January 12th to Sir Henry Bulwer, that—

“If all the Chiefs who expressed unwillingness to live under Cetywayo were to come into the Reserved Territory, and to be followed by any number of their people, room would not be found for them,” and to the further statement in his letter of March 16th to the same effect, Whether, considering that nine out of the twelve deposed Chiefs have signified this unwillingness, there is at present in the Reserved Territory room for all those Chiefs, and the people who may wish to follow them; and, for what reason Sir Henry Bulwer's important telegram of November 30th 1882, in which he pointed out that the further reduction in extent of the Reserved Territory, as decided upon by Her Majesty's Government, would have the effect of preventing the establishment of a necessary balance of power, was omitted from Blue Book C. 3466?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Mr. Shepstone's statement was only a contingent prophecy, which certainly as yet has not turned out true, as his successor, Mr. Osborn, does not report to us any actual or anticipated overcrowding in the Zululand Reserve. I do not know where the hon. Member got his information from; but certainly the facts within the knowledge of the Government do not bear out the statements in the second paragraph of the Question; on the contrary, several of the Chiefs had expressed their desire for Cetewayo's return. The telegram of November 30 was not given in the Blue Book, because it added little or nothing to what had already been given as Sir Henry Bulwer's views; it was merely an acknowledgment of the Secretary of State's despatch. It did not require the insertion of the telegram to show that Sir Henry Bulwer is not responsible for the curtailment of the Reserved Territory.

NAVY—ASSISTANT PAYMASTERS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether certain Assistant Paymasters of the Royal Navy have served as much as fourteen or fifteen years in their present rank; and, whether the greater part of such service is not allowed to count for increase of pay, half-pay, and retirement as Paymaster until after eleven years' Service in the higher rank?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, Sir; it is the case that the senior assistant paymasters have served 14 and 15 years in their rank. I am glad to say, however, that the prospects of promotion are at present somewhat more favourable than they have been. With regard to the hon. Member's second Question, he correctly states the rule of the Service on the subject.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I should like to ask whether it is the intention of the Admiralty to make any alteration in the position of the officers or in their pay?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir; there is no such intention at present.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: Then I shall bring up the matter on the first occasion on the Estimates.

MINES (COAL) REGULATION ACT—LOCKED LAMPS.

MR. ROLLS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the recent death of Stephen Hutton through a fall of stone from the roof of the Rose Heyworth Pit Cwm-tillery, and to the verdict of the jury at the inquest thereon, If the use of locked lamps ought to have been enforced by the Government Inspector in this colliery, against the wish of the workmen in the colliery and their employers, and the finding of the jury?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, the question of using locked lamps in mines was one of very great importance with regard to the preservation of life in mines; and the Mine Inspectors, with his full support, had endeavoured to enforce their use. In reporting this accident to the Home Department the Inspector stated that—

“At my instigation, they adopted locked lamps at this pit, and during five years there was no explosion; but since 1881, when they took to open lamps, there had been several small explosions, burning one or two men.”

The Inspector was also of opinion that unless locked lamps were resumed a terrible explosion would occur, sooner or later. He (Sir William Harcourt) could not, therefore, relax in any way the instructions on this point. As the Inspector further remarked—

“Miners become so inured to the danger of their calling that they cannot see the necessity for measures of precaution until it is too late.”

EGYPTIAN EXILES IN CEYLON—

PERSONAL MAINTENANCE.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any satisfactory arrangement has been come to in regard to the maintenance of the Egyptian exiles now in Ceylon?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Egyptian Government has, with great liberality, made an additional contribution of £500 to the sum already provided. It has been decided to allot this increase according to the needs of the prisoners, and to utilize £20 a month for the maintenance of Arabi, who is the poorest. The remainder will be placed at the disposal of the Governor of Ceylon for the support or accommodation of the other exiles.

MR. LABOUCHERE: That, I presume, is in addition to what Arabi Pasha has already received?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Yes; an addition of £20 a month.

ARMY (INDIA)—THE INDIAN MEDICAL SERVICE.

MR. GIBSON asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether there is not great stagnation of promotion, and consequent dissatisfaction, in the Indian Medical Service; whether this stagnation is owing to the abolition of a number of higher grade appointments, and also to the disbandment of a number of Native regiments; whether the prospects of promotion to the rank of Deputy Surgeon General of several Brigade Surgeons and Surgeons Major in the Indian Medical Service have been destroyed by recent alterations and arrangements which did not exist when the officers affected joined the service; whether the Government will consider the propriety of granting increased pensions to such Brigade Surgeons and Surgeons Major as compensation for their altered prospects, and as inducements to retire and make vacancies for the Surgeons on the establishment who are now unemployed; whether the difference between the rates of pay drawn by Brigade Surgeons and Surgeons Major, and the rates of pay that would be drawn by junior officers for the same duties, would more than compensate Government for the increased expenditure that would have to be incurred to induce senior officers to retire; and, whether the Government have any scheme ready to meet the grievances of the Indian Medical Service?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, the disbandment of Native regiments, though it reduced the number of “independent charges” and thus added to the number of “unemployed officers,” could not affect their promotion, which, in the executive branches, is governed solely by length of service. In my reply to the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. Leamy) on the 28th of May last, I explained that a considerable reduction in the number of appointments to the Indian Medical Service during the past and present years would shortly remove the difficulty temporarily experienced through the disproportion of officers to the number of independent charges. In this expectation, it is not considered expedient to have recourse to the offer of higher rates of pension as an inducement to the senior officers to retire; and it is unnecessary, therefore, to calculate what the financial effects of such a measure would be. With respect to the alleged abolition of a number of higher grade appointments, page 283 of the Papers presented to Parliament in 1881 (C.2,921), respecting medical officers in India, gives a despatch from the Government of India showing that the total loss of administrative appointments for the whole of the Medical Service consequent on the re-organization of the medical administration was only one. The injury to the Service is therefore nominal, though, doubtless, the arrangements consequent on the re-organization have retarded the possible selection of some few officers. Such changes, however, are to be looked for in all branches of the Public Service, and are not considered in this case to justify the grant of any special compensation. The question of the future organization of the Medical Service for India is now the subject of discussion with the War Office; but it has no reference to any grievance of the Indian or British Medical Service, and it has not yet reached a state at which any statement could be usefully made to the House.

Sir William Harcourt

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SUB-INSPECTOR CARTER.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether complaints have been made that Sub-Inspector Carter, of Mitchelstown, attempted, contrary to the Regulation of the force against controversial discussions, to dissuade Sub-Constable Browne, a constable under his charge, from becoming or remaining a convert to the Roman Catholic faith; and, whether, having regard to the fact that Sub-Inspector Carter has upwards of sixty Roman Catholic constables under his control, a sworn inquiry will be held as to his conduct?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have not yet received a full answer from Dublin. I cannot, therefore, go into the question of whether a sworn inquiry was necessary. I have received a communication from Sub-Inspector Carter; but perhaps the hon. Member would like to have fuller information.

MR. O'BRIEN: Under the circumstances I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to make inquiries amongst the police themselves as to what took place?

MR. TREVELYAN subsequently said: Perhaps the hon. Member for Mallow will allow me to answer his Question now. I have just received a communication on the matter, which states that no charges have been made against Sub-Inspector Carter, and the Inspector General is not aware of any ground to hold a sworn inquiry. Sub-Inspector Carter emphatically denies that he made any attempt to interfere with the faith of Sub-Constable Browne. On the contrary, he states that he told him, in the presence of a head constable and a sub-constable, both of them Roman Catholics, that "every man's mind was his kingdom."

MR. O'BRIEN: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman again if he will make inquiries amongst the police themselves as to whether there is any foundation for the statement?

MR. TREVELYAN: There must be a prima facie ground for it before an inquiry is made.

COMMISSIONERS OF PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND)—ERECTION OF BARRACKS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the following passage on page 13 of the 51st Report of the Commissioners of Public Works (Ireland), just issued:—

"Plans have also been made for new barracks at St. John's Street, Limerick, Suir Castle, Rosscarberry, Bohola, Ennis, and for adapting King's Court House, Clontarf, for the accommodation of Crown witnesses;"

and, whether it is the intention of the Government to make the last-mentioned establishment a permanent institution?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I can make no positive statement on this subject. The arrangement as to King's Court House will probably last as long as it may be necessary for the Crown to maintain witnesses in Ireland. The house has been selected for the purpose, in lieu of the premises formerly used at Ballybough, which were condemned as unhealthy.

INLAND NAVIGATION AND DRAINAGE (IRELAND)—SCARRIFF DRAINAGE WORKS.

MR. KENNY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he can state why the Scarriff Drainage Works, for which an Act was passed in 1880, have not been carried out; and if it was owing to the failure of the Board appointed under the Act to perform their portion of the undertaking that the matter has so far collapsed; and, if he is aware that the Act expires next year, and if the tenants of the district can now borrow on their own security the sum required to execute the said works; and, if so, whether facilities to do so will be extended to them?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the works in this drainage district have not been proceeded with by the Local Board, whose duty it was to carry them out. The period allowed by the Act expires next year; but the Board of Works can prolong it for three years more, and will, of course, do so if desired. The Drainage Board alone has power to do the work, and I hope that they will see their way to take it up and complete it. In the event of any persistent reluctance on the part of such authorities to carry through the schemes for which they are constituted, it might be necessary to consider of other combinations for the purpose of performing them.

WEST INDIES—THE WINDWARD ISLANDS—STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATES.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of the Colonial Office has been directed to the fact that, in the Windward Islands, stipendiary magistrates, who have exclusive jurisdiction in all cases between masters and servants as well as control over certain Excise questions, are, in some cases, themselves large employers of labour and distillers, and even have Coolies indentured to them; and, whether such a practice will be maintained?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, only one instance of the kind has as yet been reported to the Colonial Office, and that is the case of a magistrate in Granada. The indentures of the Coolies on his estate were about to expire, and have now expired, so that no action was necessary as to that; but inquiry is being made as to whether he is in the trade of a distiller; and, if it be so, he will be called upon either to give up his business or his office; for the practice referred to in the Question is not approved of by the Colonial Office.

SOUTH AFRICA—CETYWAYO AND USIBEPU.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether, with their present knowledge of the circumstances attending the late attack made by Cetywayo's followers upon Usibepu, Her Majesty's Government still adhere to the determination, expressed in Lord Derby's Despatch to Sir H. Bulwer of April 23rd, of refusing the request so strongly expressed by Sir H. Bulwer, Sir Th. Shepstone, and by the late British Resident in Zululand, for the appointment, at a cost of £550, of a Resident in Usibepu's territory?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, the Government, though regretting very much to differ in any respect from Sir Henry Bulwer, still adhere to their view as to the appointment of a Resident with Usibepu. Apart from the consideration of the difficulty of finding a suitable person, the Government think that the risk attendant on putting a Resident in so remote a part, and the increased responsibility which it might entail, quite outweigh the advantages to be obtained from it. The question of money has not entered into the consideration of the Government.

LIGHTHOUSE ILLUMINANTS' COMMITTEE—COMMISSIONERS OF IRISH LIGHTS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether there was not a letter from the Board of Trade to Mr. Vernon Harcourt, to which his letter on page 29 of the Correspondence on Lighthouse Illuminants was a reply; and, if so, why this letter was omitted from the Correspondence; and, whether he will cause this letter to be laid upon the Table of the House, together with the passages omitted from Mr. Vernon Harcourt's letter in reply to it? Also, in reference to the statement of the President of the Board of Trade respecting the Lighthouse Illuminants Committee, whether he is aware that the greatest number of superposed gas lights which has been applied at any lighthouse is four, as in the case of the quadriform at Galley Head, that the greatest number of superposed oil lights is two as in the case of the biform at the new Eddystone, and that the illuminating power of the biform oil light is only equal to one-eighth that of the quadriform gas; whether Sir James Douglas was one of the majority of the Illuminants Committee who resolved to restrict the exhibition of multiform lights to the biform; and, whether the statement of the President of the Board of Trade that the Committee would increase the number of lights if necessary to four, means that the gas light shall be tried with four lights in the event only of the other illuminants being capable of trial with four lights, and that if the other two illuminants are unable to be burned with four superposed lights either through mechanical difficulty or excessive cost of installation the gas light must be kept down to the level to which the others can attain?

Mr. Courtney

COLONEL KING-HARMAN : I have a Question on the Paper for to-morrow on this subject, and, as I understand the right hon. Gentleman cannot be present then, perhaps I may put it now. It is as follows :—

“ To ask the President of the Board of Trade, with respect to the Lighthouse Illuminants Committee, Whether it is true that the Commissioners of Irish Lights, in their letter to the Board of Trade of the 25th of May, in which they withdraw from all participation in the contemplated experiments of the Lighthouse Illuminants Committee, stated as one of their reasons that the Committee rejected their proposition that ‘ Mr. Wigham’s quadriform gas apparatus, which has proved so successful at Galley Head, should, with his recent improvements, by which the light is doubled be employed in the experiments,’ adding ‘ that this step will deprive the whole inquiry of the practical value which might otherwise have been anticipated ’ ; and, if he would explain why the inquiry was not made thorough and exhaustive ? ”

MR. CHAMBERLAIN : There is no doubt that the words which the hon. and gallant Member quotes are used in the letter of the Irish Lighthouse Board. The letter from the Board of Trade alluded to by the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry De Worms) referred to certain official Papers in original for Mr. Vernon Harcourt’s information. It was purely formal, and it was not thought necessary to print it. The reply of Mr. Vernon Harcourt was confidential, and as to the omitted passages, I refer the hon. Member to my answer to him on the 18th of last month. I believe that the greatest number of superposed gas lights which has been applied at any lighthouse is four, as in the case of the quadriform at Galley Head ; and that the greatest number of superposed oil lights is two, as in the case of the biform at the new Eddystone ; but I am not aware that any experiments hitherto made have proved that the illuminating power of the biform oil light is only equal to one-eighth that of the quadriform gas. The Resolution which the Illuminants Committee have adopted is that, in the first instance, they would commence the comparative tests with biform lights. Sir James Douglass was one of the majority who carried that Resolution. It is impossible to say at this stage what the course of the experiments will be ; but my intention has been that the triform and quadriform gas shall have a fair trial. At present, in consequence of the possibility of using lenses already ordered for gas in the Mew Island Lighthouse, the trial of triform and quadriform gas is comparatively cheap, while the new lenses which it would be necessary to order for the purpose of a similar trial of oil and electricity would make the experiments very expensive, and the Committee are unwilling to incur this expense until it is proved to be necessary. Since this Question was placed on the Paper, I have received a letter from the Irish Lights Commissioners declining formally to join in the experiments ; and, under these circumstances, it is a question for grave consideration whether the object I had in view of bringing the three lighthouse authorities into agreement on the subject of illuminants can be obtained, and, consequently, whether it will be worth while that the experiments should be continued.

COLONEL KING - HARMAN asked whether the right hon. Gentleman would lay the letter of the Irish Lights Commissioners upon the Table of the House ?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN : There is no objection to lay the Paper upon the Table, except upon the ground of expense. We have already published a very lengthy Correspondence in this matter ; and I should think that if the experiments are not continued, it would hardly be thought a question of sufficient importance to justify any further expense.

BUILDING ACT—PANICS IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS—LEGISLATION.

MR. KENNARD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is prepared to extend the scope of the Buildings Act (now applicable only to the Metropolis) to the Provinces, and add the Amendments requisite to the Act for diminishing the dangers of panic in crowded assemblies ?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he should be glad to do something in the direction indicated by the hon. Member, and would introduce a Bill, the draft of which he held in his hand, if he saw the slightest chance of passing it this Session. He had not, however, the smallest hope of being able to do so.

EGYPT—OMAR PASHA LUFTI.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether his attention has been drawn to a Reuter's Telegram from Alexandria, dated the 25th of June, to the effect that—

“The functionaries of the different consulates have voted addresses to Omar Pacha Lufti in recognition of the real services rendered by him as Governor of Alexandria on June 11th 1882, the day of the massacre;”

and, whether the functionaries of the British Consulate took part in this address; and, if so, whether they acted on instructions from the Foreign Office or with the permission of the Foreign Office?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government has not yet received any information on this subject. If any action has been taken by the Consuls in their Consular character, it will be reported in due course by Her Majesty's Consuls.

EGYPT—LAW AND JUSTICE—TRIAL OF SAID BEY KHANDEEL.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any information (other than what appears in the Public Press) has been received in regard to a telegram from Arabi Pacha to Said Bey Khandeel, implicating the former in the massacres at Alexandria, and which, it is alleged by the Egyptian Public Prosecutor, has been discovered; and, whether any steps are being taken by Her Majesty's Government to see that Said Bey Khandeel, now on trial on a charge of being connected with those massacres, will be allowed to put questions to witnesses for the prosecution, and to call witnesses on his behalf, with a view of proving his own innocence by endeavouring to show that the massacres were instigated by others, and that he himself acted under superior orders?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; no information has been received at the Foreign Office in regard to the telegram mentioned by the hon. Member. The trial of Said Bey Khandeel is being watched by Major Macdonald; and, in accordance with the statement contained in Lord Dufferin's despatches presented to Parliament, he has claimed the right to put questions, and bring forward the witnesses.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked how it was that the Papers relating to this subject were only delivered to hon. Members this morning, and had, nevertheless, appeared in the morning papers?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The Papers, in my opinion, ought to have been distributed on Saturday, and I have this morning caused inquiry to be instituted as to the reason why they were not sent down in time for distribution. They were here on Saturday, but too late to be sent out.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked how it was that these Papers were sent to the Press, seeing that there had been frequent promises on the part of the Government that Papers would not be published in the newspapers until they were in the hands of Members?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: If they had been sent to this House in the manner in which I anticipated they would be sent, they would have been in the hands of Members before they were published in the newspapers.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Who is the official responsible for communicating such documents to the newspapers?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have said just now that I have caused an inquiry to be made. If the noble Lord desires any further information, I shall be glad to give it him when that inquiry has been instituted.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: When?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: On Monday.

MILFORD (COUNTY CORK) DRAINAGE BILL.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Why it is that the Milford (county Cork) Drainage Bill has not gone on, when all the necessary conditions have been complied with?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, the reason why the Milford Drainage Bill is not now being proceeded with is because it received the Royal Assent on the 18th of last month.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—THE NIZAM'S TERRITORIES—HYDERABAD.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that Native gentlemen in Hyderabad, who were engaged in the opposition against the terms of a Railway concession to a London Company, have been forcibly deported from Hyderabad with the sanction of the British authorities and conveyed to British territory; and, what offence was committed by the opponents of the Railway scheme, and why they were not brought to trial instead of being removed to British territory?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, in reply to this Question, I can only say that there has been considerable feeling shown in Hyderabad—under the mistaken idea that the Government of India were endeavouring to force upon the Nizam's Government a certain railway scheme. We have no official Report of what has occurred; but the Government of India will be asked to furnish one.

INDIA—DARJEELING COOLIES BILL.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If his attention has been called to the provisions of the Darjeeling Coolies Bill in which unlicensed Coolies are forbidden to work for hire, and licensed Coolies are obliged to work at such rates of wages as may from time to time be fixed by the municipal authorities "by beat of drum;" whether these provisions render compulsory upon Coolies the acceptance of such rates of wages as may suit the employing class from time to time; and, if there is any appeal in case the rate of wages thus fixed is found insufficient by the labouring classes affected by the Law.

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, all Coolies working as porters, or "dandywallahs," are required by the Act recently passed to register themselves in the books of the Municipality, receiving thereupon a licence, for which no charge is made. Those working by the job, or for any period not exceeding 24 hours, are to be paid according to a tariff fixed by the Municipal Commissioners, and sanctioned by the Government of Bengal, which will, of course, see that the scale of remuneration fixed is fair and reasonable.

INDIA (PALCONDA)—VIZIARAM RAZ.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If, in the case of the Ex-Zemindar of Palconda, any appeal or any form of trial was open to him, during the whole of his imprisonment of thirty-seven years, by means of which he could test the justice of his confinement; whether Europeans, as well as Natives, can be imprisoned indefinitely for alleged reasons of State in India; and, whether the property of Natives can be sequestered for reasons of State, and whether there is any appeal against the indefinite duration of such sequestration?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Viziam Raz, Sir, who never was Zemindar of Palconda, might have appealed at any time during his confinement under the provisions of Madras Regulation II. of 1819. The law relating to the subject of the second and third parts of the hon. Member's Question is contained in Bengal Regulation III. of 1818. Substantially identical Regulations apply to Madras and Bombay. I must refer the hon. Member for Dungarvan to these Regulations, as I cannot undertake to give a legal interpretation of them.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary, Whether Europeans as well as Natives could be imprisoned indefinitely?

MR. J. K. CROSS said, it entirely depended on the interpretation of the Regulations to which he had referred; but he could not attempt to give a legal interpretation.

MR. O'DONNELL gave Notice that on that day fortnight he would ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he could state to the House what was the legal interpretation upon which the Indian Government acted with reference to the law in question; and whether it was the case that Europeans, as well as Natives, were liable to indefinite imprisonment?

MR. J. K. CROSS said, that this was entirely a hypothetical Question, and could not be settled without a definite question arising.

MR. O'DONNELL: Is not Her Majesty's Government aware what is the law affecting Europeans and Natives in India? ["Oh, oh!"] I give Notice that on this day fortnight I shall ask what is the law relating to Europeans and Natives on this subject, and what steps the Government will take in order to inform themselves on the subject?

THE MAGISTRACY (IRELAND)—THE CROWN SOLICITOR FOR DERRY.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true that, during the hearing of a case at the Derry Petty Sessions Court, on Monday June 25th, the Sessional Crown Solicitor for Derry, acting as solicitor at the time for the Derry Harbour Board, made use of the following observations towards the Bench:—

“Well, I must say, your worships have decided one thing, and that is, that this court does not deserve much respect;”

and, whether Her Majesty's Government in this case intends to take any action in the matter so as to prevent such public condemnations of the administration of justice by Government officials in the North of Ireland?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is the fact that Mr. Reid did—as he himself explains, “in a moment of excitement”—make an observation to the effect stated. Feeling, however, that he had acted wrongly, and that the observation was altogether unwarranted, he voluntarily attended at the opening of the Court on the following morning, expressed his regret, and apologized to the Bench, who accepted his apology. I do not think that the matter calls for further notice.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—UNIVERSITIES (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR asked the First Lord of the Treasury, with reference to his statement of May 29th, regarding the Universities (Scotland) Bill, If he can now fix an early date for the Second Reading of the important Bill in question, which was one of the measures promised in the Queen's Speech, and was read a first time on the 3rd of April?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, my hon. Friend is aware how desirous we are to get on with the Scottish Universities Bill, and we shall make the best arrangements in our power for that purpose; but I own it is my impression that nothing will be gained by my attempting to fix days at the present moment for any of the discussions upon Bills, or for other discussions to which we are pledged, until we have got through the Committee on the Corrupt Practices Bill, and entered into Committee on the Tenants Improvements Bill. By that time I hope that we might have the way tolerably clear for the purpose. At any rate, during the present week I can hardly undertake, with security, or any advantage to the House, to fix any particular day.

ARTIZANS' DWELLINGS—THE PETTICOAT SQUARE SITE—THE COMMISSIONERS OF SEWERS FOR THE CITY OF LONDON.

MR. FRANCIS BUXTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the modifications granted by him to the Commissioners of Sewers for the City of London in their proposed scheme of construction of artizans' dwellings on the Petticoat Square site, Whether he has acceded to their request in letter dated December 15th, 1882 (No. 1 in Paper No. 202 on Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Acts), that—

“The obligation to maintain the structures as artizans' dwellings should be for a limited period only?”

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: No, Sir; I have given no such sanction.

ARTIZANS' DWELLINGS—OVERCROWDING—A ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. BROADHURST asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If the Government should take Tuesday, and having regard to the impossibility of bringing the subject before the House this Session, and to its extreme urgency, he will advise Her Majesty to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the dwelling accommodation of the labouring classes, and the evils consequent on overcrowding in the Metropolis and other large towns, with a view to legislate on the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, in answer to this Question, what I believe is—and I am informed by the most competent authorities—that the facts in this case are sufficiently known, and that there would be no advantage, therefore, in appointing a Commission, unless we had some plan ready formed which could be worked out through that Commission. What we believe is that the subject is very ripe for discussion with a view to legislation, and that that discussion and legislation—and my hon. Friend is agreed, I think, as to the legislation—can hardly take place in the present Session of Parliament. Her Majesty's Government, therefore, are not inclined to propose to issue a Commission under present circumstances.

MR. BROADHURST asked whether he was to understand that the Government held out any hope that they would take up the subject next Session?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is too soon to forecast the Business of next Session.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: I wish to ask whether Her Majesty's Government have any objection to issue a small Commission, which would report to the Government as to the state of parts of the Metropolis, which really ought to be subject to the alterations required by the Artizans' Dwellings Act?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he should be happy to consider this suggestion, if he understood that these were matters into which the Committee presided over by the right hon. Gentleman had not already sufficiently inquired.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is proposed to send any more business to the Standing Committee of Law and Justice; and, whether, either by reconstituting the Committee or by adding fifteen Members for the purpose, and somewhat extending its functions, some of the Scotch business which the House is unable to undertake might not be committed to it?

MR. MONK asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government would support a Motion to refer the Bill "To consolidate and amend the Law of Partnerships," which was read a second time and amended by a Select Committee last Session, to the Standing Committee on Law and Justice?

MR. GLADSTONE: I must refer the hon. Members to the statement which was made during the Autumn Session, with respect to the Bills to be referred to the Grand Committees. On that occasion I gave the House to understand that the Government would not propose the reference to the Grand Committees of any Bills other than certain important Bills, which have turned out to be four in number, thereby recognizing the experimental character of the operation.

At the same time, I left the question open whether the Bills in the hands of private Members not agreeable to the general disposition of the Houses, should that be found to exist, be referred to these Committees, as, under these circumstances, I do not think the initiative of the Government should be used for such a purpose, except in deference to a very general desire on the part of the House. I am bound to say, also, that I am doubtful whether, at the present period of the Session, it would be possible to bring the Grand Committee on Law into operation de novo for my hon. Friend's (Mr. Monk's) purpose. I should be sorry, however, to speak in disparaging terms with regard to the measure. Its general purpose is very much favoured by the Government; and it is even possible to be supposed that the House might wish to see it in the hands of the Grand Committee. I would encourage my hon. Friend, if he would be good enough to do so, to communicate with the President of the Board of Trade on the subject.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in view of the importance of giving full time for the discussion by the Upper House of the Tenants' Compensation Bill and of the Bankruptcy Bill, and of the fact that these Bills meet with far less opposition than the Corrupt Practices Bill, the Government will postpone the further consideration of the latter Bill till the Tenants' Compensation and Bankruptcy Bills have passed that House?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, my answer to the hon. Member must be simply in the negative. Nothing would be gained by making the important change in the order of our proceedings which the hon. Member suggests.

MR. ONSLOW asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can now state on what day he proposes to resume the debate on the question of the payment by India of the troops employed by that Government in the recent Egyptian Campaign?

MR. GLADSTONE: In reply to the hon. Gentleman, I must repeat, in a measure, what I said to my hon. Friend below the Gangway (Mr. Broadhurst), that I do not think the time has yet come when I could attempt with advantage to fix a day.

WESTERN ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC—ANNEXATION OF NEW GUINEA BY QUEENSLAND.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When he will be in a position to communicate to the House the decision of Her Majesty's Government on the annexation of New Guinea by the Queensland Government; and, when the Papers on the subject, which were promised last week, will be in the hands of honourable Members?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the despatch containing an exposition of the views of Her Majesty's Government on this question is very nearly ready to be sent to Queensland, and it will be laid upon the Table of the House immediately upon its being sent. I may just state the substance of it as far as it is retrospective. The despatch sets forth that, in the view of the Government, the act of the Government of Queensland is clearly null in point of law, and we cannot admit it to be warranted in point of policy, and we are not prepared to confirm it. We think, also, that, in any event, the particular Colony of Queensland is not well suited for the function which has been assigned to it by the act; and if any measure is to be taken under any circumstances, it should be undertaken on the responsibility of the Home Government. There will be reference made in this despatch to the apprehension which some have entertained with regard to the occupation of New Guinea by Foreign Powers—an apprehension which we have no reason to entertain—but the despatch will certainly proceed on the recognition of the fact that such a question as that is one not lying beyond the sphere of our interests. The despatch, however, will be the proper medium for the expression of our sentiments on this subject. It does refer to an intention to strengthen the hands of the High Commissioners with respect to the police of those seas. That is, perhaps, enough to say with respect to a Paper which, I hope, will be in the hands of the House before many days are over. I may also mention that my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies has received from Representatives of the Australian Colonies visd voce propositions for a very large and comprehensive annexation in those seas; but he has requested that they shall be submitted to him in writing. They have not yet reached him in that form.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: In view of the very important statement which the right hon. Gentleman has made, I beg to ask if, after we have seen the despatch, and it may appear necessary to call the attention of the House to it, the right hon. Gentleman will afford facilities for doing so?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think that it will be well to postpone any reply to that Question until the despatch is in the hands of hon. Members, when they will be able to judge for themselves whether that contingency arises.

PARLIAMENT—POOR RELIEF (IRE-LAND) BILL.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is his intention to take the Committee stage of the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill to-night, the second reading of which he carried under circumstances to which it would be better not to refer?

MR. TREVELYAN: I should be very glad indeed to take the Committee stage of the Bill to-night, as, in my opinion, hon. Members the other night seemed satisfied. [Mr. BIGGAR: No, no!] Well, a pretty large number in the House, with one or two exceptions, seemed satisfied, and I should be very glad to make the same explanation again on the Motion that the Speaker do leave the Chair; but if hon. Members were not satisfied I will take the Committee stage at an earlier hour.

INDIA (GOVERNMENT) — SIR AUCK-LAND COLVIN AND MAJOR BARING.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Prime Minister, Whether there was any truth in the report that Sir Auckland Colvin was to be appointed as Finance Minister of India, and that Major Baring was to combine the Offices of Controller General and of Her Majesty's Consul General in Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I do not know how far my noble Friend (the Earl of Kimberley) has proceeded in this matter; and I would, therefore, suggest to the hon. Member to give Notice of the Question.

POST OFFICE—POSTAL TELEGRAMS.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the House would have an opportunity of discussing various schemes with regard to cheap postal telegrams before the Post Office authorities issued any Order on the subject?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, he presumed that the Question could be discussed when the Estimates for the cheapened telegraphic service were under consideration.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE gave Notice that on going into Supply he would move—

“That it is not expedient, in order to reduce the minimum price of Telegrams to Sixpence, to increase the present tariff for Telegrams of Twenty words and upwards, as would be the case under Scheme 1 of the Treasury Minute of the 14th day of June 1883.”

And to move—

“That it is not expedient to charge in the cost of Telegrams for the number of words in the address of either Receiver or Sender; and to propose the following Scheme for the consideration of the Postmaster General:—‘In every Telegram the Addresses of any length of Receiver and Sender to be charged 2d.; Telegrams of Eight Words, at a halfpenny per Word, and including Address, 6d.; Telegrams of Twelve words, at a halfpenny per Word, and including the Address, 8d.; Telegrams of Sixteen Words, at a halfpenny per Word, and including Address, 10d.; Telegrams of Twenty Words, at a halfpenny per Word, and including Address, (as at present) 1s.; Additional for every Four Words, 2d.’”

EGYPT—OUTBREAK OF CHOLERA.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: There is a good deal of uneasiness prevalent in regard to the outbreak of cholera in Egypt, and also some impression that insufficient precautions have been taken to prevent it spreading. I do not know whether any information could be given to the House on the subject at once. If not, I will put a Question to-morrow.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, I have the last telegrams in regard to the number of deaths from cholera in Egypt. They are sent by Mr. Cookson from Alexandria. They state that on June 30 the deaths at Damietta were 109; at Mansourah, 4; and at Samanond, 4. On July 1, the deaths were—at Damietta, 140; and at Mansourah, 14. The Egyptian Government has taken every precaution, by establishing a sanitary cordon round the district of Damietta and Mansourah, which was the head-quarters of the terrible disease; and, so far as it is possible to judge, the disease has hardly made itself felt at all beyond that district; and, though, perhaps, it is rash to speak on such a subject, it does look as if the measures already taken have, to a considerable extent, succeeded in confining the disease to that district, and so far isolating it, because, although several days have now elapsed since the first outbreak, it remains, on the whole, confined to the district in which it originally broke out.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

COLONEL ALEXANDER, as he had obtained the first place on the 24th of July for his Notice of Motion as to the recent changes in the system of recruiting for the Army, asked the Prime Minister, Whether he would afford facilities for the discussion of that subject, or whether he would undertake to submit Vote 8 of the Army Estimates on or before July 24?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he could not now undertake to fix a day for that purpose; but he hoped about that date to be able to fix a day for the discussion of Vote 8, and also of another of the Army Estimates which was not without importance.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had not an important statement to make as to Public Business?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no important statement to make to-day, except to say that to-morrow, at 2 o'clock, I shall move that Government Orders have precedence at 9 o'clock, and likewise on Wednesday. There has not yet been an opportunity for me to have communication with Members on the subject, or for considering fully the position of different Bills; and I do not, therefore, propose anything further than I have stated during the present week. But on Monday next—always remembering what I have previously said as to reserving the Tuesday evening fixed for the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin)—I hope to make a proposal with regard to the Tuesdays and Wednesdays.

MR. W. FOWLER asked whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed to take next Wednesday from private Members?

MR. GLADSTONE said, his proposal would apply to next Wednesday.

MR. W. FOWLER expressed his regret at this announcement, as a question of importance to his constituents was fixed for that day.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL asked whether to-morrow the right hon. Gentleman would be able to state what arrangements he would make to give the House an opportunity of discussing the Vote for Major Baring?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would endeavour to consult the convenience of the House on that matter.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked if he was to understand that Bills standing in the names of private Members for Wednesday were to be ruthlessly set aside?

MR. GLADSTONE: For a long period, in one shape or another, it has been usual that there should take place about this time of the year what is commonly called a "massacre of the innocents;" and I am afraid the urgency of the case has become much greater for our taking the Wednesdays, even though some of the Bills of private Members are of interest and importance. We are convinced that Bills in a backward state in the hands of private Members, which stand for Wednesday, cannot possibly make any advance.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I understand the right hon. Gentleman, in making the proposal of which he gave Notice for to-morrow, will make a statement to the House with regard to the Bills which will have to be proceeded with, and generally state the opinion of the Government as to the course of Business. We should hardly be prepared to agree to the concession of the Tuesdays and Wednesdays without some such statement.

MR. GLADSTONE: I find it difficult to promise to make a statement of a comprehensive character so soon as to-morrow; and, consequently, I do not propose then to make any proposal that will bind the House except for to-morrow and the following day.

INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION (WALES) —LEGISLATION.

MR. RICHARD asked if the Prime Minister could inform them when the Bill with respect to intermediate education in Wales would be brought on?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would ask the hon. Member to have patience until next Monday, and then, when he saw what progress they made this week, he should be able to give a better answer to the Question.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH ITALY.

In reply to Mr. H. T. DAVENPORT,

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE said, that the ratifications of this Treaty were exchanged on Saturday, and the Treaty would be presented to Parliament immediately.

EGYPT—THE MASSACRES AT ALEXANDRIA—ALLEGED COMPLICITY OF THE KHEWIVE.

MR. M'COAN asked the Prime Minister, Whether, as the public Press announced that documents relating to the charges first made in that House against the Khedive of Egypt by the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock had now been submitted to Her Majesty's Government, a copy of those Papers would be laid on the Table by the Government?

MR. GLADSTONE: My answer to this Question should be in the negative. The noble Lord has forwarded to me Papers of very considerable extent, which I have been able to peruse; but I have not yet been able to take any further step in reference to them.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: May I be allowed to state that the hon. Member opposite has put this Question without the slightest consultation with me?

MR. M'COAN: That, I think, goes without saying. I am not in the habit of consulting the noble Lord.

ARMY—FORAGE ALLOWANCE—THE 2ND SUFFOLK REGIMENT.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether it is a fact that Colonel O'Shaughnessy, commanding the 2nd Suffolk Regiment, at present stationed in Galway, has been drawing forage and allowance for two horses ever since he has been in command of the regiment, although it is alleged that he only keeps one?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I have no reason to think that there is any foundation for the imputation contained in this Question on the officer commanding the 2nd Suffolk Regiment. The General Commanding in Ireland has forwarded a Report from the officer concerned to the effect that he had two horses from the time he assumed command of the regiment until the 31st of May, since which date he has only drawn forage allowance for one horse.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir William Harcourt,
Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles Dilke,
Mr. Solicitor General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 29th June.]

[TWELFTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Illegal Practices.

Clause 7 (Expense in excess of maximum to be illegal).

MR. LEWIS said, he wished to point out that, in addition to the general maximum under the Bill, there was one special maximum, and that was a maximum for miscellaneous matters. He did not understand exactly what was meant by it; but possibly it was intended that the miscellaneous matters, although included in the general maximum, were not to exceed £100, the general maximum running to £350. He did not understand that there was any real necessity for such a limitation; and he should propose to substitute the word "the" for the word "any," so as to make it read "the maximum." He did not understand what was the object of the Attorney General in keeping in these precise words.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 9, leave out "any," and insert "the."—(Mr. Lewis.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the matter was a mere question of drafting, and he hoped the hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment.

MR. LEWIS said, he had no wish to waste time; but it still appeared to him to be somewhat inconsistent to have a maximum for miscellaneous matters, as well as the inclusive maximum for all matters. He wished to know whether the Attorney General insisted upon it that the miscellaneous matters, which comprehended all and sundry things, should be limited to £100; because that would carry to an extreme the fetters which were placed upon an election? And was the £100 to be included in the general maximum of £350?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) pointed out that this question could be raised later on in the Bill; and if the Committee took the same view as the hon. Member for Londonderry, he should not object. But he hoped they would not discuss the point until they were fairly arrived at it.

MR. LEWIS said, he would not press it for the present; but he protested against the wording as it stood, and regarded the matter as one of no little importance.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS moved to insert, in page 4, line 10, after the word "Act," these words—

"And no further sum shall be paid, and no further expense shall be incurred on account of, or in respect of, the conduct and management of such election by any person other than the candidate, or his election agent (except by a voter for the purpose of recording his own vote, or as otherwise provided by this Act)."

He was very much afraid that the candidate might be placed in a very bad position. As the Bill was drawn, a candidate would find himself very much hampered, and would not venture to make any expenditure; and the result would be that a large sum of money would be expended without his knowledge or consent by outside people who came from a distance. It had been represented to him (Sir R. Assheton Cross) very strongly that in the case of large towns and populous places beyond the boundaries, the payment of travelling expenses to voters might probably be made by some local Conservative or Liberal Association, or by private individuals, or it might be done on their part, and it would never be charged to the election agent, and he would never know anything about it. It often happened that some zealous friend was anxious either to placard some view which the candidate had expressed, or to put forward some views of his own, and would send down persons to the borough to cover all the walls with placards. What position would the candidate be left in in such a case? Or there was another case to be considered. Some argumentative story might be put out which the candidate would like very much to deny. Those were two samples of the cases which might arise. Of course, it was necessary to prevent money being spent by other people outside the borough who had nothing to do with it, and of whom the election agent would be supposed to know nothing at all, to the great injury of the bond fide candidate.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 10, after the word "Act," insert "and no further sum shall be paid and no further expense shall be incurred on account of or in respect of the conduct and management of such election by any person other than the candidate or his election agent (except by a voter for the purpose of recording his own vote, or as otherwise provided by this Act)."—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, he quite agreed that it was necessary to get rid of an outside expenditure; but he was afraid that the words proposed by the right hon. Gentleman would carry them further than they ought to go. Another objection which he had to the Amendment was that Clause 7 dealt entirely with the agents of the candidate; and, besides that, the right hon. Gentleman would perceive that in Clause 22 the Bill did endeavour to deal with the point he had raised. Clause 22, which dealt with the outside expenditure, and not with the expenditure of the candidate or the election agent, would be a more convenient place than this in which to make the Amendment.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was perfectly content with the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman that he agreed with the view that this outside expenditure ought to be stopped. They ought to put some limit to it, because this was a matter of really vital importance. Under these circumstances, he would willingly withdraw the Amendment—he had no affection at all for its wording—and he would substitute something, with the assistance of the Attorney General, in Clause 22. There was a clause which came before that—Clause 14—on which he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had an Amendment, which would provide that any person employed by or in receipt of a salary from any political or other Association outside the constituency in which the election occurred should be considered as engaged or employed for payment if he acted under such employment for the purpose of promoting, or procuring, or opposing the election of a candidate at any such election. He thought they ought to agree in stopping this expenditure in some form or other. He was quite willing to withdraw his Amendment now, on the understanding that in the course of the Bill the Attorney General would give his attention to the point, for he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) did not think that the words of Clause 22 were strong enough as they stood.

MR. RYLANDS said, he had a very strong feeling as to the maximum of expenditure, which was a most important point; but he was afraid that, unless they could devise great checks and safeguards, there would almost inevitably be a considerable amount of expenditure outside, which could not be controlled by the candidate or his agent. He could quite understand, with regard to out-voters, that there was a system under which the names of out-voters were recorded in the books of corresponding committees of political Associations in different parts of the country, so that a list of the voters of a particular constituency who had ceased to reside in the district could be obtained by a political Association elsewhere. It ought to be carefully considered how they were to prevent arrangements being made under which these out-voters might be sent, at the expense of the political Association, to vote in the constituency in which they formerly resided; and he did hope that the Attorney General would very carefully consider this point. His (Mr. Rylands's) desire was to support the hon. and learned Gentleman, in every way he could, in keeping the expenditure down; but, at the same time, he thought that in doing that they should, if possible, prevent themselves from being led into a trap, under which they would find themselves confronted by things which a not over-scrupulous candidate would do.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had an Amendment which was directed to the same object, and perhaps he might save time by referring to it now. Both his right hon. Friend (Sir R. Assheton Cross) and himself had the same object in view — they deprecated the interference, under the guise of Associations, or even by individuals, with the particular constituency in which the candidate and the constituents were placed face to face with each other. There could be no possible doubt that unless this sort of interference was prohibited under this Bill, that external interference would be powerful, and largely successful. There would be a Society for the prohibition of some object with which the candidate, on one side or the other, was more or less identified; and it would be the duty of that Society to send down lecturers to the constituency. There could be no doubt about that, for the thing had been done already, and it would be sure to be done again. The candidate was not to incur any expense beyond a certain figure, and at the last moment that Association would placard the whole constituency. What was to be done? Some other Society pledged to oppose the first one would go down to the same place and cover the placards of the opposing Society with their placards, denouncing the candidate on the other side and the whole system. It was quite clear that if they fixed the maximum to be spent by the candidate alone, that would be evaded, he would not say in the most disguised, but in the most open manner through the agency of these different Associations which would be created for the purpose. It was, therefore, absolutely imperative that external interference should be prohibited under penalties, and there should be no doubt about it that the candidate or his agent would be subject to these penalties if the expense was not included in the accounts. His own Amendment provided a penalty which did not exist in the Bill at the present moment. No doubt, the Attorney General might hold that Clauses 14 and 22 would have the desired effect; but he (Mr. W. H. Smith) thought they were not sufficiently punitive—they did not attach sufficient penalties to the offences which it was sought to prevent, and which the House of Commons desired to prevent.

MR. GORST said, he thought the intentions of the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken were most excellent, but they were founded on a misapprehension of the existing law. As the law stood at present, a person, even when he was not a candidate or agent, was just as guilty of bribery, treating, or undue influence, when he committed those offences, as if he were a candidate or agent. The punishment for such offences was not confined to candidates or agents, but applied to all persons who transgressed the law; and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman was merely a declaration of the law as it existed in its present state, and as it would still remain after the passing of this Bill. It was, practically, no Amendment at all; and he (Mr. Gorst) apprehended that the object of this Bill would be to repress all illegalities, not only on the part of a candidate or his agent, but on the part of any outside Society which interfered in an election. He did not at all share the fears which had been expressed by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) and the right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench, that there would be any difficulty whatever in securing compliance with the law on the part of any outside Society, because the gentlemen who formed a political Society, in London or elsewhere, to influence an election would be well known, and they would take great care that they did not render themselves liable to punishment or penalties by doing any acts which would be an infringement of the law as it existed and as it would remain under the Bill. These Amendments, then, were not wanted; and he thought it would be better not to go on with this discussion, but to wait until the clause dealing with outside payments was reached.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he must congratulate himself on the discovery which had been made by the right hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) that the Bill was not sufficiently punitive. This was the first time he had heard such an observation made in the course of these discussions. He felt, however, that these outside influences must be dealt with; but he thought it would be found that that was really done in Clause

22. When they came to that clause he should bear in mind what had been said by his right hon. Friend (Sir R. Assheton Cross), and he would do his very best to see the extent to which they could safely go.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS thought the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) was in error in regard to one point. One thing which was most strongly objected to was that an outside Society should come in and do things which it would be perfectly legal for them as a Society to do, and by which they would not incur any penalty, but which would do an infinite amount of damage to the candidate, because he could not answer them or refute their libels, if that term might be fairly used. He (Sir R. Assheton Cross) accepted the Attorney General's assurance that on Clause 22 he would produce words which would attain the object that they all had in view.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HICKS, in moving, as an Amendment, in page 4, line 10, after the word "Act," the insertion of these words—

"Provided, That an election for the purposes of this Clause shall be held to commence with the issue of the candidate's address, whether printed or addressed to a meeting of his supporters with a view to the coming election, the appointment of his election agent, or the issue of the writ, whichever may first happen," said, that when this clause was discussed on Friday, a question was raised as to the difficulties in which a candidate and his agent, who were really desirous of complying with the provisions of the Bill, might find themselves placed from not knowing at what period the election was to be held to commence. If he understood the Attorney General correctly on that occasion, the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to admit the force of that objection, but said that there were great difficulties in framing any section which would properly define the time at which the election commenced. He (Mr. Hicks) had endeavoured to supply that definition. Whether he had succeeded to the satisfaction of the hon. and learned Gentleman, or to the satisfaction of the Committee generally he did not know, but he had made an honest attempt to arrive at a definition for the purpose of enabling the candidate to know when the time during which his maximum amount was to be spent really commenced. He (Mr. Hicks) certainly approved of having a maximum sum named, but what that maximum sum should be was quite another question. However, when they had a maximum sum, they ought also to know when the time for its expenditure was to be concluded or commenced, or otherwise the candidate, with the best intentions in the world, and after having given his agents strict orders to keep within that sum, might be placed in this position, that expenses of a perfectly harmless character, which had been incurred weeks and months before the time when the election proper began, might by some means or other be construed to be part of the election expenses, with the result that the maximum sum might be found to be exceeded, and the seat lost, notwithstanding the fact that such expenses did not touch, in the least degree, upon corrupt practices. He did not desire to diminish in any way the force of the clause, and he proposed this Amendment in the hope that it would be acceptable to the Attorney General, and that it might really furnish a test by which the time of the commencement of the election might be accurately known.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 10, after "Act," add "Provided, That an election for the purposes of this Clause shall be held to commence with the issue of the candidate's address, whether printed or addressed to a meeting of his supporters with a view to the coming election, the appointment of his election agent, or the issue of the writ, whichever may first happen."—(Mr. Hicks.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. ONSLOW said, this proposal was somewhat on the lines of an Amendment which he had been about to propose himself. He wished to put a question on the subject to the Attorney General. Supposing a candidate was elected, and there was no other election likely to take place for six years. The elected candidate might go down to his borough every year and address his constituents. He might even address them in particular wards, and for each meeting in each ward he might have to pay a certain sum of money for hire of rooms. He (Mr. Onslow) would like to ask whether these payments would have to be included as for election purposes? Undoubtedly, the candidate would go down to address his constituents with a view to the next election, and it was desirable to know whether he would have to include in his election expenses the sums he had paid for the hire of rooms for his annual addresses? This was a matter of the very greatest importance, because if these sums were to be included it would make an enormous difference, as even for the comparatively small place (Guildford) which he (Mr. Onslow) had the honour to represent, £50 or £60 of his maximum might easily go in the hire of rooms before the next election took place, and in other and larger constituencies the candidate might have to pay a great deal more. The words which he (Mr. Onslow) had intended to propose would provide that no payment made after the election or before the receipt of the Writ for the next election should be included. Were they or were they not to include the sums they legitimately and legally spent in delivering addresses to their constituents? Because, if so, they would have for the future to go out to some open space and ask the electors to listen to them there. He would ask the Attorney General to consider the desirability of inserting some Proviso of this sort in order to protect the candidate in the matter of perfectly legitimate expenses which might exceed the maximum amount. A room for delivering an address was not to be got for nothing; they had to pay £10 or £20 for one, and if that was to be included in the maximum the amount would be swallowed up in no time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that this question was quite an old friend, and he thought they had arrived at a satisfactory settlement of it before. He wished to point out that the words of the clause were "conduct or management" of an election, so as to make the clause strike at the election itself. The case put by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) clearly did not come within the clause, and a Member who went to his constituents to give an account of his actions would not be affected. It was impossible to define a special time for the commencement of an election. The Amendment now before the Committee defined the commencement of the election as dating from the issue of the candidate's address. But the candidate might not issue an address, or he might issue it close upon the election itself, and have incurred a heavy expenditure before it, thereby evading the law; or he might not appoint an election agent until the very eve of the election, and a most extensive system of "nursing" might go on before that; or the Writ might issue four days before the election, after weeks and weeks of canvassing. Practically, there would be no difficulty in the matter; and if any error should be made, there was a new clause already upon the Paper to provide that anything done in good faith, through inadvertence, or unintentionally, should not void the election.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, it was quite true that this point had been discussed at considerable length at the last sitting of the Committee; but he was bound to say that it had not been exhaustively discussed. There might be a prolonged Election Campaign, such as that which occurred in 1868, and the Attorney General met that case by saying that it was an undesirable state of things, and that it must not happen again. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) hoped it would not. But how could they control the mind of the Prime Minister? The same thing might happen again as happened in 1868, if the present Prime Minister was at the head of the Government. The last General Election, although a short one, took them all by surprise, and at the next Dissolution they might have precisely the same state of things as that which existed in 1868, presuming that the Prime Minister did not choose to announce when he intended to dissolve. The Attorney General had addressed himself to the case of the sitting Member, but he had not said a word about the candidate. A candidate might go into a constituency, and might be compelled to hire rooms and so forth, with a view of contesting the seat, long before the election actually took place; and he did not see that a word had been said by the hon. and learned Gentleman which at all applied to that case, however directly it might apply to the case of the sitting Member. All the discussion pointed in the direction of the suggestion that there should be some limit fixed and a definite time stated as the time at which the election commenced. Although he did not agree with the particular period indicated by the hon.

Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks), he thought he could suggest a mode by which this object could be accomplished. He did not see why the Bill should not provide for a stated time, such as that fixed by an Order in Council, or by the Proclamation announcing the Dissolution of Parliament and the time for the assembling of the new Parliament. That date would depend entirely upon the Proclamation and its publication in The Gazette; and he did not see why something of the same sort might not be done in regard to the election expenses. If the Act did not contain a clause to this effect, he was satisfied it would be the cause of great hardship by-and-bye. It was no answer to say that the matter was one that could be left to the Judges. Judges were, like all other human beings, fallible mortals. Their Judgments conflicted every day; and if it were intended that the Bill should provide against the commission of corrupt and illegal practices, it should also provide against the occurrence of cases of hardship. He trusted that when the subject came up again it would be competent for the Attorney General, or for somebody else, to move a clause fixing a limit as to the period at which the election commenced.

MR. W. H. JAMES wished to ask a question of the Attorney General. The clause contained the expression "before or after the election," and he wished to know whether the expenses incurred by a candidate in respect of registration before the election would come within the clause?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) replied in the negative. The expenses connected with the registration generally would certainly not come within the words "conduct or management" of an election.

MR. NEWDEGATE wished to make a suggestion to the hon. and learned Gentleman which he thought would facilitate the disposal of the question—namely, that they ought to exclude from the cognizance of any Court which would have to adjudicate upon questions arising out of an election all matters relating to registration on either side. Unless there were specific words to exclude the legitimate action of the candidate in connection with the registration of voters, he was afraid that some difficulty might arise.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, the clause related to the expenditure of candidates, and he should like to have some general idea as to where they were. In the last discussion upon the subject, nothing was said upon the question of the continuity of the election; but it was said that it ought to be left to the Judge who tried the Election Petition. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had called attention to Clause 60 of the Bill. Now, Clause 60 was as clear as possible. It said—

"In the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts, as amended by this Act, the expression 'candidate at an election' means, unless the context otherwise requires, any person elected to serve in Parliament at such election, and any person who has been nominated as a candidate at such election, or has been declared by himself or by others to be a candidate, on or after the day of the issue of the writ for such election, or after the dissolution or vacancy in consequence of which such writ has been issued, and the expression 'candidate' shall be construed accordingly."

It seemed to him that that clause was as clear as any words could be, and that it limited the effect of Clause 7 in reference to a candidate at any election, by providing that he should be a person who had been nominated as a candidate, who had been declared by himself or others to be a candidate on or after the day of the issue of the Writ, or after the Dissolution or the vacancy in consequence of which the Writ had been issued. The Attorney General said he would see about that when they came to Clause 60; but what he (Sir George Campbell) wanted to know was, whether the Attorney General intended that the maximum expenditure should be limited to a few days after the vacancy had occurred, or whether he intended to strike out that part of the clause altogether, and leave it to the discretion of the Judge?

MR. BIGGAR said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Hicks) as to the propriety of defining in the Bill the time at which the election commenced. At present, it was not at all certain, especially when they remembered the remarks of the Attorney General, that the Bill would fix a limit in any way. To show how the matter would work if a definite limit were not fixed, he would call attention to the case of an hon.

Gentleman who was in the last Parliament, but who was not a Member of the present one. It was a common report that that Gentleman, who for some time represented a large borough constituency, was in the habit of making all sorts of excuses for giving presents to his constituents. He gave them presents at Christmas; and whenever any member of his family was married, he gave a wedding present to every elector in the borough, and in that way he was able to "nurse" the borough in that most open manner. Now, he (Mr. Biggar) did not think that acts of that kind would be brought within the purview of the present Bill, because it would not be held that the hon. Gentleman was a candidate in any sense of the word, and there was no continuity between the presentation of wedding gifts and something that was to take place hereafter in connection with the representation of the borough. Therefore, he did not think the Bill would be of any practical use in such a case, because it could be evaded with the greatest ease. In 1868, he (Mr. Biggar) had something to do with the Election for Belfast, at which the hon. Baronet, now Member for Londonderry (Sir Thomas M'Clure) was one of the successful candidates. A practice which the present Bill declared to be illegal was at that time frequently resorted to. But the committee of the then candidate (Sir Thomas M'Clure) would not engage cars to take the voters to the poll, and the candidate himself declined to do it. But what occurred? A number of car-drivers, on the chance of getting paid in the end, supplied cars on the day of election, and he (Mr. Biggar) and others went round among the members of the Liberal Party to collect subscriptions to pay the car-drivers for the services they had rendered. The candidates spent money most lavishly in any way that he held to be legal; but he declined to spend money illegally. Nevertheless, the men were paid, and the law was evaded. He (Mr. Biggar) really did not see that anything would be practically gained by fixing a limit of time at which the election should be said to commence, because such a provision would be quite as easily evaded as any election payment which took place before the time named. Perhaps the Committee would allow him to give another illustration. It was the case of another candidate for Parliamentary honours who would not bribe the electors. His opponent, however, bribed, and succeeded in being returned. The noble Lord who was the unsuccessful candidate (Lord Cochrane), and who only obtained a small number of votes, then called together the men who had given him their support, and made a large and liberal present to each of them. What was the result? When the next vacancy occurred the noble Lord was again a candidate, and he got in with flying colours. But on that occasion he was by no means so liberal or friendly towards those who had placed him in a position of honour. He had succeeded in carrying his point, and was Member for the borough of Stafford for one Parliament; but the noble Lord declined, under any circumstances, to make a present to those who had voted for him on the second occasion, on the ground that it would be held to be bribery. He (Mr. Biggar) was of opinion that there was not a single provision in the Bill which could not be evaded with the greatest ease, and he believed that all the time which was being wasted in the discussion of the Bill might be much more profitably spent.

MR. HICKS said, he would place himself entirely in the hands of the Committee. He should be very sorry to waste the time of the Committee unnecessarily, and therefore, if it was so desired, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. FRANCIS BUXTON moved, in page 4, line 12, to leave out "an illegal," and insert "a corrupt." The object of this section of the clause was to define the punishment for the offence of paying expenses in excess of the maximum amount specified in the 1st Schedule of the Act. He did not think that it was likely that any candidate would be found who would knowingly exceed the maximum expenses allowed under the Bill, but in future elections the candidate would be more or less in the hands of his agents. It would be the agent who would have to make the payments; and if any election agent knowingly exceeded the maximum scale, it appeared to him that the punishment named in the Bill was hardly sufficient for the offence. If an agent knowingly committed this offence, it was provided that he should be held guilty of an illegal practice, and the punishment for illegal practices was a fine of £100, together with incapacity during a period of five years from the time of the election for being registered as an elector, or voting at any election in the United Kingdom, whether Parliamentary election or any other election, for a public office. If the Amendment were adopted, persons who knowingly exceeded the maximum scale of expenses would be found guilty of a corrupt practice, in regard to which the punishment was much more severe, the offender being liable to be imprisoned for one year and fined £200. If an agent who committed this offence was only to be liable to a fine of £100 and five years' disfranchisement, it appeared to him (Mr. Buxton) that the penalty would amount to absolutely nothing. So far as the fine was concerned, it would simply be made an addition to the other election expenses of the candidate; and as to the disfranchisement for five years, he did not see how the election agent of a candidate was likely to have the power of using his vote at any election for that period of time. Consequently, the punishment amounted to almost nothing. If the Attorney General could see his way to the adoption of this Amendment, he (Mr. Buxton) did not think the candidate would ever render himself liable to the penalty, and the only result would be to make it a harder and sharper punishment upon any agent who might be guilty of a corrupt act. It might, of course, be used against a candidate who was guilty of the same offence, but he could not imagine that any candidate would knowingly commit an act of this kind. He begged to propose the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 12, to leave out "an illegal," and insert "a corrupt."—(Mr. Francis Buxton.)

MR. LEWIS said, he thought they ought all to be obliged to the hon. Member for his very moderate proposal. The only wonder was that the hon. Member stopped where he did. For his own part, he (Mr. Lewis) would not have felt surprised if the hon. Member had proposed to inflict capital punishment on Members guilty of offences against the Bill. There would have been just as much sense in the one proposal as in the other. Some hon. Members never seemed to be satisfied unless they were proposing the infliction of penal servitude upon their fellow-Members. Now, what was the proposal? A stupid agent or a foolish candidate exceeded the maximum scale of election expenses, and an hon. Member sitting for a miserably small borough, where there need be no election expenses at all, got up and said that if a man did that, he should be sent to prison for one year with hard labour. He should like to know in what school the hon. Gentleman had been trained, and what lawyer or philosopher he had sat at the feet of? He (Mr. Lewis) presumed that hon. Members were sent to that House to make laws that would carry with them the respect of the people, and not to introduce ruthless and reckless propositions which could only earn the contempt of the people. The hon. and learned Attorney General seemed to regard the proposal with as much horror as he (Mr. Lewis) did; but he thought it ought to be noticed generally by the public what punishment, in the opinion of an hon. Member, ought to be inflicted upon a candidate who exceeded the maximum expenditure allowed by law. He thought the Amendment was utterly unworthy of consideration.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped his hon. Friend would withdraw the Amendment. The offence which he proposed to visit with a year's imprisonment was, after all, not so much a malum in se as a malum prohibitum. The offence would cause a candidate to lose his seat. If either he or the election agent knowingly exceeded the maximum of expenditure, that result would follow. He quite agreed with the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) that it was unreasonable to subject such an offence to the punishment described in the Bill for corrupt practices.

MR. FRANCIS BUXTON said, that after the remarks which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman he would not press the Amendment. Of course he knew that the candidate, under the clause as it stood, would lose his seat; but the agent would get off scot-free, and that was what he objected to. It might be said that an action could be brought against the agent after the election was over; but he was afraid that if a candidate took that extreme course he would never find another agent who would be willing to act for him. He begged to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had placed upon the Paper the following new sub-section after Sub-section 2:—

“Any person who does any act which, if it were committed by a candidate or his agent, would be a corrupt practice, illegal practice, illegal payment, employment or hiring, shall be guilty of the same offences, and be liable to the same penalties, as if he were himself such candidate or agent; and any person not being an election agent who pays any money or incurs any expense (not included within the expenses returned by the candidate or his agent) in promoting the election of any candidate shall be guilty of an illegal practice.”

He did not propose to move that section now; but he thought he would best consult the convenience of the Committee if he were to postpone it until they reached Clause 22, which related to the payment of expenses through an election agent.

“Provided that nothing in this section shall affect the right of a creditor who when the expense was incurred was ignorant of the expense being incurred in contravention of this section.”

He believed that, as a general rule, corrupt expenditure was not intentionally incurred, and the cases in which gross and systematic bribery and corruption were practised were very few. He believed that in the great majority of cases the candidate intended to act in perfect good faith, and not to bribe the constituency at all. The position the candidate was in was this. First of all, he came into contact with all sorts of people who did electioneering work, and these men, when the election was over, having played some small part in accompanying the candidate in his canvass, furnished an account for their services at a most exorbitant rate. The candidate knew very well that the claim was of a fraudulent and an extortionate nature; but, at the same time, the person who made it knew very well that in most cases the candidate would not have the courage to defend any action that might be brought against him. In the next place, the persons by whom such claims were made were men of straw from whom no costs could be recovered if they failed to make their claim good. Therefore, in most cases, the candidate was compelled to compromise the action on unfair terms, or to fight it out in Court, where he might, perhaps, get an award from a jury for some small sum slightly above the sum paid into Court, which would compel him to pay very heavy costs. He believed that his hon. Colleague (Mr. Fay), after the last Election, received an account from the keeper of an hotel for the full value of everything supplied, and at the foot of the bill a sum of £100 was added for the use of the house. His hon. Colleague was charged in other respects quite a sufficient sum to pay the hotel-keeper all reasonable and proper charges, and he, therefore, refused to pay this item, and the hotel-keeper put the case in the hands of an attorney, who brought an action in one of the Superior Courts. Thereupon, there were applications for particulars and all sorts of things, which very rapidly swelled the bill of costs, and his hon. Colleague in the end had to pay a large sum in addition to the extravagant amount he had paid in the first instance. If he had gone before a jury his position would have been this. If he failed to obtain a verdict, he would have had to pay a large additional sum in costs; and if he got a verdict, he would have been entirely unable to recover costs from the plaintiff, who was a man of no means whatever, and had neither reputation nor capital. The inevitable result was that he was bound to incur a loss; and, therefore, he came to a compromise rather than be put to further trouble and expense. He would give another illustration. In the Derry Election in 1881 a newspaper account for £109 was sent in for printing and advertizing. Some of the items were charged 10 times more than the ordinary price. The account was, therefore, refused to be paid, and the newspaper proprietor threatened legal proceedings against him (Mr. Biggar), who was responsible for the account. He declined, however, to give way, and required each item to be examined by some com petent person, and taxed. As he had said, proceedings were threatened against him; but he refused to be victimized, and in the end a sum of £30 was taken in settlement of a claim of £109. That certainly proved that the claim was fraudulent and unjust. At the last Election for Cavan, a personation agent made a claim of £10 against him when he was only entitled to a sum of 18s. 10d. He offered the sum to which the man was fairly entitled, whereupon he was threatened with legal proceedings; but, seeing that he stood firm, the man ultimately took the 18s. 10d. instead of the £10 he at first claimed. But the man who made a perfectly dishonest claim got off scot-free, and suffered neither fine nor imprisonment; whereas, if he (Mr. Biggar) had entered into a compromise with him, and had given him more than he was entitled to, he might have been unseated under this clause for making an illegal payment, whereas the party who forced him into making the illegal payment would have got off scot-free on the plea that he did not know that it was an illegal claim. But newspaper men and car-drivers, and all persons of that kind, knew perfectly well that the claims they were constantly in the habit of making were fraudulent, dishonest, and illegal, and it was altogether improper that they should be specially exempted from liability, seeing that they were the very persons who forced the candidate to make these illegal payments. A vast majority of candidates were most anxious to keep down the expenses of an election, but excessive expenditure was forced upon them by persons who resorted to a system of extortion and fraud. Under these circumstances, he hoped the Committee would consent to strike out these three lines, and render persons who made an illegal claim just as responsible as the candidate who paid it.

MR. LEWIS said, he thought that the sub-section as it stood would give rise to considerable difficulty. A claim might be made upon the candidate, and the agent would say—"I gave no such order; you have quite misunderstood me, and I do not owe you a penny." Then this section would come in, and the creditor would say that the agent had disregarded his claim altogether, and he would bring an action, and, as they all knew, there were plenty of people who were able to persuade juries that right was wrong, or something that seemed wrong. Witnesses sometimes overstepped the words of truth. He would assume that the candidate was beaten in the action, and that it was held that according to law his agent had ordered the articles. Was the candidate in that case to lose his seat, and the agent by the result of that action to be liable to penalties? The right of the creditor was preserved, and if it was established ultimately, important consequences would follow. How could the Attorney General save the candidate or the agent?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he quite understood the objection that was raised to the sub-section, and in the interests of the honest creditor he was not prepared to say that it was legally necessary at all. Nevertheless, as the matter was somewhat doubtful, he had considered it objectionable to leave the law in an uncertain state. He thought they ought to say what they meant, and if they were of opinion that a creditor should be entitled to recover a just claim, then he thought they ought to say so. They sanctioned by the Bill the employment of committee rooms. Suppose that a candidate was entitled to have five committee rooms, and an application was made to a person to supply a sixth. The person who lent the room might not know that it was a sixth committee room. Why, then, should he not, being a honest creditor, have the right to say—"I did not know that it was in excess of the number provided by law." In such a case, this sub-section entitled the creditor to be paid; and if they said that he should not be paid, they would afford an opportunity for a person to say—"We will spend as much as we like;" and then turn round and say—"We knowingly exceeded the maximum of expenditure, and therefore you cannot recover." He was of opinion that everything ought to be perfectly clear one way or the other, whether such a defence ought to exist or not. He thought they ought to get at the person who did wrong if they could; but the honest creditor would have done no wrong. What he did he would have done unintentionally, not knowing anything to the contrary; and they ought to protect him and enable him to recover his debt. He did not see, because the creditor recovered and showed that the sum was due, that the candidate was placed in any worse position. The effect upon him would always depend upon the fact that the amount was found to be due by the jury. The sub-section had been introduced into the Bill with the view of protecting the honest creditor, and of indicating to County Court Judges that Parliament did not intend that the honest creditor should not be paid by those who had chosen to disobey the law.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he did not think that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had quite understood the objection which had been taken by his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis). The question which his hon. Friend put was this. Supposing the return of election expenses came up to the maximum scale, and then an honest creditor put in a claim for something additional, what would be the position of the candidate if he paid that claim? If he refused it, it would be submitted to the verdict of a jury, which would probably go against him. If he paid it, he would incur the penalty of having exceeded the maximum scale of expenditure allowed by law. He spoke feelingly on this point, because, after his election expenses were returned in 1868, a person at Deal brought an action against him to recover the cost of certain hired carriages. Now, certainly, he had never hired the carriages, nor had his agent hired them; but, notwithstanding, an intelligent jury decided that he ought to pay for them. The same case might occur again. At the time of which he spoke the candidate was not subjected to these terrible penal clauses. Under this clause, if he resisted the claim he was subjected to an action at law, and if he paid it he was liable to go to prison and lose his seat. He thought that was an unfortunate dilemma in which to place a candidate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had endeavoured to explain the position of the matter. Either the candidate would owe the money or he would not, and the finding of a jury would not put him in a worse position than by law he would be in before the action was brought. The candidate would have a perfect right to say that he did not enter into a contract or incur the expenditure, and that he should not lose his seat; and if the Judge was of the same opinion, then, under Clause 17 of the Bill, it would be found that every protection was given which could be given to meet the very case that was referred to. If the candidate went before the Judge and said, "I know nothing at all about it," then the words of Clause 17 covered the case. If any further words were necessary to give full protection to the candidate, he would be glad to insert them.

MR. GRANTHAM said, he thought the Attorney General was quite right in the position he took. It would be a monstrous thing to say that because a candidate had exceeded the maximum expenditure allowed by law a creditor should be prevented from recovering an honest debt. He would, however, call the attention of the Attorney General to language used in the earlier part of the section which, in his opinion, made it necessary that this sub-section should be inserted. The clause said, in the second line—

"No sum shall be paid and no expense shall be incurred by a candidate at an election or his election agent, whether before, during, or after an election, on account of or in respect of or incidental to such election, in excess of any maximum amount in that behalf specified in the first schedule to this Act."

Those words were very strong indeed, and he had no doubt, if this sub-section were struck out, that not only the County Court Judge, but every other Judge, would be inclined to say that any expenditure beyond the maximum could not be paid. At the same time, he was bound to agree with the Attorney General that if an order had been given and the expenses incurred the creditor ought to be paid.

MR. WARTON said, there was one point to which he desired to call the attention of the Attorney General. The hon. and learned Gentleman must, as a lawyer, know perfectly well that there was no obligation on the part of the candidate to spend more than a certain amount of money; but the fact that more was expended could in no way affect the rights of the creditor. Therefore this section was clearly unnecessary, and he thought it was a very bad practice to load Bills with words which were not necessary, and which only led to discussion. Besides, the words, if unnecessary, were actually mischievous when they looked at the rest of the Bill. In Clause 6 they had provided that—

“No payment or contract for payment shall, for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of a candidate at any election, be made (c) on account of any committee room in excess of the number allowed by the first schedule to this Act.”

This sub-section provided—

“That nothing shall affect the right of a creditor who when the expense was incurred was ignorant of the expense being incurred in contravention of the section.”

It might be urged that as Section 6 made no reservation of the rights of a creditor at all in reference to committee rooms, he would not be able to recover an honest debt notwithstanding the existence of this sub-section. Suppose the candidate was allowed to hire five committee rooms, and an agent from some negligence, or, perhaps, through design, hired six simultaneously, would he be in a position to say to each of the six persons from whom a room was hired that there had been an excessive expenditure, so far as the Act was concerned, and he was not allowed to pay for more than five—would he, therefore, escape payment in the case of all six? If the creditor said, “That does not affect me,” the answer would be that it did, because by Clause 6 his rights were not guarded, although they might be by Clause 7. What was the construction that was to be put upon the Act if the rights of the creditor were preserved in one section and not in another, so far as committee rooms were concerned? Were they to interfere with the contract between the candidate and his agent, and the contract between the agent and the creditor? No lawyer would for one moment pretend to say that this sub-section was necessary. The hon. and learned Member for East Surrey (Mr. Grantham) seemed to think there was something in the words of the second line of the clause, “that no sum be paid and no expenses incurred in excess of the maximum amount.” It was obvious, however, that that related to the maximum expenses of a candidate at an election, and did not affect the present question, which applied to a single item.

Mr. Warton

His own impression was that the sub-section was unnecessary, and that it would lead to various dangers—among others, to the danger that the extortioners, who abounded at election times, would be induced to make all sorts of extravagant claims. He had no objection to give to a creditor his just rights, but nothing more, and he looked upon the sub-section as dangerous, unnecessary, and inconsistent.

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE asked the Attorney General how Section 7 would operate in such a case as this. Suppose the candidate had already expended the maximum amount allowed by the Act, and after the election was over a dishonest claim was made against him, would any expenditure he incurred in defending himself against such a claim be regarded as excessive expenditure over the maximum?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Certainly not.

MR. BIGGAR said, that the fact that the clause was directed against a candidate making an illegal payment might suggest that the creditor was making a fraudulent claim, and was threatening proceedings against the candidate unless the claim was satisfied. They all knew that in election times, in every constituency, a certain number of persons turned up with the sole intention of preying upon the unfortunate candidate. In some places they were more plentiful than in others, but everywhere they existed to some extent, and he was afraid that the Attorney General was making express provisions in the interest of such individuals. If the case were one of a candidate or an agent inadvertently engaging a committee room, it would hardly be worth discussing; but what really would occur would be this—that some person would furnish an account for a committee room, which had probably never been hired at all, and then the candidate, by the threat of an action, would be induced to compromise what he believed to be a dishonest claim. He (Mr. Biggar) thought the section would produce a mischievous effect, and that it ought to be struck out.

MR. LEWIS said, that, in addition to the difficulty which had occurred to his mind a short time ago, the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), that the retention of this sub-section was likely to increase fraudulent claims, struck him as having considerable force. He was also bound to say that the criticisms of his hon. and learned Friend in regard to the difference apparent between Clause 6 and Clause 7 was perfectly well-founded. It was obvious that a distinction was drawn in preserving the rights of creditors in Clause 7, and ignoring them in Clause 6; and as it was evident that the Attorney General was not very much in love with the section, he trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman would consent to meet it.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, he thought his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would acquit him of any desire to prevent the Committee from coming to a decision upon the clause; but he could not help pointing out that this sub-section was in contradiction to the main principle and idea of the Bill. He understood that the object of the Bill was to prevent any expenses beyond reasonable expense being incurred, and thus of obviating any possibility of bribery. The point at which the Bill started was, that it was a great object for every member of a constituency to see what he could get out of the unfortunate candidate. There might be a good many dishonest creditors, and only one who was honest so far as bribery was concerned, and yet they provided nothing in the Bill to protect the right of the creditor who, when the expenditure was incurred, was ignorant that it was being incurred in violation of the Act. He thought that militated against the spirit which animated the whole of the Bill; and it would further the object of the Attorney General if he would strike out this section altogether, and place every member of every constituency in the same category of being unable to bribe anyhow.

MR. BIGGAR said, that, what the Attorney General did was this. In a subsequent part of the Bill he provided that the candidate should supply a return of his election expenses; but he would not naturally supply a return of unsettled claims. These unsettled claims would not be settled for months, or perhaps for years, and until they were it would be impossible to test the question whether the payments by the candidate had been excessive or not. He presumed it was one of the principles of the law that every person was supposed to know what the law was, and he therefore did not see why they should insert a provision giving a special favour to a person who made a dishonest and illegal claim.

MR. HICKS said, he should like to know from the Attorney General what was to be the position of a candidate in regard to a creditor who sent in a bill to him for, say, the hire of carriages. The candidate and his agent would say that they had given no such order at all. Was the person who sent in the claim entitled to recover from the candidate, he being the sitting Member at the time; and might the result of the success of the creditor's application be to deprive the sitting Member of his seat?

MR. CALLAN (who rose amid loud calls for a Division) said, that he did not intend to be put down because hon. Members were impatient. He intended to be heard, and it was such conduct as this, on the Government side of the House, that had brought about the Monaghan defeat. [Cries of "Question!"] He wanted to know from the Attorney General whether the clause would apply to expenses that were incurred in consequence of the provisions of the Act?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the clause dealt only with expenditure that went beyond the maximum election expenses. Suppose a candidate had spent, say, a sum of £500 which he was entitled to spend, and he and the election agent knew that the maximum expenditure had been incurred, then, if he afterwards went and expended more, that would be illegal expenditure; and the question was whether the creditor would be entitled to recover it. Would it be honest to say that, because the candidate had already expended the £500 he was authorized to expend, the creditor should not recover what was a perfectly legal debt? He thought there was much force in what had been said by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), and he would, therefore, consider whether a similar promise ought not to be added to Section 6 as that which was now proposed to be added to Section 7. It was quite evident that Clause 6 prohibited expenditure which would not be prohibited under the present clause, and therefore he would consider the matter, which was well worthy of attention.

[Twelfth Night.]

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought that what the Attorney General said would make matters worse rather than better. He understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to intimate that he would introduce a provision into a subsequent part of the Bill to make illegal and corrupt certain acts on the part of an elector which were previously not only unpunishable but regarded as perfectly proper.

MR. HICKS said, he had placed upon the Paper an Amendment, in line 14, to leave out the words "was ignorant of the expense being," in order to insert the words "had no means of knowing that the expense was being." He was in hopes that it would not be necessary to take up the time of the Committee by formally moving this Amendment, because he thought the Attorney General might feel disposed, if he did not altogether accept the Amendment, to introduce words of his own in order to strengthen the clause, and protect a bond fide honest candidate. In order to afford him an opportunity of doing so he would move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 14, leave out "was ignorant of the expense being," and insert "had no means of knowing that the expense was being." — (Mr. Hicks.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the hon. Member seemed to be of opinion that under the clause it might be open to a creditor to say he did not know anything about what the law was, although he might know that he was doing an illegal act. He did not think that that was the construction that would be put upon the section; but he saw no objection to making it perfectly clear, and therefore he would insert the words "in fact."

MR. HICKS: "In law or in fact?"

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, it would be only necessary to insert the words "in fact."

Amendment negatived.

Question proposed, in page 4, line 15, after the word "being," insert the words "in fact." — (The Solicitor General.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. LEWIS said, that before the Committee parted with the clause, he was anxious to draw attention to an observation which fell from the Attorney General in the early part of the discussion which he was afraid might be misunderstood. The Attorney General said he understood there was a general agreement that certain matters should be left for settlement until they reached the Schedules of the Bill; but, although the Attorney General said that a general agreement had been come to, he (Mr. Lewis) did not wish it to be supposed that he was an assenting party. On a former occasion, they had come to a decision that they could not define by legal words when an election might be said to commence, and that was the only agreement they came to on that point. When they came to deal with the Schedules, it would be necessary to provide for two or three separate things so far as the maximum of expenditure was concerned—namely, for the distinction between single and double seats, the difference between election contests which took place in double constituencies at a General Election and on the occasion of casual vacancies, and other distinctions. Then there would be a difference in the case of elections which occurred suddenly, and others which might last for four or five months. Until these various matters were settled it would be impossible to fix a maximum, and he therefore reserved everything he might have to say on that question until they came to the Schedules later on.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, that nearly every mode of expenditure that was possible was mentioned in this clause, and the cost of the next General Election would be a very heavy one, because the Bill would be very little understood, and there would be numerous actions brought against outsiders immediately after the election. It would be absolutely necessary that on such occasions the candidate should be represented at the trial in order to see that he was not inculpated by the charges that were brought against other persons. That would entail a heavy expense, and it was most likely that actions would be brought in order to see whether anything might turn up which could possibly void the election. It would be just as well to know before the Bill passed, whether expenses incurred in that way would be included in the maximum authorized expenditure?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had already stated that such expenditure would not be included.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, the hon. and learned Gentleman had answered the question in regard to another case altogether.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 8 (Procurement of voting by unqualified voters to be illegal practice).

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the clause stated that if any person induced or procured any person to vote at an election whom at the time he knew to be prohibited from voting, he should be guilty of an illegal practice. He wanted to know what the Attorney General meant by the use of the word "prohibited," because the register, of course, would have been made up, and that would give the names of the voters who were legally entitled to vote? In the Bill, as it was originally drawn, other words were used—namely, "whom at the time he knew to be disqualified;" and he noticed that in the marginal note attached to the clause the word was "unqualified," and not "prohibited." In order to prevent any confusion he wished to ask the Attorney General what was meant by the word "prohibited?" Was it intended that the register should not be conclusive? What was the meaning of the word "prohibited," and in what sense did it differ from the old word "disqualified," which appeared in the former Bill? In order to raise the question in a regular manner, he would move, as a matter of form, to insert, after the word "prohibited," the words "though on the register."

Amendment proposed, in line 17, after the word "prohibited," insert the words "though on the register."—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there were persons whose names appeared on the register who were not entitled to vote, such as policemen and others, who were prohibited from voting by Statute. The clause applied to any person who was not entitled to vote. The names of such persons were not struck off the register, but the persons themselves were prohibited by Statute from voting.

MR. LEWIS said, he was not quite sure whether he was right or not; but, speaking from recollection, he believed that a person who removed from a borough and lost his occupation franchise could vote, although prohibited.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that was a matter which applied only to the qualification. He would take care that the point which had been raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) should be duly considered.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he thought it was rather a strong thing to say that a man who became a policeman, and whose name was on the register, was guilty of an illegal practice if he voted. He might have become a policeman since his name appeared on the register, and it was rather a strong thing indeed to put him under penalties for committing an illegal practice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had already promised to look carefully into the matter. His only desire was to see the law carried out as simply as possible.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he presumed that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not mean to take the case of a man who had had a qualification, and had parted with it. Such a man would have a right to vote, although his name might be struck out on a scrutiny. He would not press the Amendment further.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GORST moved, in page 4, line 18, after the word "election" to insert

[Twelfth Night.]

"or being a candidate engages in a house-to-house canvass." He proposed this Amendment in order to test the sincerity of the Committee, and particularly the sincerity of hon. Members sitting opposite. Nothing had been more strongly denounced than the practice of canvassing from house to house. The Bill did put a stop to one kind of canvassing—namely, paid canvassing; but that was not enough for some people, who were of opinion that they ought to put a stop to canvassing of every description. This Amendment was intended to put a stop to a plan of canvassing which he thought was very degrading, and which he believed it would be very easy to put a stop to—namely, the personal house-to-house canvass, which the candidate and others, to their extreme disgust, had to go through. He objected to this house-to-house canvass, first of all, because it had a bad moral effect. It made the electors believe that the persons who asked them for their suffrages were going to do them a service instead of undertaking a duty; and it led the electors to consider that they were conferring a favour by voting for the candidate at the election, instead of discharging, as they ought to discharge, an important public function. He believed that the vast majority of the constituents did not like it. He was not qualified to speak about the feelings of the working classes, and he was sorry that the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) was not in his place, in order that he might tell the Committee what the feeling of the working men was upon the matter. As far as his own experience went, he believed the working man in the constituencies did not like the intrusion of a number of persons into their houses at a time, perhaps, when they were having their meals, or at a time when they were not prepared to receive visitors. He only knew that he had been told constantly by the working men he had canvassed that they were very sorry such a practice existed, and that they did not like it, and that it ought to be put a stop to. [Cries of "No!"] There might be a difference of opinion about it among hon. Members; but his own opinion was, that the constituencies did not like the practice. Then, again, he thought it was somewhat degrading to the candidate himself. It did no good. A man could not discuss political questions in the houses at which he called. He had no time for doing so. [Mr. Onslow dissented.] The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) represented a small borough; but if he represented a constituency that was reasonably large the hon. Member would not find time to discuss political questions in a house-to-house canvass. All that he could really do was to shake hands with the voter and ask how he was going to vote, which was really an infringement of the Ballot Act; and in many instances, when they asked a man how he was going to vote, his answer was that, as there was the ballot, he should please himself, and would not give any answer at all. The worst evil in this house-to-house canvassing was that it imposed upon the candidate agents he knew nothing about. It was all very well for the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) and the right hon. Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), who were in no extreme danger, to say that it limited the expenditure. If those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen embarked in a house-to-house canvass in a large borough, they would soon find themselves associated with agents of whom they knew nothing, and whom they would be very glad to get rid of, if they could only know their character. What happened was this. Persons of this description joined the canvassing party, and followed the candidates about through the streets, introducing them to the electors, knocking at the doors for them, and taking part in that way in the house-to-house canvass. Then, if a Petition were presented, the candidate found it extremely difficult to induce an Election Judge afterwards to believe that a person so intimately associated with the candidate in his election canvass was not an agent. Then he did not see why, if this house-to-house canvassing was so disadvantageous to the candidates in the constituencies, it should not be prohibited by law, and why they should not trust to the natural operation of the law to put an end to it. It was one of those things which could not be abstained from unless everybody abstained; but he believed that it was one of those things which every candidate would be glad to dispense with. [Cries of "No!"] He was satisfied that the generality of candidates at elections would be very glad to dispense with house-to-house canvassing, but they could not do it unless everybody did it. Although there might be two or three hon. Members who liked house-to-house canvassing, generally speaking it would be acceptable both to the constituents and the candidates if the law forbade the continuance of the practice. Then, some people said—"How do you define house-to-house canvassing? Are you to forbid a candidate from calling upon his constituents?" His answer to that was "No;" but he thought there would be no difficulty in expressing in words what house-to-house canvassing meant, and there would be certainly no difficulty when they came before an Election Judge in showing whether a candidate had been engaged in a house-to-house canvass or not. It would be perfectly easy to show where the candidate had crossed the line, and began the practice of house-to-house canvassing. It was entirely a matter for the candidate himself, in which he would be the sole judge, and it would be entirely within his own control. No one would have the slightest difficulty in refraining from following the practice, and if he did not abstain from it he would know that he was committing an offence against the law. He proposed in the clause to define what the illegal practice was, and to add that the candidate should be guilty of an illegal practice if he engaged in a house-to-house canvass. He hoped that all hon. Members of the Committee who disapproved of canvassing in general, and of house-to-house canvassing in particular, would support the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 18, after "election," insert "or being a candidate engaged in a house-to-house canvass."—(Mr. Gorst.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, his hon. and learned Friend had announced that anybody who opposed the Amendment must be insincere. Therefore, as he (Lord Randolph Churchill) opposed the Amendment, he must unfortunately be insincere. At any rate, he was sincere in his insincerity, because, in his opinion, the Amendment would produce a disastrous effect. Certainly he could not be returned for Woodstock if his hon. and learned Friend's Amendment were carried. In small boroughs—and until steps were taken to abolish them small boroughs must continue—it was absolutely necessary for the candidate to enter upon a house-to-house canvass. The electors knew that it was in the power of the candidate to call upon them, and they expected him to do so. His hon. and learned Friend said there was no time for entering into political arguments with a man in his own house. That might apply to a very large constituency; but he had often engaged in long political arguments with the electors of Woodstock, generally with the happiest results. On several occasions he had known an elector to say—and, no doubt, it had occurred to others—on asking him towards the end of the canvass whether he intended to vote for him—"I will vote for you now; but I would not have voted for you if you had not taken the trouble to come and ask me." He imagined that the same thing was very common in the country elections among the farmers. When he talked of house-to-house canvassing, his hon. and learned Friend must recollect that he was applying the clause to counties as well as to boroughs. In a large borough the candidate might have to go up one side of the street and down the other, and a house-to-house canvass would involve an enormous number of visits. But in a county election the only way in which a candidate could meet the farmers was to call upon them at their own houses. He might meet some of them sometimes at an "ordinary;" but, as a rule, the farmers did not attend public meetings, and if the county Member did not call upon them he would frequently find that he would lose their votes. Therefore, although the Amendment was good enough in theory, until the President of the Board of Trade's ideas had attained full development, and they had nothing but enormous constituencies with paid Members, and equal electoral districts, it would be ridiculous to accept an Amendment of this kind. It was impossible to define what house-to-house canvassing was; and if the principle were carried out in all its rigour, it would undoubtedly lead to a great many Members who, like himself, had the honour of sitting for a small borough, being placed in a false position.

[Twelfth Night.]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the Committee would come to a decision on this point at once. He sympathized with the views of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), but was unable to see how they could be carried into practical effect. The question of house-to-house canvassing had been discussed over and over again, and it had been proved to be a most pernicious practice. It did not exist to any great extent in large constituencies, because there the candidates had not time for it; but, unfortunately, it existed largely in small constituencies, and had been shown to be very humiliating to the candidates, who would in many cases be very glad to avoid the process if they could. If it was allowed to continue, however, it would, of course, be used; and if it were prohibited, the prohibition could, as it seemed to him, be evaded in a variety of ways. For instance, it was only necessary to canvass the doubtful voters, of whom there might only be 10 out of 40, in a street; and what was to prevent those 10 being gathered together in one house where they could be met by the candidate?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL remarked, that such a proceeding would constitute a public meeting.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) was of opinion that those voters might be got together in such a way as not to constitute their assembling into a public meeting; and, even if it were not so, what was to prevent the brother of a candidate from carrying on a house-to-house canvass on his behalf, or from asking doubtful voters to see him at his house or hotel with a view to their conversion? He could not see anything more dangerous than the Amendment which had been moved, and therefore he could not accept it, although he would gladly see the practice of canvassing done away with.

MR. MONK said, he regretted that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General was not able to accept the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), because he was sure that the system of canvassing now carried on in small boroughs was not only humiliating to the candidates, but objectionable to the constituents. His view was that the only way in which a borough or county ought to be canvassed was by public meetings, where candidates could be questioned on all political subjects in which their constituents were interested.

MR. ONSLOW said, that though the Attorney General had said, 'and the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) had confirmed his view, that house-to-house canvassing was humiliating, he could not hold that opinion. He had had a great deal of it in the course of his political life, and he hoped to have a great deal more of it. His constituents felt proud that he had done them and himself the honour of canvassing them. He was sorry that any Gentleman sitting on that side of the House and calling himself a Conservative should have brought forward an Amendment of this kind. He should not have been surprised if the Amendment had been proposed by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere); but he was certainly surprised that it should have come from the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst).

MR. BROADHURST said, his experience was entirely opposed to that of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow). His opinion was that an overwhelming majority of voters in the various constituencies objected to being personally bored by either candidates or other persons who might wish to know how they were going to vote. His opinion was that there should be a complete and absolute prohibition of canvassing for votes, and therefore it was he thought the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham did not go far enough. What was wanted was that persons other than candidates should be prohibited from canvassing. In the larger constituencies it had become impossible for a man who sought a seat in Parliament to canvass the whole of the voters, and if he was a poor man he stood at a great disadvantage as compared with the rich man, who could afford to employ an army of paid canvassers to do the work for him.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst), who had just sat down, in his objection to the employment of paid canvassers; but he could not see any reason why candidates should not be allowed to canvass personally. He had an experience of the kind in the borough of Preston, in the year 1857; and his opinion, based upon that experience was that a large number of the electors were delighted to see him, and to have from him visd voce an explanation of his political opinions with special reference to particular questions. The paid canvasser being a person of the past, the difficulty was to define what canvassing really was; and this difficulty was one which he thought was insuperable, without subjecting candidates to traps and pitfalls into which, without the least guilty intention, they must inevitably fall. He thought the hon. and learned Attorney General had shown clearly that it would not be possible to carry out the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham, and he hoped no Division would be taken upon it.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) that the condition of things, when the electors of Preston were delighted to be personally canvassed by him in 1857, was very different from that which existed at the present time. He did not think the condition of things at the present time would be met by the Amendment which had been proposed. It would not be possible, for instance, for any candidate to canvass a constituency as large as that which he had the honour to represent. But, at the same time, this canvassing business was at the root of electoral corruption; and as the Amendment which had been proposed would deal with it to some extent he should support it by his vote.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he believed the working classes in the constituencies were in favour of canvassing. He had the honour of sitting for a constituency largely composed of the wage-earning class, and he did not think his constituents regarded canvassing as being either pernicious or humiliating, as had been suggested by the Attorney General. He had sat for the borough of Taunton, now represented by the Attorney General, and he ventured to say that no one could sit for that constituency without canvassing. As far as the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) was concerned, he denied that that Gentleman represented the working classes. That Gentleman represented a number of organizations which lived upon the working classes, and which, in the case of the hon. Member, as also in the case of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen), took the place of canvassers, and were to be maintained; while canvassing, which they believed would tend to the success of Conservative candidates, was to be abolished.

MR. LEWIS said, he was of opinion that the hon. and learned Gentleman who had moved the Amendment could not have had any view other than a wish to test the sincerity of hon. Members sitting opposite, for it was not possible to imagine anything more inconsequential. House-to-house canvassing was precisely the same in one street as in another. Suppose there were 300 working men at a meeting. Was the candidate to go down and shake hands, without saying a word to them about the election about to take place? There were persons who, for 25 years, had been endeavouring to bring about that state of things; they wanted the candidate to do no more than stand on the platform, which was very disagreeable to some persons. He confessed that the canvassing he had had to do in the three contests in which he had been engaged was the best means by which he could obtain a personal knowledge of his constituents. So far from having found that at all humiliating, his experience was quite to the contrary. When he knew that a person was not in favour of his candidature he did not take the trouble to call on him; he went to persons who were favourably disposed towards him; and he thought it quite right to visit his constituents in that way, because it had often been said to him—"That which is not worth asking for is not worth having, and if you don't take the trouble to come to my door I shall not take the trouble to go to the poll." It seemed to him that the idea in the minds of some hon. Members was that election day should be kept as a day of mourning. He did not suppose anyone wished to go back to the old Carnival days; but he certainly hoped the Bill would not be allowed to pass without some little liberty being allowed to the electors and the candidate. For his own part, he thought that to prevent the candidate seeing the voters, and the voters seeing the candidate, was simply absurd; and although a house-to-house canvass might be impossible in some constituencies, still, so long as it was possible in others, he regarded it as a proper practice, and one that ought to be continued.

MR. CALLAN said, if he could support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) he should feel it his duty to move to add, after the word "canvass," the words "or if a candidate visits his constituents during an election." But he hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General would set his face altogether against these little Amendments, and endeavour to pass the Bill with as little delay as possible. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham said that canvassing led the electors to think they were conferring a favour on the candidate. He looked upon it as conferring a very high favour indeed; his recollection of one election was that it was a picnic from beginning to end. He could see nothing humiliating or degrading in canvassing, although he was not surprised that the hon. and learned Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James) and the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) looked at it in that light.

MR. BIGGAR said, that he did not think the Amendment was required, because in large constituencies it was certainly impossible for a candidate, without the assistance of volunteers, to canvass from house-to-house. Again, it would be impossible to canvass a county in this way; but in a small borough, as the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) had pointed out, canvassing was one of the most certain ways of winning an election. There were, in every constituency, numbers of persons who would not take any trouble about the election; and his own custom was to call, not on the friendly electors alone, as the hon. Member for Londonderry did, but upon every elector, whether favourable or unfavourable; and it very often happened that he was able to convince an unfavourable elector and win him over to his own side. Looking at the maximum expense allowed in the Bill, it was absolutely impossible to have a personal canvass in large constituencies, and with regard to them the practice must entirely disappear.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he proposed to move an Amendment, making it an illegal practice for an agent or any other person, with the approval of the candidate or his committee, or an Association taking part in the election to visit houses or send circulars with the view of asking persons how they intended to vote. He understood the Attorney General had, on the last Amendment, made a speech practically in favour of this proposal. He did not know whether he was going to accept it; but, if so, he would not say another word in support of it. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) signified dissent.] Then he must appeal to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope), who was apparently leading the Conservative Party, to use his influence with the Attorney General. Members on those Benches had no influence with the hon. and learned Gentleman—he wished they had—but Gentlemen opposite had very great influence with him, and he wished they would, as arbiters of the destinies of the Members of that House, take this excellent Amendment into consideration, and ask the Attorney General to agree to it. The object of his Amendment was not to prevent A. and B. asking C. and D. how they were going to vote, but to put an end to the system of canvassing which now existed. The Committee had done away with paid canvassers; but there would be a whole herd of amateurs on both sides who would do the work. These people, under the present system, unless the practice was put an end to, would take each of them a certain number of streets, visit every house, and write down in their books how the electors were going to vote. He thought that a bad system, and he believed it was also a bad system in the opinion of the Attorney General.

Amendment proposed,

In page 4, line 19, at end, add "any candidate, or any agent of a candidate, or any other person with the approval of, or under the instructions of, or under the supervision of the candidate, or of his election agent, or of his committee, or of any association taking part in the election, visiting houses, or a place or places of business, or sending a letter or a circular, for the purpose of asking any voters how they intended to vote, or whether they intend to vote for or against any particular candidate or candidates, shall be guilty of an illegal practice."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he certainly agreed that the practice of canvassing was disliked; but then there were many evils in this world which were disliked, and which, as they could not be got rid of, must be endured. The result of the first part of the hon. Member's Amendment, if it were adopted, would be to make it an illegal practice for anyone to go to a neighbour's house and say—"I hope you will vote for Mr. So-and-so;" while the latter part of it seemed to him unfair, inasmuch as it put the penalty on the wrong man. It was true that the object of the Bill was to keep corruption away from the constituencies; but they must proceed on the assumption that the candidate was a pure-minded man. He hoped he might appeal to hon. Members not to discuss any further this Amendment, which the Government were unable to accept.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he should not have risen but for the direct appeal made to him by the hon. Member for Northampton. If he could approve the principle of the Amendment, he should still think that it was expressed in an unfair and impracticable way; and, therefore, he hoped the hon. Member would not consider it necessary to press it.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he also considered the proposal impracticable as against the candidate himself, and hoped the hon. Member would not divide the Committee upon it.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he would like to know why it was more wrong to canvass at a Parliamentary Election than at any other election? A man who wanted a place, or advancement of any kind, had to canvass, and those who did so stood a better chance of getting what they wanted than those who did not. He was quite at a loss to see what reason there was for making a distinction as against Parliamentary canvassing. In the event of the Amendment being carried, which, however, he very much doubted, he intended to propose an Amendment to it, because he considered that the Bill did not go to the true source of corruption—namely, the corruption of the candidate himself, for the purpose of catching votes. It very often happened that Sunday closers and such like people would come to a candidate in large numbers, and exercise such influence upon him, that he would completely give up his own opinion. He should propose, if the Amendment were carried, to insert after the words, "shall be guilty of an illegal practice," the following words:—

"Any elector canvassing a Parliamentary candidate, or writing a letter or circular to any Parliamentary candidate for the purpose of asking such Parliamentary candidate how he intends to vote in Parliament, shall be guilty of an illegal practice."

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, the object of the Amendment was really to carry out the views of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck)—namely, to prevent candidates being pestered by people from the Contagious Diseases Acts Association and others, canvassing the candidates in the interest of their particular Associations. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) had, therefore, a clear right to ask the support of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven. He (Mr. J. Cowen) should vote against the Amendment; but, in the event of the Amendment being carried, he should then propose the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 8; Noes 69: Majority 61.—(Div. List, No. 159.)

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that in the absence of his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) he should propose an Amendment which stood in his name. It was to add at the end of line 19—

"And any person, who before, during, or after an election, by poster, placard, cartoon, caricature, or other publication, knowingly publishes any false charge of or against a candidate, or any false statement of the withdrawal of the candidate, in order to influence such election, shall be guilty of an illegal practice."

THE CHAIRMAN: I have considered this proposition of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, and I am of opinion it is not in Order here. It has no relevancy to this clause, which provides that the procurement of voting by unqualified voters is an illegal practice. The Amendment might be introduced at some later time; but it is clearly out of Order here.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, it seemed to him that, if he might venture to say so, it was as much in Order as the last Amendment. The last Amendment did not refer in the smallest degree to the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: The last Amendment, in my opinion, referred to the clause distinctly. It referred to the question of canvassing, to which the clause referred. The clause referred to the candidature, and the Amendment also referred to the candidature. But this Amendment related to cartoons and caricatures, with which the clause does not deal in any degree.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) admitted that the subject dealt with by the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin was one of great importance, and suggested that if the right hon. and learned Gentleman thought fit it would be better to bring it up as a new clause.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 9 (Punishment on conviction of illegal practice).

MR. J. HOLLOND moved, in page 4, line 22, to leave out "five," and insert "seven." His object was to extend the disqualification over the next Election. If a Parliament lived for six years the electors who had been disqualified for illegal practices at the one Election would be able to vote at the next Election, if the clause remained unaltered. His object was to stop that. It would be for the interest of each political Party to take care that those illegal practices were not committed, because they would then lose the votes of the persons committing the illegal practices. He was aware there was great objection to any proposition which would increase the penalties of the Bill; and he would, personally, rather trust to the disqualification of the electors, and the disadvantages it would mean to the political Party to which they belonged, than to any punishment or fine.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 22, leave out "five," and insert "seven."—(Mr. J. Hollond.)

The Chairman

Question proposed, "That the word 'five' stand part of the Clause."

COLONEL NOLAN said, the Bill was extremely severe as it now stood, and he had steadily voted against all the punishments in the Bill; and he certainly should strongly oppose any increase of the penalties.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not press the Amendment. He had otherwise endeavoured to meet the wishes of the Committee, and it seemed that those views ran rather in the direction of leniency than of severity.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) then moved to leave out in line 24, "in the United Kingdom," and in line 26, after "Act," insert—

"Hold for and within the county or borough within which the illegal practices have been committed."

According to the original words of the clause, the disability, in regard to voting, would have extended to any election in the United Kingdom. The object of that Amendment was that if the man went to any new place he should go with a new character.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, line 24, leave out "in the United Kingdom."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment proposed,

Motion made, and Question, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

Clause 10 (Report of election court respecting illegal practice, and punishment of candidate found guilty by such report).

MR. BIGGAR said, it seemed to him that the penalties in respect of the illegal practices were too severe. He did not consider that the person guilty simply of illegal practices should be excluded from a particular constituency for his life, or kept out of Parliament for a large number of years. The punishment was altogether too severe, and he, therefore, moved to leave out from the commencement of line 41 to the end of the clause.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think that the Amendment can be put, because the hon. Gentleman proposes to leave out the enacting part of the clause. The proper thing would be to reject the clause altogether.

MR. LEWIS said, he thought it would be better to dispose of some of the later clauses first. Until the mind of the Committee had been ascertained upon Clauses 12, 13, 14, and 15, it seemed they were not in a condition to say what would be the proper mode of dealing with the Penalty Clause. It would be far better, in his opinion, for them to deal with the corpus of the offence, before they began to deal with the punishment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, if they were to postpone the clause they would have to take it up at the end of the Bill. He might mention that he should subsequently ask to mitigate the penalty in the clause by striking out the word "ever," and he trusted by doing that he should meet the objections of hon. Gentlemen.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, they now came to a very important question. It certainly did seem to many of them very hard indeed that a candidate should be liable to the penalties under the clause, if he had been guilty by his agents of an illegal practice; and, therefore, his right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) proposed that in the Preamble, and also in the enacting part of the 2nd subsection, they should provide some mitigation of the penalty. As his right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), in whose name the Amendment stood, had now entered the House, he would content himself with simply moving the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 9, leave out "agents," and insert "election agent."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'agents' stand part of the Clause."

2 THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) appealed to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) not to press that Amendment. In respect to corrupt practices it always had been the rule that the candidate should be liable for the acts of his agents. Illegal practices were, no doubt, offences of a meaner description; but it was none the less desirable to put a stop to them. It was clear that under the Amendment a man might spend thousands of pounds, and yet the candidate might not lose his seat. Such a thing could not be desired by the hon. Gentleman.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had very properly pointed out that this, if left alone, would open the door to a great amount of expenditure by other agents. That was not his wish. The object that he had in putting down this Amendment was not to increase expenditure by agents other than the election agents, but really to mitigate the severe penalty which appeared in page 5. Now, he understood that the hon. and learned Gentleman was quite willing to alter this severe penalty by the omission of the word "ever." That, of course, removed his (Sir R. Assheton Cross's) objection to this point; and the whole object of his Amendment was secured. He should be quite willing to withdraw the Amendment.

CAPTAIN AYLMER asked the Attorney General if he would kindly state what were the Amendments he intended to propose?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he should, at the proper time, propose to strike out the word "ever," in line 16, page 5, and after the word "borough," in line 18, to insert "except for seven years."

COLONEL NOLAN said, that before the Amendment was withdrawn, if the clause was to remain as severe as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General proposed to leave it, it was right to limit the action of the clause in other ways. The general effect of the clause was to raise up, in point of punishment, illegal practice to what formerly was the punishment for corrupt practices. If illegal practices were to be as heavily punished as corrupt practices hitherto had been, the law would be very severe indeed. Formerly there was a penalty of £5 or £10 for an illegal practice; but now the offence was to be punished much more severely. He thought it would be very

at some later time; but it is clearly out of Order here.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, it seemed to him that, if he might venture to say so, it was as much in Order as the last Amendment. The last Amendment did not refer in the smallest degree to the clause.

wise to limit the action of the clause simply to electioneering agents. The clause ought to be closely watched, and every effort made to reduce the punishment very much below what the Attorney General desired. An illegal practice ought to be considered an election offence of a much meaner character. That was certainly the state of the law at the present moment.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he had an Amendment which was not on the Paper, and which proposed, after "illegal practice," in line 10, page 5, to insert the words "specified in this Act." His reason for making this proposal was that there were several illegal practices not specified in the Act—such as the wearing of colours. Many illegal practices were specified in the Act, such as the hiring of carriages and conveyances; and it might be right to consider whether these illegal practices were deserving of heavier punishment. But there were also practices, although they could not be called justifiable, to which the severe punishment of the Bill should not be applied; and in respect of which, unless his Amendment were accepted, such punishment might be meted out. It might be a wrong thing to wear Party colours. In Ireland they did not offend very much in this respect, for the reason that they principally wore the green, and that it had been laid down by the Judges that that was not a Party colour. But where Party colours were worn, and it was considered wrong, it surely would be too much to visit such offence with the full penalties of this Bill. If illegal practices were extended to such minor offences as these it would be well to qualify the punishment; but he should prefer amending the clause in the manner he proposed, so as to confine these offences to acts specified in the Bill.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 10, after the word "practice," to insert the words "specified in this Act."—(Colonel Nolan.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he should like to ask a question of the Attorney General upon this subject. The full effect of Clause 10 could not be understood without reading clauses from 12 to 16, because, owing to the manner in which the measure was drawn, though apparently there was a gradation of offence, yet, when they came to punishment, they found there was no such gradation in that part of the Bill. Take, for instance, the case the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Nolan) had just quoted, that of wearing colours. Flags, banners, cockades, or ribbons, or other marks of distinction, were not allowed; and no doubt it was true, as had been stated by the Attorney General, that no offence would be committed unless the acts were done by the candidate or his election agent; but there were minor acts of the same character which might be committed very innocently, and it would appear that the same punishment should not be visited in all cases. He should like to know how they stood with regard to Clause 16, because it would be quite possible for some indiscreet enthusiastic supporter, or supporters, to obtain ribbons and wear them as marks of distinction. Under Clause 16, what might happen? Why, this might happen—a candidate might be going about the county or the borough, and might meet these gentlemen decorated in the way suggested, or they might be in the room in which he was speaking, or at dinner, and such candidate might be brought within the powers of Clause 16, Sub-section 2 of which said—

"A candidate or an election agent of a candidate who is guilty of the offence of illegal payment, employment, or hiring, or who aids or abets, or confirms by the payment of money, or in any other manner any such offence shall be guilty of an illegal practice."

It was clear to his mind that the words "aids or abets" or "in any other manner" would render the candidate liable if he came into a company of gentlemen decorated with Party colours. What he was anxious to do was to induce the Committee to take every care not to catch the candidate by some such words as these, and bring down upon him penalties for an offence of which he might be altogether innocent. So long as human nature was human nature, whatever Act of Parliament they passed they would never get a great many people to put aside such a thing as the wearing of a candidate's colours during an election. He wished the Committee to take care not to find a candidate "aiding or abetting," because he might happen to be on a platform with a number of people decorated with his colours, or because he might be dining in the same room with them. Unless this Amendment were adopted, or something were done in the line he was indicating, it would be the easiest thing in the world to bring in a candidate guilty of corrupt practices, and punish him by depriving him of the power of representing the borough in which he mixed with people wearing colours for seven years. He was aware that the Attorney General did not intend to inflict this heavy punishment upon a candidate for such a slight inadvertence; but the clause should be made as clear as possible, so as to prevent the possibility of difficulties arising in the future.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the clause would not go the extent the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) seemed to fear; and all he (the Attorney General) wished to do was to provide that the candidate should not "aid or abet" in the spending of money upon these things mentioned in the clause. He was anxious to meet the right hon. Gentleman as far as he possibly could, and he would promise to look into the matter to see how the right hon. Gentleman's view might be best carried out. He should be ready to consent to an Amendment in the spirit of that of the hon. and gallant Member (Colonel Nolan); and he would, therefore, propose that the words "within the meaning of this Act" should be inserted. That would have the effect of shutting out all illegal practices which were not specified or defined.

COLONEL NOLAN said, he would be happy to withdraw the Amendment in favour of the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General), if he would move the words he had suggested in the form of an Amendment. He should like to see these words in the Bill before the Report stage, so that he might find out whether the alteration exactly carried out his wishes or not. He would, therefore, ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James), Amendment made, in page 5, line 10, after the word "practice," by inserting "within the meaning of this Act."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would now propose an Amendment in Sub-section (a) which he thought would meet the objections of hon. Members. Instead of providing that a candidate should be incapable of "ever" being elected for the said county or borough, or of being elected to or sitting in the House of Commons for which the election was held, the Amendment would make him ineligible to sit for the county or borough in respect of which the election was held for the seven years next after the date of the Report.

Question proposed, "That the word 'ever' stand part of the Clause."

MR. RAIKES said, he was glad to find that the Attorney General had substantially accepted his Amendment, and there was now nothing between them except that he would have proposed that a candidate when reported should be excluded from that Parliament; whereas the Attorney General proposed that he should be excluded for seven years. That, however, was not a point upon which he should think it necessary to go to a Division. He was glad that the Attorney General had been so willing to meet the Committee with respect to this matter; and having regard to what the hon. and learned Gentleman had said as to a subsequent Amendment he should not now move his Amendment. He thought the Committee might congratulate themselves on a more conciliatory spirit being shown by the hon. and learned Gentleman than had previously been the case.

MR. LEWIS said, he was also glad to see this better spirit, and would say nothing further about the matter, though he still thought the punishment was too severe.

Question put, and negatived.

On the Motion of The ATTORNEY GENERAL, Amendment made in page 5, line 18, after the word "borough," by inserting "during the seven years next after the date of the Report"; also in page 5, line 18, after the word "report," by leaving out all the words to the word "held," inclusive, in line 20.

MR. LEWIS said, he thought, after what had been done in line 18, some Amendment was required in Sub-section

[Twelfth Night.]

(b); otherwise the two sections might be considered in conflict, and there was no knowing what the Judge might do.

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 24, leave out Sub-section (b.)—(Mr. Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (b) stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if the hon. Member would point out what Amendment he thought necessary, he would consider it; but the sub-section made a candidate liable for any illegal act or practice by his agent. They were bound to prevent lawless expenditure, and, although he had given the most elastic clause he could, he must adhere to the clause as it stood.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to strike out Sub-section (b); but his objections had been met by the alterations now made in the Bill. He should, therefore, not move his Amendment.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he thought the punishments too severe, and calculated to defeat their object; but the manner in which the Attorney General had dealt with the point had met the objections, and if they were to put down illegal practices he did not see how they could omit this sub-section. Bearing in mind the way in which the Equity Clause was drawn, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 11 (Extension of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 57, respecting election commissioners and illegal practices).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he wished to amend this clause. As the clause was drawn, it enabled a Commission to be sent down; and his impression was, that after that had been done the Commissioners should inquire into corrupt and illegal practices as defined by this Act and the Election Commissioners Act. He had an Amendment to that effect.

MR. RAIKES asked what the Amendment was?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that was a matter of drafting.

Mr. Lewis

Amendment proposed, in page 5, line 4, at end, to insert, "when the election commissioners have been appointed in pursuance of the Act."—(The Attorney General.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of The ATTORNEY GENERAL, Amendment made, in page 5, line 5, by omitting from "same" down to "and be" in line 8; also in page 5, by inserting—

"They may make inquiry and hand in their report as if 'corrupt practices' in the said Act included 'illegal practices.'"

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Illegal Payment, Employment, or Hiring.

Clause 12 (Providing of money for illegal practice or payment to be illegal payment) agreed to.

Clause 13 (Certain expenditure to be illegal payment).

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 20, after "procuring," insert "or opposing."—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there was no necessity for these words, as "opposing" an election was already covered by the provision respecting "procuring" an election.

MR. RAIKES said, he hoped that before Report the Attorney General would consider whether it was possible to insert these words, because there were many persons who went down to boroughs at election times rather to make themselves disagreeable to particular candidates than to secure the election of particular candidates; and it would be rather difficult to fix them with any responsibility for securing an election. They might go down with their cartoons and placards; and he hoped the Attorney General would insert the words "or opposing," in order to deal with those people.

MR. GORST said, he thought that if any person exhibited cartoons he would be held in law to be procuring the election of a candidate's rival.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that was exactly his view, and the matter was not worth a moment's consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he proposed to insert the word "or," in line 21, after "flags," in order to prepare the way for striking out the subsequent words "cockades and ribbons." If the words stood as they were, it was clear that if candidates took down their wives during elections they would buy ribbons of some sort, and yet be made liable for an offence. He did not think anything could be more innocent than buying ribbon to support candidates, or carrying small flags.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 21, after the word "flags," to insert "or."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'or' be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the object was to prevent frivolous expense. At Sandwich about £2,000 were spent on banners and flags. That was an objectionable practice, and ought not to be allowed. By the Act of 1854 candidates were prohibited from providing any of these distinctive marks. Their object was to promote or procure an election, and there must be systematic expense in that respect. The aim of the clause was to prevent large expenditure in covering places with ribbons and colours, and he did not think this provision would cause any harm. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not press his Amendment.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS hoped the Attorney General would give up "ribbons."

MR. GORST said, that at present candidates and agents were prohibited from paying money for these things, and the only effect of the clause would be to put other people on the same footing. If the Amendment were accepted, while candidates would be tied down, other people might come in and do what candidates and agents might not do. Those dreadful people from the Birmingham Caucus might come in and provide cockades and marks of distinction which the candidate might not provide. This expenditure was perfectly useless, and it was better to prohibit it by anybody.

MR. RAIKES said, he was very much inclined to agree with the Attorney General, and he thought his hon. Friend had gone too far in proposing to take flags and banners out of the clause, because they frequently led to riots, in consequence of rival factions rallying round flags. He was glad the Attorney General intended to stand by flags and banners; but hoped he would not take the same course with regard to ribbons and cockades. There could be no objection to cockades and ribbons, though a candidate must not supply them. The agents of the Birmingham Caucus looked very much to business, and he did not think they spent their money on cockades and ribbons. They were not likely to corrupt constituencies by any such things as those; but many innocent people, taking an interest in elections, adopted the wearing of ribbons and cockades to show who their candidate was. He hoped that while sticking to flags and banners the Attorney General would give up cockades and ribbons.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that after what had fallen from hon. Members he was prepared to withdraw his Amendment; but hon. Members seemed to forget that the prohibition referred to was more honoured in the breach than in the observance of it.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked who was to pay for cockades, if candidates and agents were prohibited from wearing them? Was a man's wife or daughter to be considered an agent if she wore one?

MR. GRANTHAM said, there must be some payment allowed for things which were marks of distinction, because even coloured canvass and polling cards were marks of distinction. Some explanation should be given of the term, or great confusion would arise.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it no doubt seemed a very small matter as to whether cockades and ribbons were put a stop to or not; but what it was sought to prevent was not the wearing of colours, but the corrupt payment for them, as at Sandwich, on an extensive scale.

MR. LEWIS said, when he considered that the members of one's family might lay out some money in cockades and ribbons, or other distinguishing marks, it seemed to him there was something in the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman which proposed to place an act of the kind outside the penalties of the Bill.

MR. ONSLOW said, the Attorney General had stated that these words had nothing much in them. But he reminded the Committee that there was now a Blue Ribbon Army and a Red Ribbon Army. If some enthusiastic individual were to supply a large amount of blue ribbon, and another were to supply red ribbon, for the purpose of decorating children, it would, no doubt, have an effect upon the election. Hon. Members knew that these colours were very prominent marks of distinction; and he thought the words "or other marks of distinction" ought to be in the clause, because they would include blue and red ribbon decorations. He was convinced that this question would be of very considerable importance at the next General Election.

Question put, "That the word 'or' be there inserted."

THE CHAIRMAN: I think the Ayes have it. ["No, no!"]

Question again put.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Ayes have it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had distinctly challenged a Division.

THE CHAIRMAN thereupon directed a Division to be taken.

MR. SYDNEY HERBERT (seated with head covered) said, he wished to speak to a point of Order. He wished to ask the Chairman whether he had not distinctly declared that the Ayes had it; and, if so, whether the Committee were not bound by that ruling?

THE CHAIRMAN: I gave my decision through a mistake, not having heard any challenge.

The Committee divided: — Ayes 35; Noes 92: Majority 57. — (Div. List, No. 160.)

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he rose to move that Progress be reported. He did so on this ground. The Chairman's decision that the "Ayes" had it having been challenged, the House was cleared for a Division; but, on the Question being put a second time, there was no challenge, and then the Chairman gave his final ruling, and declared that the "Ayes" had it. It was not until after that decision was given that the Government again persisted in raising the question, and a Division was taken. That was a proceeding wholly inconsistent with the usual practice of the House in Committee, according to which, when the Chairman gave his ruling, the matter was at an end. Of course, it was quite open to the Government to raise the question again on Report; but, in order to decide upon the Order of the present proceeding, he begged to move that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." — (Mr. R. N. Fowler.)

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE begged to assure the hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler) that he (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was sitting by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General at the time, and he had heard his hon. and learned Friend distinctly challenge the decision of the Chairman several times.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House did not dispute the statement of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir Charles W. Dilke); but the fact, nevertheless, remained that the Chairman decided that the "Ayes" had it. Never in his experience before had he known the Committee to go back after the Chairman had ruled. He could understand the difficulty which the Chairman sometimes felt in gathering whether it was the intention to press for a Division, especially when the voices were as faint as those just given by hon. Members opposite; but still the Chairman was in his right in saying that the "Ayes" had it, and it was quite unusual to go back upon his decision.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, it had occurred frequently in previous debates that the Chairman declared that the "Ayes" or the "Noes" had it, not having heard any challenge from hon. Members to the contrary.

MR. ONSLOW rose to Order. He asked whether the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General was in Order in referring to what had taken place in previous debates that Session?

Mr. Lewis

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he was not referring to any previous debate.

THE CHAIRMAN said, it appeared to him that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General was elucidating his point by a reference to what had taken place on a former occasion. In that case he would not be out of Order.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, it did not admit of dispute that when the Chairman said the "Ayes" had it the decision was challenged. He had himself distinctly challenged it, and he hardly supposed that anyone could object to the rectification of a decision which the Chairman had given by mistake.

MR. RAIKES said, he thought the discussion they were engaged in was not likely to be attended with any substantial advantage. He could quite understand that some little feeling should have arisen in the minds of hon. Gentlemen on those Benches, on the ground that, after the Chairman had declared that the "Ayes" had it, he should have simply recalled that decision. But he asked his hon. Friend (Mr. R. N. Fowler) what useful object there could be in pushing the question beyond the point it had arrived at? It was a fact that the occupants of the Treasury Bench were sometimes extremely slack in giving expression to their opinion. It had frequently been his experience in previous Parliaments not to know what the intention of the Government was with reference to Questions put from the Chair. He did not think the Chairman was so much to blame in this case as the Members of the Government; and, that being so, he hoped his hon. Friend would not persevere with his Motion.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was listening to the discussion with great attention at the time the Question was put; and he was bound to say he had been much astonished at what he thought to be the assent given by the Government to the Amendment of his hon. Friend. He certainly did not expect anything of the kind. It now turned out that he was mistaken, because it was stated that both hon. and learned Gentlemen (the Attorney General and the Solicitor General) had challenged the decision of the Chairman that the "Ayes" had it. However, as no sound of dissent reached his (Sir R. Assheton Cross's) ears, he was not at all surprised that the Chairman should have given his decision for the "Ayes." That decision having been given very distinctly, after the Question was put, therefore, he said that his hon. Friends were justified in questioning the Order of the proceedings in the only way open to them—namely, by addressing the Chair from their places, seated, and wearing their hats. He thought, also, his hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler) was justified in moving to report Progress, because that appeared to be the only regular way of rectifying the mistake which had occurred. The matter, however, having been cleared up, he trusted his hon. Friend would consent to withdraw his Motion to report Progress.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he extremely regretted that the challenge of the Government had not been loud enough to reach the ears of the Chairman. They promised, however, that there should be no cause for complaint on that ground in future.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he thought it due to the Committee to state that he had not heard any challenge, and that he had given his decision accordingly. As, on a previous occasion, when he was informed that his decision had been challenged, he thought it right to correct the mistake by putting the Question again.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, after the debate that had taken place, he would ask leave to withdraw his Motion.

THE CHAIRMAN: Is it your pleasure that the Motion be withdrawn?

MR. SHEIL said, the question that presented itself to some hon. Members on those Benches was as to whether it was competent to the Chairman to alter his mind after he had declared that the "Ayes" had it. The Chairman had stated that he had heard no challenge; and, certainly, none had reached the ears of hon. Gentlemen in that part of the House.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must point out to the hon. Member (Mr. Sheil) that he was not confining himself to the Question before the Committee.

MR. SHEIL said, he was speaking on the same subject as had been discussed by hon. Members opposite and on the Benches below him. It was not a question of withdrawal, nor was it a question of the mistake of the Chairman. The question was as to whether, having given his decision, it was within the right of the Chairman to alter it.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WARTON said, that nothing more frivolous could be conceived than this prohibition of cockades and ribbons. The use of these insignia was, in the case of many people, the only means they had of expressing their political ideas. They all knew that at the Hastings Election the Government candidate had been sporting colours in profusion—there never was such a display of them. It was going beyond the hypocrisy even of this Bill to make such a paltry provision against the use of cockades and ribbons. The measure was, in some respects, tyrannical; but, in this instance, it was childish; and he would therefore move that the words “cockades, banners,” be omitted from the clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 22, to leave out the words “cockades, banners.”—(Mr. Warton.)

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he would venture to ask his hon. and learned Friend not to trouble the Committee to go to a Division on his Amendment. He entirely agreed with all his hon. and learned Friend had said on the subject; but they had just had a Division on a part of the question; and if he could see any chance of the Committee reversing its decision, no one would be more desirous than he to vote against the retention of the words.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, “That the Clause stand part of the Bill?”

MR. LEWIS, in opposing the Motion, said, that the clause referred to the use of bands, torches, flags, banners, cockades, and ribbons. Now, he was reminded of a great celebration which took place the other day at Birmingham, where the Liberal Party had an immense stock of flags and banners, cockades and ribbons, which they could import into other constituencies in time of need, or whenever Liberal festivities were expected. Birmingham, in fact, could deluge any other constituency with flags and banners. He had ventured to say, on a former occasion, and he would repeat now, that it was beneath the dignity of the House, and of the Bill, that it should inflict on any person who might spend a small some of money on such things as flags, banners, cockades, and ribbons the very severe penalties that even yet remained in the Bill. [Cries of “Agreed!”] He should not waste any time, however much he might oppose the Bill. He should not pursue any factious course; but he merely desired to make a few observations preliminary to dividing. He considered it utterly absurd, considering the limit of expenditure which they were going to lay down, to suppose that anyone would be able to spare any money on such frivolities as bands, torches, flags, banners, cockades, and ribbons. He should like to know, in a borough of 2,000 electors, how much of the £50 allowed to be spent by the Schedule of the Bill a man would have to spare for the purpose of decorating himself or the constituency with flags, banners, ribbons, and cockades? He thought the clause absurd and useless.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he should support his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) in his opposition to the clause, not only on the ground that he had stated—that it was entirely unworthy of the dignity of Parliament to descend to foolishness—but also because, while they attempted to punish a person who indulged in those very small things, they left altogether unpunished those who were guilty of far greater offences—namely, those who, for the purpose of catching votes, gave up their opinions. It was a very common thing now-a-day for a candidate to surrender his private judgment, simply for the sake of obtaining the votes of members of Associations, who were really the curse of the country, and who were the greatest obstacles to good government. He was glad to see the Prime Minister present; because he understood that, subsequently, an hon. Gentleman below the opposite Gangway (Mr. Labouchere), one of the right hon. Gentleman’s own supporters, would raise the question as to the distribution of titles for political services. Men who, for political services, accepted titles were, in his (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck's) opinion, far worthier of punishment than those who indulged in the purchase of flags, ribbons, banners, and cockades. The Bill really left unpunished those persons who were guilty of the greatest crimes against good government — namely, those who gave up their own opinions, and adopted the opinions of others, for the sole purpose of catching votes. If his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry went to a Division, he should certainly follow him into the same Lobby.

MR. GRANTHAM again asked, what was meant by "other marks of distinction?" How could it be said that a payment was made for other marks of distinction? He presumed the clause would prevent a candidate even sending out coloured polling cards. A definition of the meaning of the words was certainly needed; at present, there seemed to be no prohibition whatever to wearing ribbons and cockades. The wearing of such things was legal, but the paying for them was illegal. Under the circumstances, he certainly considered it would be wise to strike out the clause altogether.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON hoped the Government would not insist upon embodying this ridiculous clause in the Bill. What conceivable object could the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James), or the Government, have in putting such a clause in an Act of Parliament? It was only intended to give a man just enough to enable him to manage his election. ["No, no!"] Some hon. Gentlemen seemed to consider there was not enough allowed. He would then say that that was supposed to be enough in the mind of the Government to enable a man properly to conduct his election. If any man was foolish enough to waste a certain sum in payment of flags, banners, cockades, and ribbons, why should he not be allowed to do so? If he did so, he would have all the less to spend in other ways. As the clause now stood, if any member of his family bought 20 yards of ribbon for the purpose of making it into cockades, or other marks of distinction, he was to be held guilty of an illegal practice. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) dissented.] The hon. and learned Attorney General shook his head. Then, what was the use of putting a clause into the Bill upon which no Judge would act? Under the circumstances, he hoped the Government would not insist upon inserting such a ridiculous clause in an Act of Parliament.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would ask the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) to give a little more consideration to the clause. It had nothing at all to do with the maximum expenditure; it had to do with any person other than the candidate, whether the maximum expenditure had been incurred or not. They had now been discussing the clause for upwards of an hour, and he trusted they would be allowed to go to a Division at once.

MR. GORST said, he was quite sure the noble Lord who had just come into the House (Lord George Hamilton) was not aware that this clause was corrected to carry out the views of his own Colleagues. According to the existing law, the ridiculous things the noble Lord found so much fault with were already offences. According to the existing law, a candidate or his agents were punished if they spent money in the direction in question. The effect of this clause enacted what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) desired—namely, to make that which was an offence in the candidate or an election agent, an offence when committed by anyone else. It seemed curious that, at the beginning of the Sitting, a Colleague of the noble Lord should urge on the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) that this should be the principle of the Bill, and now the noble Lord quarrelled with it.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, the Government ought to be glad of the assistance which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had just given them in that matter. The hon. and learned Gentleman imagined that he (Mr. W. H. Smith) showed, at an earlier period of the evening, that payments might be made of a much more dangerous character than those for cockades and ribbons, or such like things that women delighted in, which might prove much more injurious to the purity of the constituency. He, therefore, considered it was most undesirable that such payments should be allowed. Did the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham mean to say that nothing that was prohibited by this clause was to be prohibited? That was the point which his noble Friend (Lord George Hamilton) insisted upon so much. That clause only prohibited bands, torches, flags, banners, ribbons, cockades, and other marks of distinction—that was to say, it prohibited payments of this character which should not be returned by either of the two candidates or their agents.

MR. CALLAN said, he should support the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) in the opposition he had shown to the adoption of the clause. He (Mr. Callan) was rather struck with the observations of the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James), who had, in recommending the clause, pointed out that the 16th clause provided that—

“A candidate or an election agent of a candidate who is guilty of an offence of illegal payment, employment, or hiring, or who aids or abets, or confirms by the payment of money, or in any other manner, any such offence shall be guilty of an illegal practice,” and should, therefore, be incapable of sitting for the particular constituency for seven years. He considered that that was a very severe penalty indeed. Now, what were the marks of distinction? On Sunday last, in County Monaghan, there was a funeral procession, the hearse was supposed to contain the corpse of the great Ulster Liberal Party. Did that come under the terms of “other marks of distinction?” Perhaps not, because it was a mark of extinction; which, by the way, had to-day proved a more emphatic mark of extinction. If an over-zealous friend, or an elector, supplied a band, or a flag, or a banner, which waved over the house in which a candidate was to speak, it was very possible that a Judge might hold the candidate to aid, or abet, or in some other manner be guilty of an illegal practice, and thereby disqualify a candidate for sitting for seven years. He merely rose in consequence of the misleading statement of the hon. and learned Attorney General, that the penalty was a very small one. He was sure very few Members of the Committee would agree with the opinion that seven years’ exclusion from the House was a small penalty.

Mr. W. H. Smith

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was bound to vote against the clause, because he considered it a monstrous thing to raise the penalty from 40s. to making the election void.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he would remind his right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) that payments for those things would only void an election when they were paid by a candidate or his agent. Let him ask the Committee to consider the question really at issue. Formerly there was a certain old way of conducting elections—a way which entailed great expenditure, generally accompanied by a great deal of public demoralization; and the House of Commons generally, the Tory Party included, professed to be anxious to put an end to the old state of things. What did the retention of these noisy and flaring accompaniments of an election—bands, torches, flags, ribbons, banners, and cockades—mean? They would be for the advantage of the public-houses, for they meant nothing more or less than drink, and unlimited drink. The old system meant public-house at the beginning and public-house at the end. The old state of things amounted to nothing but a lavish expenditure on these kinds of things, which, instead of leading people to consider gravely political questions of importance, led them to consider side issues of a personal character. The old state of things diverted the public mind from the calm consideration of political questions, [and excited it by fictitious, and corrupt, and, he thought, very improper means. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) had said that torches, bands, flags, banners, and such things only excited the women. Good Heavens! He was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster giving the Committee to understand that there was very little harm done in exciting women, by cockades, ribbons, &c. He hoped that, although the right hon. Gentleman’s election for Westminster was marked by an overwhelming majority, he would trust to other things than cockades, ribbons, bands, &c., exciting the women of the constituency.

MR. GREGORY said, he would point out that the payment for these things was to be made by a third person, and not by candidates. If they did not retain that clause, no penalty would be imposed upon parties who made these payments. The clause might go too far with regard to cockades and ribbons; but it appeared to him that, if the clause was struck out, any third party might come in, and hire any number of bands, ribbons, torches, flags, and the like, and might, in fact, buy up half the constituency without incurring any penalty. That would be a distinct corrupt practice, and might result in the demoralization of half the constituency. Some such clause as that was absolutely necessary if they meant to provide for a pure election.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, in the earlier part of the evening, when he moved an Amendment in order to provide against the action of the third party, the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) distinctly undertook, on Clause 22, to bring up words which would deal with the outside influences brought into a borough at the time of an election. For that reason he had withdrawn his Amendment.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER said, he voted with the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope) when he moved an Amendment which was intended to mitigate the severity of the clause. The Amendment of the hon. Member was moved with the intention, if it were carried, of again moving the omission of the words "cockades and ribbons." He (Mr. O'Connor Power) was not prepared to vote against the clause in its entirety, because he considered that something of the kind was required. He considered that the use of torches at elections was extremely dangerous. They assumed very varied forms in different elections. He had known firebrands made and thrown in the midst of a large number of people. He recollected participating in an election contest at Bristol during the last Parliament, and he remembered extremely well the reception which he and some other gentlemen received. [An hon. MEMBER: A Liberal candidate got in!"] Yes; he believed one of the present Members for Bristol was returned. Certainly, a great deal of violence was provoked by the casting about of these firebrands, and by the holding of torches to the immediate danger of a large number of people. Under the circumstances, he should vote for the retention of the clause, although he was in favour of omitting some of the articles specified.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, the hon. and learned Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had made answers to one or two of his (Lord George Hamilton's) arguments which required a little attention. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that the object of the clause was to stop external expenditure. That was an admission that the limit imposed upon a candidate might be exceeded by persons themselves in externals. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James): If we do not stop it.] This clause, therefore, was intended to apply to external expenditure, which, as the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had said, meant a third party. There was, however, not one word in the clause about a third party. If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would bring up a clause which would stop all external expenditure—not merely expenditure in connection with bands, flags, ribbons, and cockades—he (Lord George Hamilton) would gladly support him. What was now proposed was, that any person who bought ribbons at an election would be guilty of an illegal practice. That would be absurd. He hoped, therefore, his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry would press his opposition to a Division, because it was perfectly clear the clause would not attain the object the hon. and learned Attorney General had in view.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was very much opposed to the clause in all its parts. If the number of clerks and messengers were restricted too largely, and if the use of bands, flags, banners, ribbons, and cockades was prohibited, a candidate, especially in a county, would be unable to make himself personally known to the electors in a desirable way. If bands, flags, banners, ribbons, torches, and cockades were carried through a county, the result was that the electors, whose sympathies were aroused by the emblems they saw before them, were very likely to follow those emblems; and therefore they proved an efficient way of collecting together electors on polling day. They knew what a strong power Orangeism had obtained by the system of carrying banners; and they also knew that the law against Party processions in Ireland was abolished, with practical benefit to the Roman Catholics in the other parts of Ireland.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 151; Noes 58: Majority 93.—(Div. List, No. 161.)

Clause 14 (Certain employment to be illegal employment).

MR. WILLIAMSON said, he had an Amendment to move upon the clause, which he hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General would accept.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 38, after "payment," insert "under."—(Mr. Williamson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'under' be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, clearly some Amendment was necessary; but he thought it would be better to insert the words "promise of" after the word "or," in the same line.

Amendment (Mr. Williamson), by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 6, line 33, after the word "or," leave out the words "contract for," and insert "payment of."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment agreed to.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had the following Amendment on the Paper:—Clause 14, page 6, line 34, after "act," insert the following sub-section:—

"Any person employed by or in the receipt of a salary from a political or other Association outside the constituency in which the election occurs, shall be considered as engaged or employed for payment if he acts, under such employment, for the purpose of promoting, or procuring, or opposing the election of a candidate at any election."

He would not move the Amendment at the present moment, but would wait to see what the hon. and learned Attorney General proposed on Clause 22; and then, if necessary, he would bring up his proposal, either in the present or in an amended form.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he wished to propose the following sub-section:—

Mr. Biggar

"If any person shall, for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of any other person for a constituency, of which he shall be the representative, obtain a baronetcy, knighthood, or any other title, within five years of his ceasing to be the representative of the said constituency, or if he shall obtain a baronetcy, knighthood, or any other title, within five years of his election for a constituency, which he would not, in the opinion of a judicial tribunal, have obtained had he not been a candidate at the said election, he shall be deemed guilty of an illegal practice."

He had limited the second part of his Amendment to the result of an election, and it seemed to him that it was perfectly in Order. The object of the proposal was that the public should not regard Members of Parliament as a set of humbugs. It was perfectly preposterous to punish poor men for taking two shillings, or three shillings, or a pot of beer, by way of a bribe, whilst they themselves in that House were allowed to accept bribes by way of titles. On that subject, it would be invidious to make allusion to any particular Gentleman; and he would, therefore, refrain from doing so. No doubt, hon. Gentlemen in that House had received titles, and had fully deserved them; but there were many admitted political partizans who had received titles in the way of bribes. Unless his Amendment were passed, bribery could take place in the House wholesale. If these Gentlemen had not been elected by their constituencies, they would not have had the remotest chance of being made Knights, Baronets, or Peers. Could they only bring in a Bill to put down corruption at elections? Could they fairly say that men were not to sell their votes, and that if they sold them they were to be severely punished, and yet practically say that, in this House, Members should have a right of selling the results of the votes of their constituents to their own profit wholesale? He did not wish to say a great deal in support of the Amendment; but he certainly proposed to take a Division upon it. As he did not wish to be personal, if there was any hon. Member in the House who was anxious for a title, he should be very glad to introduce words making an exception in the case of that hon. Gentleman. For instance, he should be very glad to agree to an Amendment in these words "except in the case of Mr. So-and-so." He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would not put the Committee to the trouble of a Division, but would at once agree to the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 6, line 34, after the word "Act," to insert the words,—"(2). If any person shall, for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of any other person for a constituency, of which he shall be the representative, obtain a baronetcy, knighthood, or any other title, within five years of his ceasing to be the representative of the said constituency, or if he shall obtain a baronetcy, knighthood, or any other title, within five years of his election for a constituency, which he would not, in the opinion of a judicial tribunal, have obtained had he not been a candidate at the said election, he shall be deemed guilty of an illegal practice."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the proposal of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere) would be certainly one of the most peculiar pieces of legislation anyone could conceive. What the first part of the proposal meant he could not imagine—namely,

"If any person shall, for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of any other person for a constituency, of which he shall be the representative, obtain a baronetcy, knighthood, or any other title, within five years of his ceasing to be the representative of the said constituency,"

he should be deemed guilty of an illegal practice. He did not understand this at all. The second part of the Amendment, however, was that in which he (Sir Henry James) personally took the most interest, as it contained the words—

"Or if he shall obtain a baronetcy, knighthood, or any other title, within five years of his election for a constituency, which he would not, in the opinion of a judicial tribunal, have obtained had he not been a candidate at the said election, he shall be deemed guilty of an illegal practice."

He, himself, had been a candidate for a constituency, and must plead guilty of having obtained a Knighthood within five years of his election. He would be thus affected by the proposal, as also would be his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and many others in the House.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Would the hon. and learned Gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a moment. I would point out that I have not made this Amendment retrospective.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the hon. Member (Mr. Labouchere) would not think him so selfish as to suppose that he only thought of himself and his Friends in this matter. He was thinking of the future; and surely it was fair to suggest that the hon. Gentleman himself might obtain a distinctive title in consequence of being elected, being as he was such a distinguished ornament to the House, and standing as he did so high in the favour of his Sovereign and public opinion. He hoped the Committee would not consent to rob his hon. Friend of the title he was so likely to earn.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he thought there would be some difficulty in carrying out the Amendment; but, at any rate, the hon. and learned Attorney General had thrown more ridicule upon it than it properly deserved. No doubt, the proposal expressed a feeling that was very general in the public mind, and which hardly existed in it before the present Government came into Office—which had only been kindling the public mind since the present Government took the reins of Office. Of course, it might be in the power of a Minister of the Crown to confer titles and rewards for public services, if he imagined his Party and the country were identical, and that services rendered to the one were services rendered to the other—if he thought that contesting an election and spending large sums of money in the interest of his Party were services in the interest of his country. But he contended that, under the present Government, and under the present Prime Minister, Baronetcies and other titles had been almost, he might say, prostituted. What had happened? Let them take two leading instances where a constituency, by a deliberate and uninfluenced vote, had returned certain candidates to that House, and where the present Prime Minister had advised those candidates to throw up their trusts, in order to make room for a Minister of the Crown. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Where?] There was the case of the Radnor Boroughs, for instance. The noble Marquess the present Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) had contested North Lancashire, and was defeated; and, if he recollected right, the elected Representative for the Radnor Boroughs, thereupon threw up his seat, in order to make room for the noble Marquess, and for so doing received a Baronetcy. But that was a mere trifle compared with what had taken place the other day. The right hon. Gentleman the present Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. Dodson), who was being elevated the other day to the head of the new Agricultural Department, was unseated at Chester for corrupt practices—no doubt on the part of his representatives, for he should be sorry to say that the right hon. Gentleman himself had been guilty of any dishonourable act. The right hon. Gentleman was, at that time, President of the Local Government Board; but having been unseated for corrupt practices was unable, as was necessary, to take his seat in the House. The right hon. Gentleman, seeing the ground upon which he was held incapable of sitting for Chester, ought to have resigned himself to his position. Not so, however—the Prime Minister at once produced a Baronetcy. [An hon. MEMBER: A Peerage!] Yes, a Peerage from his pocket, which he dangled before the eyes of the various persons in the Liberal ranks who aspired to that dignity, and the hon. Baronet the Member for Scarborough (Sir Harcourt Johnstone) rose to the bait and created a vacancy for that constituency. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) maintained, therefore, that this was not a joke, because if public dignities were to be given for political services of so base a description, they were no longer right and proper. He could very well understand the object with which the hon. Member (Mr. Labouchere) had put this Amendment on the Paper, and it certainly ought not to be treated with the levity that the hon. and learned Attorney General seemed to bestow upon it.

MR. GLADSTONE: The noble Lord the Member for Woodstock has admitted that he sees a difficulty in dealing with the subject. He can well understand the difficulty of carrying out such an Amendment as that of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and yet he has not stated how we are to overcome it; and, at the same time, he says he can understand the circumstances under which it was put upon the Paper. I, myself, can understand the circumstances which led the hon. Member to put it upon the Paper. There is a growing practice in this House, according to which some hon. Members exercise their humour and some their sarcasm, sometimes through the medium of Questions, and sometimes through the medium of Amendments. The hon. Member has found an excellent opportunity of exercising his humour on this clause. The question is, not whether we can understand this matter, but whether we can seriously put such a proposal into the law of the land? The noble Lord has furnished us with information from knowledge drawn from fountains which are quite inscrutable to me; but that information is not the fact. He says that, to his knowledge, a bribe has been offered by the present Prime Minister to two persons—one who represented the Radnor Boroughs in a late Parliament, and the other who was elected during the present Parliament for the borough of Scarborough—to make way for Ministers of the Crown. He says this bribe was, in the first instance, a Baronetcy; and, in the next, a Peerage—that, in view of the offer of these bribes, the seats were vacated, in order that new candidates might be elected who were to hold seats in the Cabinet. Now, there is not a word of truth in the whole statement. [“Oh, oh!”] Yes; as regards any offer, or communication, or inducement, or anything of the sort held out to either the previous Member for the Radnor Boroughs or the late Member for Scarborough.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD: It is only a coincidence, I suppose?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes; but is that the same thing? Take the case of the borough of Scarborough. Sir Harcourt Johnstone was Member for that borough. He was a person whom I had long had in my mind to recommend to Her Majesty for a Peerage. He had every qualification; he was—if I may so say—of excellent complexion as a Liberal partizan; he was a person of very high character, and one who had done great service in this House in connection with public measures.

An hon. MEMBER: In what way? [Cries of “Order!”]

MR. GLADSTONE: He was a person of large fortune; and upon all these grounds, combined with having known him myself from a very early period of his life, he was one who, in my mind, I had marked out for recommendation for a Peerage. Entirely without any communication from him, and, as far as I know—indeed, I am perfectly convinced of it—without any communication from any Member of the Government, he, aware that Her Majesty's Government were anxious to submit the name of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster for an Office in the Cabinet, offered to vacate his seat, without allusion or reference of any kind to any reward, or any promotion of any sort. That offer was accepted; and, instead of its being correct, as the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock says, that thereupon a Peerage was given to Sir Harcourt Johnstone, a very considerable time elapsed. [Ironical cheers from the Opposition.] I know not why those jeers should greet a statement of fact of this nature if we are upon a serious discussion. I say a very considerable time elapsed; I cannot recollect the period exactly at this moment.

LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR said, that 18 months elapsed.

MR. GLADSTONE: My noble Friend's recollection serves him better than mine serves me. He informs me precisely 18 months elapsed before any communication on the subject of a Peerage was made to Sir Harcourt Johnstone; and the noble Lord's doctrine is, that though this Gentleman acted purely of his own motion, and without any expectation whatever, or communication or promise of reward, vacated his seat for a Member of the Government, and a long period elapsed between that act and his receiving a Peerage, that, therefore, he should be under a perpetual ban, and should not be permitted to render service to his country. That is the case of the noble Lord. The case of the noble Lord turns on the fact that some communication, some promise, some expectation — [LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: No, no!]
—then what did it turn upon? Was it a charge against Sir Harcourt Johnstone? It turned on the assertion that there was some previous offer, or communication of some kind or other, to justify Sir Harcourt Johnstone in accepting some reward. [LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: It was, perhaps, only intuition.] The noble

Lord seriously proposes intuition in the case of the expectations of Sir Harcourt Johnstone as a basis for the acceptance of this Amendment. Surely, that is carrying the jest a little too far. The hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) would do well, I think, to measure his facts a little more. The popular Government which I suppose my hon. Friend desires and anticipates never could be formed if such an Amendment as this were adopted. It would be an absolute impossibility. When the hon. Member's Government is formed, it would probably be one rather more remarkable in a certain degree than the first Government formed by Lord Derby, when, owing to peculiar circumstances, 14 Privy Councillors—nearly the whole of the Cabinet—were sworn in in one day. How would my hon. Friend form his Government, when called upon by the Queen, when the mere fact of their being Privy Councillors, and receiving the attachments of the honour or title of "right hon. Gentleman," would cause them to vacate their seats, and render them liable to punishment? How could my hon. Friend be guilty of an indecency like that? We may go on in a humdrum way, the pendulum swinging from the Opposition to the Government Bench; but the object of my hon. Friend is to bring all this corrupt system to an end, and to form the foundation of a really popular Government. But I have shown that it would be an absolute impossibility for him to form a Government. It would be absolutely impossible for him to form a Ministry, or obtain Ministers, except in one or two instances, where they would not have to be Members of the Privy Council. If there has been any case in which a title has been given, either corruptly or wantonly, under my advice, I challenge discussion. I am not here to say that such a thing is not for the consideration of the House of Commons. It is a matter most proper for the House of Commons to take in hand; but my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, with great kindness and indulgence, would give complete immunity, with respect to the past, to all of us who are old and hackneyed in the ways of wickedness. His vengeance is to be directed against himself, and against the advanced popular Government of which, probably, he had indicated he himself was destined to form at some future time.

MR. CAINE said, that was the third time, during the discussion in Committee on this Bill, that the name of his noble Friend (Lord Derwent) had been mentioned in connection with corrupt practices. He (Mr. Caine) would like to relate the facts referring to the recent election in Scarborough. Six months before the General Election, Lord Derwent (then Sir Harcourt Johnstone) was suffering from ill-health, and he was exceedingly desirous to retire altogether from the candidature. It was only by the strongest pressure that the noble Lord was induced to stand the annoyance and the worry of the General Election. Within a week of his being returned for Scarborough, by a majority of 580, the noble Lord said to him (Mr. Caine)—“Now the election has been decided by so large a majority, I sincerely trust the Party in Scarborough will allow me to withdraw.” His noble Friend was anxious to retire in favour of another Gentleman, in no way connected with the Government, but who had been defeated in another constituency. Again, they put pressure on him to remain; but about six or eight months after he came again, and said his health was so bad that he must really withdraw from the representation. A third time they persuaded him to remain, and it was not until the occasion occurred in which he could retire in favour of his (Mr. Caine's) present right hon. Colleague (Mr. Dodson) that Lord Derwent did retire from the representation of the borough. As a matter of fact, Lord Derwent had been suffering from ill-health ever since. Indeed, he had been so ill that he had only been able to take his seat in “another place” on two occasions. He (Mr. Caine) sincerely trusted that this would be the last time that these ungenerous attacks would be made on an absent man.

MR. LEWIS said, the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had mentioned two instances, about the earliest in point of date, and the most important in point of circumstance, which the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister took good care not to refer to. He (Mr. Lewis) referred to the subject on the second reading of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman was not in the House at the time, and he

(Mr. Lewis) only referred to the matter indistinctly; but what he suggested then, and what he suggested now, was this—that it was perfectly impossible to expect the public to respect the laws which Parliament passed to prevent bribery at elections, if they (the Government) did not respect the law themselves. If the Government of the day were guilty of acts which bore the complexion of jobbing away seats in the House for titles at their disposal, it was one of the most grievous things that could ever happen. The case that everybody had in their minds the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister took care not to refer to. In the year 1868, the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War (the Marquess of Hartington) was most unfortunate in Lancashire, and he required a seat. And, before recounting the circumstance, he desired to state it was a mistake to suppose that the Law of Bribery was this—that, unless they bargained beforehand, there was no bribery; they knew perfectly well that, if they gave anything after a certain act was done in respect to that act, they were distinctly and manifestly guilty of bribery. Now, in the face of the House, and in the face of the public, he would recount the facts surrounding the election of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War, and let them speak for themselves. He made no charge, but was content with the inference which must necessarily be drawn from the facts. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War was defeated in North Lancashire, and required a seat. Great as was the property of the family of the noble Marquess, he (Mr. Lewis) had never heard that the noble Marquess or his family was in any way connected with Radnoshire. The Gentleman, however, who represented the Radnor Boroughs, and who was now even a Member of the House of Commons, retired in favour of the noble Marquess. The noble Marquess was returned for the Radnor Boroughs within a reasonable time, and the Gentleman was made a Baronet. He could not say the time; but he was utterly indifferent as to whether the Baronetcy was conferred at one, two, six, or twelve months after the retirement. Such were the facts. The noble Marquess wanted a seat, and a vacancy was created, and the noble Marquess filled it up. The Gentleman who retired was given a Baronetcy by the Minister at the head of the Cabinet of which the noble Marquess was a Member. He (Mr. Lewis) hoped it would not be imputed to him that he suggested, for one moment, that this was a promotion in promised payment for the withdrawal of the Member for the Radnor Boroughs. There was one circumstance to show that there was no special reason why the hon. Gentleman should retire from the House, because he got back to the House as soon as he could, and, in fact, now represented Radnor County. He (Mr. Lewis) considered that this case was worthy of the notice of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government. But, unfortunately, that was not the only case; and it was because there had been two cases under the Administration of the right hon. Gentleman that considerable attention had been directed to the subject. He was not going into the circumstances of the case of Scarborough, though they were certainly exceedingly remarkable. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister seemed to suggest that, because there had been no sort of promise or suggestion about promotion in connection with the retirement from the seat, that, therefore, there was no blame attaching. Of course, they accepted to the fullest extent the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman that there was no sort of promise or understanding in connection with the withdrawal. The facts remained, however, that they had a convenient withdrawal; then a title followed. He asserted that the public were entitled to view these things with suspicion; and he repeated the observations which he made on the second reading of the Bill, that if these things were done in the highest orders of the State, it was impossible to make persons in the lowest orders of society believe the House of Commons was sincere in its desire to put down bribery and corruption. He imputed nothing in the case of the Radnor Boroughs except this, that the noble Marquess wanted a seat, a vacancy was made, and the Gentleman who made the vacancy had a title conferred on him.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lewis) makes no charges. He has twice stated that in making the most severe charge, and one totally needless, which, I think, few

hon. Members in the House but himself would have made. Twice the hon. Member said that I took care not to refer to the case of the Election of Radnor. Does the hon. Gentleman mean to say that I endeavoured to avoid discussion on a subject of this kind is not a charge? If so, I do not envy the discernment of the hon. Member; and I do not understand what his standard of language or conduct can be, when he professes to make no charge, and, at the same time, makes one of the severest charges he could make against a public man; but he is thoroughly and grossly inaccurate, for he says that the Gentleman who then sat for the Radnor Boroughs surrendered his seat at the beginning of 1869, and got back as soon as he could. He got back more than 11 years afterwards. [An hon. MEMBER: He tried in 1874.] Then he tried in 1874. I do not know how the hon. Gentleman can say, under such circumstances, that he got back as soon as he could. The hon. Member (Mr. Lewis) surely might have thought that I might have found some difficulty in going back to transactions 14 years old, and to bring to my memory all the particulars of the given transaction. He might have displayed a little charity in the matter; but he has not chosen to do so. I have considered the facts of the case, in the few moments that have taken place since the hon. Gentleman rose to address the Committee. What were the facts? Instead of being made a Baronet as soon, as the hon. Gentleman says, decency would permit—[Mr. LEWIS: I said within a reasonable time.] The hon. Gentleman evidently does not know that nothing was done of the kind for more than five years after the public service had been rendered, which undoubtedly was a distinct element in the case of the hon. Member receiving the consideration of the Government. If the Amendment of my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) had been law at that time, I believe I should have had no operation whatever in regard to this Baronetcy; for I believe the time had elapsed in which the conferring of the title would have been an illegal practice. I challenge the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) to make good the assertion that he has made, that this was an improper promotion. What ground has he for saying it was an improper promotion?

[Twelfth Night.]

[Mr. LEWIS: I never said it was an improper promotion.] Then, if it was not an improper promotion, why do you make it the subject for controversy? Did this Gentleman render a public service, or did he not? ["No, no!"] It was no public service to enable my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) to take his place here? ["No, no!"] Then I will put the case on the other side. I am not contending that for this public service alone — [Mr. BIGGAR: What else?] I beg that the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), who frequently intrudes himself on the indulgence of the House, will, for once, spare me his incessant interruption. The contention is, that because the hon. Member in question rendered that public service, though he was otherwise fitted, he ought not to be made a Baronet. The contention is, that because he made an opening for my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington), whatever might have been his qualifications for a Baronetcy, that very act alone rendered him disqualified to receive the honour. Such is the contention of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry, who comes down here to teach us what is the true standard of purity and public conduct. [Mr. LEWIS dissented.] The hon. Gentleman shakes his head. Then, what does he mean? Has he been talking grammar, and sense, or has he not? He says he has not a word to say against the qualification of the Gentleman who was made a Baronet, or against his fitness for promotion. His only allegation is, that this Gentleman made an opening for my noble Friend near me, to present himself for the constituency of the Radnor Boroughs. Was that, or was it not, a case of disqualification for a man who was previously qualified.

MR. LEWIS: It was a disqualification if it was done for Party purposes.

MR. GLADSTONE: You may call it Party purposes, if you like; I am not going to rake up the transactions of other Governments, but this thing is as old as Parliament; it is no effort to me to find analogous proceedings that have taken place under the charge and responsibility of the Opposition when they were in power. It really appears that everything turns on the question whether a person is qualified to receive it or not, and the hon. Gentleman himself

(Mr. Lewis) does not dare to say that that Gentleman was not qualified. He will not abandon his charge, he cannot support it; but he is compelled to admit that he has nothing to say against the fitness of that Gentleman to be made a Baronet, and that is the predicament in which the hon. Gentleman stands. This is the case of the hon. Gentleman who was promoted; he had received a mark of the confidence of the borough of Radnor, and he has since received a mark of the confidence of the county of Radnor itself, in being returned as its Representative — [Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Since the Baronetcy]—showing, I conclude, that they approved of the honour being conferred upon him. He is a member of an old family in the county, of very large property, and on whom no stain or disfigurement has been attached; but because the hon. Gentleman committed the great and grievous sin of enabling my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) to take his share in serving the Queen, he was, according to the contention of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry, disqualified from being made a Baronet. I really, Sir, am extremely sorry that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry has obtruded a subject of this kind in discussions which hitherto have been carried on in excellent temper and in a judicial spirit. I will not attempt to describe the conduct of the hon. Gentleman. He does not dare, he does not venture, to make the smallest imputation upon that promotion. He knows that it is beyond his power—however good his intention may be, he knows it is beyond his power—he could not find a shred of objection to the promotion, except that the Gentleman who was the subject of it committed a great sin by enabling my noble Friend (the Marquess of Hartington) to present himself to the Radnor Boroughs. I submit that was not a sin which ought to disqualify or unfit a man, who was otherwise qualified, from receiving a mark of honour. That is the case which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry says I have taken good care to avoid.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister that the remarks he was about to make would be tendered in the greatest politeness of which he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) was such a master. He desired to draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to a strange coincidence which occurred not long ago. A Gentleman, not of old family, but of large property in the South of England, and of large property in the North of England, fought two contested elections in the South of England, in both of which he was unsuccessful. In 1880 he went to the North of England, where he fought another election, and again he was unsuccessful. The three elections cost the Gentleman in question a large sum of money, but shortly afterwards he found himself in the House of Peers. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) did not know how that Gentleman got there, but he supposed it was certainly not for great public services rendered; he supposed the Gentleman got a Peerage because he fought three contested elections on behalf of the Prime Minister. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) found no fault with the elevation of Sir Harcourt Johnstone to the Peerage; he found no fault with the action the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister took in the case referred to by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis); neither did he find any fault in the case he himself had just called attention to. The same thing was done in former times, and if it was justifiable formerly, it was justifiable now. It was, however, inconsistent that a Liberal Government should reward Gentlemen for political services, and then bring in a Bill which would send a man to prison who merely gave a glass of ale. All these pretended corrupt practices were not corrupt practices at all, nor were they recognized as such. With the object of dealing with these petty so-called offences, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) had introduced these wretched pitfalls for any man who might in future contest a constituency. He had endeavoured to give in a calm, and, he hoped, in no offensive manner, his opinion upon this subject. He could not agree with the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere); but as he found the Government were determined to carry through at any cost this tyrannical and useless Bill, he should vote with the hon. Member if he went to a Division.

Mr. LEWIS said, he should be unworthy of sitting in the House if he allowed the speech of the Prime Minister to go unnoticed. In language most extraordinary, and in a manner certainly not very calm, the right hon. Gentleman attacked him because he did not attack the person to whom he referred when last he addressed the Committee—the whole burden of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman was that he (Mr. Lewis) did not attack the character of the hon. Gentleman the present Member for Radnorshire (Sir Richard Price). He (Mr. Lewis) had no intention of doing any such thing. The right hon. Gentleman dared him to do it; but never having had the smallest intention of attacking the character of the hon. Gentleman in question, he did not do so, and would not do so. What he did, without uttering one harsh word, was to draw attention to the simple facts. Those facts as narrated by him could not be impeached. The only error in his statement, if error it was, which the right hon. Gentleman had pointed out, was that the promotion of the hon. Member for Radnorshire took place at the end, and not in the middle, of the Ministry of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. He did not think the Committee or the country would see any important difference between his statement and the corrected statement of the Prime Minister. He accepted all the daring of the right hon. Gentleman, and he would repeat the charge, if a charge the right hon. Gentleman called it. What he said was that the right hon. Gentleman had taken care not to refer to the case of the Radnor Boroughs, and he was entitled to say that that was the mode of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. The right hon. Gentleman, in his second speech, did not say he forgot all about the Radnor case, and therefore he (Mr. Lewis) was right in assuming that the Prime Minister did remember it, though he did not refer to it. He (Mr. Lewis) repeated that the retirement of the hon. Member for the Radnor Boroughs was not a public service, but a Party service, for the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister freely admitted that the retirement took place in order to make room for the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington). Whether there was any understanding connected with the retirement, they had the different links of the chain—a seat wanted, a seat vacated, and a Baronetcy conferred. With reference to the noble Lord the late Member for Scarborough (Lord Derwent), he had not now referred to the case; but in his speech upon the second reading of the Bill he referred to a case which had taken place in his own Party—he referred to the case of a distinguished lawyer, now long since dead, for whom a vacancy was created under exactly similar circumstances by the late Conservative Administration. He complained of that case; indeed, he was perfectly impartial in his complaints. The Attorney General (Sir Henry James) knew that he distinctly referred to that case, to show that he was not making a Party charge. He had asked before, and he asked now, how they could expect the people to respect the law when corruption was carried on in the highest Departments of the State? The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister was totally mistaken if he supposed that he (Mr. Lewis) had said that the right hon. Gentleman made any offer to the hon. Member for the Radnor Boroughs to induce him to retire. He made no charge against the right hon. Gentleman, except that which he made against his Predecessors. The Heads of both Parties had been in the habit of doing these things, and he merely asserted that they were done in the interest of political Parties.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that charges of corruption ought not to be made merely because hon. Gentlemen accepted the promotion due to them. That could scarcely be called corruption. The hon. Member's contention, however, was that a man ought to be treated as disentitled to promotion or honour of any kind if his retirement made room for a Member of the Government.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the Amendment under notice was perfectly consistent on the part of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), who represented his absent Colleague. They all knew that that Gentleman was opposed to all rewards for public services; and he (Mr. Newdegate) believed he was right in saying that he had marked that particular subject as his own. He was sorry that the hon. Member for Northampton should represent, with regard to this question, opinions which he had hoped were forgotten. There was much truth in the observation made by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) to the effect that the excessive severity of the provisions of the Bill were inconsistent with the system of Government existing in this country. They might be applicable to a Republic; but they were certainly not applicable to the Constitutional Monarchy of this country. He (Mr. Newdegate) was very anxious that the House of Lords should be strong; and he was happy to see that its functions were of growing importance. He believed that no reward was more appropriate than that which was conferred upon men who had been distinguished by the fidelity of their services in that House. For instance, it was acknowledged on all hands that a Speaker, when he ceased to preside over their deliberations, unless he misconducted himself, should be made a Peer. This system of rewards was the means by which the House of Lords was recruited, and he rejoiced in its existence; but he felt that the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government had rendered this legitimate system of promotion difficult by adopting that foreign element of secrecy in connection with elections. The whole of the severity of the present Bill had become necessary in consequence of the corruption which had been produced by the Ballot Act; and before these discussions closed, he would bring that fact plainly before the attention of the House. The Committee was in a false position. They were asked to act with undue severity, and in a manner alien to the Constitutional spirit of the country, towards persons in minor positions; and they found it impossible to recruit the House of Lords sufficiently to maintain that great Institution, which he hoped would grow in strength, without violating the principle upon which this Bill was founded, and without having recourse to that secrecy which unavoidably disgraced the electoral system wherever it existed.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he could assure the Prime Minister that he intended no joke or sarcasm in bringing forward this question. He intended to discuss the matter as one of principle. He held it to be a great misfortune that the public should think, rightly or wrongly, that the Members whom they elected to represent them in that House, if they voted for Ministers for a considerable time, would somehow or other become Baronets. Hon. Members opposite had given this question a personal character. It was not he that had done so. He had been asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister for a single case in which a title had been conferred corruptly. He did not mean to go into the cases; but he would say that the practice was, and had been, for years in this country to give titles for personal services. Everyone knew that was the case; and he could cite just as many instances, perhaps more, with regard to Gentlemen on that side of the House than with regard to Gentlemen on the opposite Benches. It was a system which had been adopted both by Liberals and Conservatives, and the Prime Minister had only followed in the footsteps of his Predecessors. He could not anticipate the contingency which the right hon. Gentleman shadowed forth of Her Majesty sending for him (Mr. Labouchere) to form an Administration. He was contented in being a humble follower of the right hon. Gentleman. But were Her Majesty to do so, he should at once consult his legal advisers as to whether the appellation "Right honourable" was a title. The conferring of a Peerage conveyed a title; but nothing of the kind was implied in the words "Right honourable." As far as he could see, his chief supporter in this matter would be the right hon. and learned Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), and that being so, he thought his proposal would hardly be considered by the country as a Radical one. Under these circumstances, he would ask leave to withdraw his Amendment; and he must content himself with the belief that if his Amendment was in a small minority in that House, it was supported by a very large majority out of it.

MR. BIGGAR said, he hoped that the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Labouchere) would not withdraw his Amendment; for his own part, he (Mr. Biggar) was not at all sure that he would get leave to do so. He thought the hon. Member for Northampton had done very good service in drawing the attention of the Committee to this subject; and, more than that, he was prepared to go a little further than the hon. Gentleman himself. This system of tampering with Members of Parliament by the Government of the day was a great evil. The practice in the case of a wealthy man was to confer upon him a title, say a Peerage or a Baronetcy; but in the case of a man who was not wealthy, these bestowals took the form of Government situations. Whatever they were, they had a tendency to shake the allegiance of Members to their principles and constituents, and to make them disposed to curry favour with the Government of the day. If he could find a satisfactory number of Members to support him in that part of the House, he should certainly challenge a Division on the question raised by the hon. Member for Northampton. It seemed to him very hard that penalties should be imposed by the Bill on Members of Parliament who unwittingly spent a little more money than they intended upon their election, while the Government were allowed to heap rewards on Members of Parliament for betraying the interests of their constituents.

MR. SHEIL said, he would remind the Committee of a circumstance which had probably not entered into the minds of many hon. Members in connection with the present subject. In 1881, Mr. Speaker had thought it consistent with his duty to expel from that House some 20 or 30 Irish Members; and hon. Members would be aware that the right hon. Gentleman in question had since been awarded a very important title. Again, Mr. Lyon Playfair, then Chairman of Ways and Means, had suspended a group of Irish Members. Not long afterwards, the Knight Commandership of the Bath was conferred upon him.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 11; Noes 186; Majority 175.—(Div. List, No. 162.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had an Amendment to move on behalf of his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson). With the view of saving the time of the Committee he would do no more than move the Amendment to which he referred.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, at end of clause, add,—“Any Assistant Commissioner, Registrar, or other officer appointed under the provisions of ‘The Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881,’ who, for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of a candidate, interferes therein, or is engaged or employed either with or without payment, for any purpose or in any capacity whatever, shall be guilty of illegal employment, and shall forfeit his appointment, and any candidate, or election agent of a candidate, who aids or abets, or confirms in any manner such offence, shall be guilty of an illegal practice."—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, he could see no reason why this Amendment should be entertained. His objection to it was that it singled out a particular class of persons holding judicial offices, and subjected them to a disqualification which did not attach to other holders of judicial offices. He could not understand why this class of persons should have been selected, and he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would not think it necessary to press the Amendment.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, if the Amendment were withdrawn, he hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General would bring in a clause which would prevent any persons holding judicial positions from taking an active part in elections. He believed, in that way, the hon. and learned Gentleman would introduce a real improvement into the Bill.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS thought the best course, under the circumstances, would probably be that the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) should be postponed till the Report, and then he could raise it himself.

MR. BIGGAR hoped the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) would fight this matter out now, for it was intolerable that the Land Commissioners should have the power of lowering or raising rents in Ireland according to political considerations. He could not see upon what ground the hon. Gentleman wished to ignore this Amendment, for it was one of the best on the Bill. The Committee knew how directly the Land Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners were in contact with the tenant farmers, and what pressure they applied to them. That was a public scandal, which ought not to be tolerated.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS hoped, as a matter of courtesy to his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Gibson), the Committee would allow the Amendment to be withdrawn, so that it might be brought up as a new clause upon the Report.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he likewise thought the Amendment might be withdrawn. He should be sorry to take advantage of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) who had put it on the Paper; but this was really a case of some difficulty, and one which he thought would be only aggravated by Amendments of this kind. The Amendment did not include the Chief Commissioners, and it conferred a stigma upon one particular class of officials. It was extremely undesirable to do that, and he hoped the Amendment would be withdrawn.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he trusted that before this proposal could be again made the Government would consider the matter with a view to inserting something of the kind in the Bill. He did not understand the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) to say that it would be right for Assistant Commissioners to take such a part as they were prohibited from taking by this clause. All he said was that it did not apply to the Commissioners as well; but surely the Commissioners ought to be equally debarred. He could not conceive anything worse for any Party or side in Ireland than that the Assistant Commissioners or Chief Commissioners, or any other persons connected with the administration of the Land Act, should be allowed to take an active part in elections.

MR. BIGGAR said, the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had raised two points. First he said the Chief Commissioners were excluded from the clause. Everybody knew that they held such a position that it would be out of the question for them to be employed as election agents, considering their social position and their incomes. On the same ground, County Court Judges, who got very large salaries, would not take employment as election agents. They might take a prominent part in elections, but they would not mix themselves up in the details. But it was a different thing with the Assistant Commissioners and clerks, who had only temporary employment, and to whom a small extra sum of money would be very welcome. If an Assistant Commissioner took an electioneering agency in a county, that would probably be worth a large sum to him in other ways. He might get, instead of temporary employment for one year, a permanent situation. Under the circumstances, it would be better that the Amendment should be withdrawn; but he hoped it would be moved again.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he hoped the Government would not object to consider, without prejudice, the propriety of introducing the Chief Commissioners as well as the Assistant Commissioners; because, no doubt, the observation of the Premier hit the blot in the clause when he pointed out that only the Assistant Commissioners were included. He did not think there was any objection on this side of the House to include every kind of official under the Land Act, and he was sure hon. Members from Ireland would be happy to meet the Premier in that respect.

MR. SHEIL said, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had urged that it would be discourteous to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) not to allow this to be withdrawn; but it seemed to him (Mr. Sheil) that if there was any discourtesy at all, it was on the part of the right hon. Gentleman himself. He took upon himself to move this Amendment, and then suggested its withdrawal. If the Amendment was withdrawn it would be raised again, it was said, as a new clause.

MR. CALLAN said, he wished to meet this Amendment with a direct negative. The Assistant Commissioners were as independent as any men who sat on the Treasury Bench or on the Front Opposition Bench; they were electors, and had a right to interfere in elections, to vote, and to influence their neighbours. The clause was evidently aimed at Mr. Wyllie, who had been Parliamentary agent to the Whigs of Ulster; but he (Mr. Callan) thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) might give up the Amendment, for Mr. Wyllie's office was a sinecure, because the Whigs of Ulster were an extinct body, wholly crushed out.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill," put, and agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not wish to set a bad example; but they had now reached new matter, and he would move that Progress be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

PRISON SERVICE (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Trevelyan.)

[BILL 248.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

MR. O'BRIEN said, this was a Bill of considerable importance to a very meritorious class of prison officials in Ireland, and he hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill would be able to see his way to deferring the Committee on the Bill for a reasonable time, to enable the prison officials in Ireland to see whether it satisfactorily carried out its title.

MR. TREVELYAN said, this was, as the hon. Member (Mr. O'Brien) had said, a Bill dealing with the grievances of a very meritorious class of officers in Ireland; but, as he gathered, there was no great objection to the principle of the Bill, and if the second reading were now taken, there could be no objection to delaying the further stage for a time.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.

[BILL 154.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Trevelyan.)

MR. O'DONNELL said, he hoped that, considering its importance, no attempt would be made to make progress with this Bill now. A large number of Irish Members were at present away in Ireland, who ought to be consulted on the matter. Although, technically, this was a Money Bill, and could therefore be proceeded with at any time, still it involved issues much beyond those involved in an ordinary Money Bill, and if taken now would withdraw important questions of Government policy from any chance of fair discussion by the House. He was afraid this was merely a Bill to cover those Unions which had played an unpatriotic part in driving out of the country the helpless poor who were committed to their charge; and, on the other hand, to impose disabilities, by completely neglecting the merits of those Unions which had done their best to meet the necessities of the distress in Ireland. He feared that the defaulting Unions, in a national sense, were those which would be benefited by the Bill, and he hoped the Government would not try to proceed with the discussion of the Bill that evening. It would be just as easy to bring the Bill forward at another time, when there was a fuller attendance of Irish Members; and the Government owed them an opportunity of discussing it. That opportunity was taken from them by the manner in which the Government proceeded at the last stage, and he believed the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland gave a pledge to-day to the effect that, if there was any opposition to the Bill, he would not seek to advance the Bill this evening.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he had expected that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland would make some statement as to the reasons for his withdrawal from the engagement he entered into with the Irish Members, that the Bill would not be spirited through the House that night as it was the other night. The Irish Members would have to protest as strongly as they could against any progress being now made with the Bill, for so grotesque a way of dealing with starving people, after months of cogitation, was quite unexampled in the annals of English bungling in Ireland. From all that he had heard the gist of the right hon. Gentleman's defence of the Bill was that he was ready to give some personal pledge that the money would not be used for the purpose of emigration, but simply in aid of those who had spent money in emigration. One of the Unions to be helped out of its difficulties was a Union in which the Guardians had supplied most of the cheap emigrants to the Government. Disguise the Bill as they might in this House, it was a cruel mockery to call it a Bill for the relief of distress in Ireland. It was a mere bribe to the Unions which had been carrying out the mockery of the Government Workhouse theory. These Unions had run themselves into bankruptcy by carrying out the Government programme, and this Bill was encouragement to them to go on carrying out that programme, and in sticking to the workhouse test. There was nothing to prevent the Local Government Board, who were notoriously partizans of this policy, spending the £50,000 in bribing the Unions which had distinguished themselves by carrying out the policy of the Government. Before they could consent to this Bill, Irish Members wanted to know what it was intended to do for the unfortunate starving people, thousands of whom were in Donegal, to this hour existing on private charity, without which they must have died long ago? But for the hour of night, he could give most heartrending details of the things that were going on without the slightest help from the Government in Donegal at this moment. This Bill, which purported to be for the relief of distress, not only did nothing to relieve these unfortunate people, but appropriated £50,000 out of Irish funds, in order to add insult to injury, by transporting these unfortunate people. For those reasons, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not utilize the temporary advantage he had through the absence of the great body of Irish Members, and would not press the Bill forward until the Irish Members had an opportunity of framing Amendments which would secure, at all events, some portion of the money for the suffering people.

MR. TREVELYAN said, the hon. Member (Mr. O'Brien) had, in one respect, missed the mark upon this matter. Three of the four Unions to be helped by this Bill were Unions which had been taken in hand by Mr. Tuke's Committee, and had never spent a halfpenny on emigration; and they were merely being aided because they were living from hand to mouth.

MR. O'BRIEN said, that, as he understood, a large portion of this money would be at the absolute disposal of the Local Government Board, to be lent to Unions which had got themselves into trouble through helping emigration.

Mr. O'Donnell

Mr. TREVELYAN said, that was the case; but the Local Government Board had not shown itself desirous of lending public money where it was not absolutely wanted for the purposes of local relief. The practical object of the Bill was to indemnify certain Unions who had borrowed small sums under the pressure of last winter. He did not wish to enter into the merits of the Bill at this moment. It was, in itself, an exceedingly small Bill, upon which hon. Members opposite wished to raise a considerable question. That question had been raised in the shape of an Amendment by the hon. and gallant Member for Cork County (Colonel Colthurst), who had an opportunity of bringing it on upon a Friday evening; and so intimately allied was that Motion with the substance of this Bill, that the hon. and gallant Member was actually seriously alarmed lest the Government should take advantage of this Bill being on the Paper to interfere between him and his private Motion. The Government, however, did not take that course. The Motion was discussed, and the House decided the point by a Division, which was sufficiently large, considering the time of the Session, and considering the relations between the Government and those Irish Members who wished to raise this question upon this Bill. He quite recognized that the hon. Members for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) and Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) had something to say for themselves when they urged that there were a considerable number of Irish Members absent now, who were present on Thursday, and who intended to take part in this discussion at some stage of the Bill. Under the circumstances the Government were perfectly willing to postpone the question until Thursday; but he would take this opportunity of saying that on Thursday the Government would consider they had a perfect right to ask the House to go through the stage of the Bill at any period of the evening, even as late as this (1 o'clock A.M.). This subject had been so frequently and so fully debated this year—this question of outdoor relief in Ireland, of which the present Bill was only a small part—that he thought he had a right to say that, after this notice, the Government would consider themselves at liberty to press the measure on the House, even at a very late period of the evening. Under these circumstances he would accede to the request of hon. Members opposite.

Mr. BIGGAR said, he understood the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Trevelyan) agreed to the proposal for the adjournment of the debate; and he (Mr. Biggar) would therefore move that it be adjourned. He must say he considered the right hon. Gentleman had been guilty of very sharp practice, as he had not very long ago made a pledge to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that he would not bring this measure on after half-past 12 o'clock at night, and that he would not bring it on without Notice to the Irish Members. On Friday last he had brought the measure forward before half-past 12 o'clock, sheltering himself behind some hon. Gentlemen who had no connection with the Irish Party, and who, he said, had done something or other that justified him in breaking his pledge. Now, at 1 o'clock in the morning, and knowing that the leading Members of the Irish Party were absent from London, the right hon. Gentleman had sought to pass the measure without having questions raised on the different clauses, which he was perfectly aware it was the desire of hon. Members to raise. Hon. Gentlemen had a perfect right to complain of his conduct; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman owed them an apology with regard to it. However, seeing that the right hon. Gentleman had agreed to postpone his Motion for the Speaker to leave the Chair until Thursday, he (Mr. Biggar) would now move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. KENNY said, he should be happy to second the Motion.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned,"—(Mr. Biggar,)—put, and agreed to.

MUNICIPAL DISQUALIFICATION (IRELAND) BILL.—[BILL 232.]

(Mr. Callan, Mr. Gray, Dr. Commins, Mr. Kenny.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Callan.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) said, he hoped the House would not consent to the second reading of this measure, which, in practice, would be found to be perfectly unnecessary. He believed that it had been insufficiently considered by the hon. Member (Mr. Callan) who had brought it forward. The measure would disqualify persons from holding municipal offices, where they had been guilty of certain indictable offences and had admitted having committed those offences, but, it would seem, did not provide any disqualification in the case of persons who had been convicted on trial for such indictable offences; and it would, therefore, have this singular effect—that it would disqualify a person who admitted his guilt, while a person who made no such admission, but was put on his trial and convicted, would not be disqualified at all. Further than that, a practical difficulty would necessarily arise in dealing with questions under the Bill—namely, that no mode of proving the fact of admission was prescribed. The evidence given in Court would not be authentically reported, and there would be disputes as to whether the person who made the admission had or had not admitted facts which amounted to a crime. Further than this, the Bill had this objectionable feature in it—that this disqualification would only take place in the case of persons actually elected to a municipal office, and who afterwards admitted themselves guilty of an indictable offence. It would not extend to persons who had made an admission and were afterwards elected. Therefore, it seemed to him that the Bill was manifestly insufficient and eminently illogical. If it were seriously intended to legislate upon this subject, it would be well for the hon. Gentleman to consult with those with whom he acted, to see whether they could not bring forward a more matured scheme. Though no names had been mentioned, probably it would be understood that the measure had been introduced to meet certain cases which had recently arisen; but he might mention in this regard that absence from a municipal borough for six months would render the seat vacant under the Municipal Corporations Act, and thus taking the case of a person absent from the 13th of January, the period which would tend to disqualify him would expire on the 13th of this month. Therefore it would be seen that, in the case of a person of this kind, such a measure as this would be unnecessary. For the reason that the measure was illogical and insufficient, he would suggest that it should not be proceeded with, and would move that it be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word “now,” and at the end of the Question to add the words “upon this day three months.”—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

Mr. CALLAN said, he thought he had great cause of complaint against the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, who had been guilty of a gross breach of faith towards him on this matter. The right hon. and learned Gentleman had misled him altogether on this subject. [“Oh, oh!”] Yes, he had misled him completely and distinctly. He (Mr. Callan) had crossed over from his seat in the House to the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and had spoken to him on the subject of this Bill, and the right hon. and learned Gentleman had told him that he did not object to the second reading, although he could not approve altogether of the character of the Bill, and that it would have to be considerably amended in Committee—in fact, that it would have to be recast. After having had plenty of opportunity of speaking to him (Mr. Callan) on the subject, the first intimation the right hon. and learned Gentleman had given him that he intended to oppose the Bill was this Motion of rejection. Was that a right way for an Irish Law Officer—a Member representing a Northern constituency—to treat a Member of the National Party in the House of Commons? Probably the right hon. and learned Gentleman objected to the Bill because it would disqualify the infamous James Carey. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) had taken off his block from the Bill when he was given to understand the object with which it was brought forward, and yet the Attorney General for Ireland was there to oppose its progress. No doubt, James Carey would be disqualified by the 13th of July by his continued absence; but he

(Mr. Callan) wanted to disqualify him by Act of Parliament—him or any other such man in Ireland. When the real character of such a man was known, and when he admitted upon oath that he had been guilty of the most fearful crimes, he should be at once disqualified from continuing in a municipal office.

MR. SPEAKER: I really must call upon the hon. Member to address himself to the merits of the Bill.

MR. CALLAN said, he had described the nature of the Bill, and whatever faults it might be found to have he should be ready to remove in Committee. It had been prepared by a Queen's Counsel, who was the senior of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, and all it would do would be to disqualify a person who confessed himself guilty of an infamous offence from continuing a member of a representative body; and he should have thought that the Government would have aided such a desirable object rather than have drawn an obstacle in its way.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) said, the hon. Gentleman had entirely misunderstood what had passed between them the other evening. He had given the hon. Member to understand that he perfectly sympathized with his object, but that the Bill would not carry it out. He had mentioned the objections to the measure, pointing out that it was perfectly hopeless to think of passing it; and if the hon. Member had understood him to say that he did not intend to oppose the second reading, he was altogether mistaken.

MR. CALLAN: The Bill has the effect of disqualifying James Carey, and that is why you object to it—everyone knows it.

Question put, and negatived.

Second reading put off for three months.

PUBLIC HEALTH — OUTBREAK OF CHOLERA IN EGYPT—SANITARY PRECAUTIONS.—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I wish to ask the noble Earl the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question, of which I have given him private Notice. Your Lordships are, no doubt, aware that, in consequence of the existence of cholera in Egypt, the French Government are taking precautionary measures against its introduction into France. I want to ask, Whether any similar measures are being taken by Her Majesty's Government?

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, my noble Friend has asked me a Question upon a very important subject. No doubt, the question of the public health is one to which every Government ought always to pay the most earnest and immediate attention. Your Lordships are aware that there has been a sudden outbreak of cholera in certain parts of Egypt, chiefly at Damietta, the climate of which is, at this time of the year, of a peculiarly unhealthy character. There is not, and never has been, the slightest evidence whatever of the cholera having been brought by ships from India; and with regard to any measures taken by the Government, while we have made inquiries into the subject, we have not thought it necessary to suggest any change whatever in the regulations for the protection of Egypt from the cholera, and we have no reason to believe that any change has been made in those regulations. The accounts we have received to-day in some of the newspapers is that the deaths from cholera on the 2nd of July were as follows:—Damietta, 130; Mansourah, 12; Damanhour, 4; and at Alexandria one suspicious death, which the doctor who made the examination would probably say had resulted from cholera. We are told that the Egyptian Government are, with great energy, taking steps to isolate the infected districts in which the cholera occurs. On hearing of the outbreak, my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War immediately telegraphed to the English military authorities in Egypt, requesting them to take most stringent precautions with regard to the health of the British troops, and particularly calling their attention to the regulations adopted in India with reference to cholera. I am happy to say that we have reason to believe those instructions from my noble Friend have already been anticipated by the highest English military authorities in Egypt before they reached that country. With regard to our Colonial ports, quarantine has been established for 10 days at Cyprus, and other precautions taken. At Malta, quarantine for 21 days, with other precautions, has been established; while at Gibraltar it has been established for 21 days. With regard to what has been done at home upon the subject of cholera, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Wemyss), in common with your Lordships, must be aware that the responsibility of dealing with cholera was 12 years ago transferred from the Privy Council to the Local Government Board. In 1873, Mr. Stansfeld issued an Order, which had been passed in Council, carrying out the three principles of medical inspection, disinfection, and isolation of those seized with illness. That Order remains in full force at this moment; but it has been thought proper, in case attention should not be given to it, to re-issue it immediately with some alterations of a substantial character. It is not for me to say anything of an official character as to what danger there is to Europe from this sudden outbreak; but it may be satisfactory to your Lordships to hear the opinion of one of the most eminent medical authorities of the day—Sir William Gull—upon the subject. It is contained in the following letter, written to me to-day, and which I will read to the House:—

“Dear Lord Granville,—I have watched, with some interest, the character of the reported outbreak of cholera in Egypt. Up to this time I have not thought there was much ground of alarm, either for Egypt, or for the spread of an epidemic of the disease in Europe. When epidemics of cholera have been extensive and severe, they have generally been preceded in the foregoing winter and spring by scattered cases, and there has been a history of outbreaks in some parts of the East. On this occasion it has not been so. The reported outbreak has been local and sudden, and I believe that at present we may expect it will subside and not become epidemic.

“I am, yours very truly,

LUNATIC POOR (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Lord President.)

(NO. 85.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it had been framed by the Irish Government with a view to dealing with a very serious evil in Ireland, and of relieving a very miserable class of persons—namely, those pauper lunatics, who were not at present confined in any asylum or workhouse, but were living as they best could with their friends, or were wandering at large about the country. The wretched condition of these persons had attracted the attention of the Irish Government, and they, being desirous of testing the information they had received on the subject, appointed a medical officer to make a test inquiry in two Poor Law Unions in Ireland—one in Dublin, and the other in the country. He (Lord Carlingford) had seen the Report of the Inspector, and the description he gave of the miserable persons whom he personally saw and examined was very painful. In the Report, he said he found lunatics in bed with no covering, some perfectly naked and lying on straw, and others filthy and perfectly neglected, and some bearing the appearance of suffering from want of food. There were many instances of mental suffering, combined with physical neglect, the sufferers frequently being children—their condition being most deplorable. That was the state of things to which the Bill desired to apply a remedy. That was the main object of the Bill, and it was proposed to attain it in this way. First, the Bill provided for the regular inspection of all the lunatic poor in Ireland who were not in any asylum or workhouse; in all cases of neglect and ill-treatment, a power of committal to the workhouse of the Union in which the lunatics resided was given. In the second place, the Bill transferred the control and supervision of all lunatics to the Local Government Board, in accordance with the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Lunacy appointed by the late Government. Under the Bill it would be the duty of the Guardians and the Relieving Officers of all Unions in Ireland to make themselves acquainted with all such cases as he had mentioned, and to bring them before the magistrates. It would then be the duty of the magistrates to call in the assistance of a medical officer to examine each case; and if, on that examination, and upon the certificate of the doctor, they thought it right, the Bill enabled them to send the lunatic to the workhouse of the Union in which he was found, there to remain until he was discharged cured. In this procedure the Bill followed the English Act of 1853, with the exception that, instead of being sent to the lunatic asylum of the county, the lunatics would be sent to the workhouse. The reason for this was, that there was no room in the Irish asylums for any more patients, the asylums already being overcrowded; and there was no prospect of the country being in a position to afford to make any addition to these very expensive institutions. It was further provided by the Bill that, in every Union, the Guardians should make, and keep, a list of all the lunatic poor within their Union; and all such lunatics should be periodically inspected by the medical officer, for the purpose of ascertaining whether they might be safely left where they were, at large, or whether it would be for their safety or comfort that they should be brought into the workhouse. In that particular the English Act was followed. In transferring the whole supervision and control of the lunatics in Ireland from the two Inspectors, as at present, to the Local Government Board, the Bill was in conformity with the recommendations of the Lunacy Inquiry Commission, which strongly advised that there should be one supervising authority in Ireland in lunacy cases. The obstacle in the way of this arrangement, they said, consisted in the present constitution of the Lunacy Department in Ireland, and they went on to recommend that the Local Government Board should have the responsibility. That was the proposal of the Bill. In asking their Lordships to read the Bill a second time, he did not recommend it as a complete measure upon the subject, or pretend that it carried out completely the recommendations of the Commission to which he had alluded; although, so far as it went, it was entirely on the lines of the Report of that Commission, and was, he believed, thoroughly approved of by the Commissioners themselves. Although not complete, it was brought in for the purpose of providing at once a remedy for a great evil, and a great deal of suffering which ought not to be allowed to exist longer; and he had no doubt that, if passed into law, it would, before long, lead to still greater improvements. The Bill might excite the fears of two classes. It might be feared, from the point of view of humanity, that the workhouse was not the best place for the treatment of lunatics. That he would not deny. But they ought to compare the condition of those poor neglected lunatics and idiots now with their condition as it would be in the workhouses. Though the workhouse was not, of course, as far as comfort or medical skill were concerned, equal to those expensive institutions, the county asylums, and though he fully admitted that the Lunacy Commission preferred a more perfect system of treatment for lunatics, by the erection of special auxiliary asylums in different parts of Ireland, he must say that they gave a most favourable opinion of the treatment of lunatics and idiots in a very large number of the Irish workhouses, and spoke of it as highly creditable to the liberality of the Guardians and the supervision of the Local Government Board. All things considered, it must be evident, he thought, that with proper management a workhouse might be made a sufficiently fit place for the care and treatment of harmless lunatics. He had no doubt it would be perfectly easy for the Local Government Board, when these new duties were imposed on them, and they felt the responsibility, to take care that proper care and humane treatment should be given to the lunatics and idiots committed to the Irish workhouses. The Bill might also excite fears from the ratepayers' or cesspayers' point of view. But in that respect it would make no difference, except that it would provide for the care in the workhouses of a certain increased number of neglected and often cruelly ill-treated persons. The additional cost would not be large; but, whatever it was, it was a charge which it was perfectly right that the rates should bear. The Bill would remove a large amount of human suffering, and would secure the treatment of lunacy in Ireland upon a better system than ever had prevailed before, while it would lead before long to still greater improvements. He begged to move the second reading of the Bill.

"Moved, That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord President.)

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, he would at once admit that the Bill was an attempt to deal with what was and had been a cruel evil in Ireland; but he held that the method proposed was not the best way of dealing with it, and that it would perpetuate another evil, which, though less, was still a very bad one. There was, no doubt, a great number of lunatics and idiots at large in Ireland, some of whom overflowed into this country; and they were often treated by their relatives in a very cruel manner, and therefore some legislation was required. But this Bill seemed to him to deal with the subject in the most unsatisfactory way. The noble Lord (the Lord President of the Council) had pointed out how those lunatics and idiots would be collected in the workhouses, and he appeared to think that there would be no increase of expense. He also spoke of the cesspayers; but it was the ratepayers and the landlords, not the cesspayers, who would have to pay the rates. Up to the present time, the lunatic asylums were being paid for by the cesspayers, and in addition there was a capitation grant of 4*s.* per head paid to them by the Government for each inmate, but nothing to the workhouses. Yet this Bill provided for an enormous increase of lunatics in the workhouses which were supported by the rates. His opinion of the unsuitability of the workhouses for such a purpose was strongly confirmed from personal observation. Beyond that the Commissioners reported that there was, in many cases, very imperfect accommodation in the workhouses for lunatics and idiots, who caused the greatest inconvenience in those establishments, that there was no regular staff provided for them, and no provision for their cleanliness, or for exercise. And yet the Bill proposed largely to increase the number of such persons in the workhouses. The Report also pointed out that, in the lunatic asylums, there were a great many curable cases; and proposed that a certain number of the asylums should be set apart for these cases, while others should be devoted to the dangerous and incurable cases. But the Bill went exactly in the teeth of that Report, except as regarded supervision.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, that he stated that the Commissioners were not in favour of committing these persons to the workhouses; but that they gave a very favourable account of the treatment of lunatics in a large number of the workhouses.

THE MARQUESS OF WATERFORD said, that the Report spoke of the great neglect of lunatics in workhouses. The real question was this—Were enormous numbers of lunatics to be placed in the workhouses, to the disadvantage, not only of the regular inmates, but of the lunatics themselves; and were the Government prepared to increase the burdens of the landlords by an addition to the poor rate? If so, he should be very much inclined to oppose the Bill; but he hoped to hear from his noble Friend the Lord President that there was a prospect of the adoption of some better system. The Bill was both costly and incomplete; costly, because the very first step to be taken, the fitting up of suitable wards, would require a good deal of money. Was it the intention of the Government to put their hands again in the pockets of the Irish landlords? He regarded it as a misfortune that this important subject should be dealt with in this piecemeal manner. Why did not the Government, as it was dealing with the matter at all, instead of doing so in this incomplete manner, follow the recommendations of the Royal Commission? At the present moment, they had only succeeded in introducing a Bill, which was bad for the lunatics, bad for the landlords, and bad for the occupiers.

LORD O'HAGAN said, he would admit that the present Bill was very imperfect and crude; but he did not think he ought to take upon himself the responsibility of preventing the passing of a measure introduced by the Government dealing with this question. Lunatics who possessed property were already well provided for; but that was by no means the case with the poor. Several attempts had been made to improve their condition; and in 1877 a comprehensive Bill was introduced, which applied to Ireland the whole of the English law on this subject; but the Government of the day were not prepared to accept the measure, and, instead of legislating, appointed a Royal Commission. That Commission inquired into the subject very fully, and reported very exhaustively; and the recommendations contained in its Report, if they had been adopted, would have had the effect of completely assimilating the Irish to the English system, which was a very important matter for Ireland. Nothing, however, was done in a further direction; and, now that so many efforts to help these poor people had been frustrated, he would not take upon himself to resist the present insufficient proposals. It appeared that in the course of the 20 years preceding 1878, the pauper lunatics of Ireland had increased from about 1,500 to about 3,000, and since that period, there was, as he understood, a great many more, so that it was obviously necessary to find a remedy for an evil of such magnitude, by which the sufferings of people so afflicted would be mitigated; but, whatever was done, it should always be borne in mind that the object was not to extend or to stereotype a bad system, but to find a better one. They all knew how indifferent both Houses of Parliament were concerning those matters; but, as they were now dealing with this particular subject, and alive as to the necessity for action with regard to it, he would say that if they did a little, and did not do enough, while they would be giving a palliative to the legislative conscience, they would be relegating to the distant future the passing of a proper measure that would have the effect of alleviating the sufferings of the helpless and hopeless poor creatures afflicted with lunacy. He would be a bold man who said that any effort in that direction should be resisted or rejected by the House. At the same time, he was bound to say, at once, that this was a most insufficient measure. He would not, however, as he had said, take upon himself the responsibility of opposing it, as he hoped it would be improved in Committee, inasmuch as he thought it was not by any means bad, as far as it went; and though it was characterized by many defects, it contained several useful provisions. For instance, it was well for the magistrates to be empowered to detain wandering lunatics, and keep them out of harm's way; and it was, no doubt, well that places in which lunatics were appointed to be received should be under medical inspection. This was as it should be; but a further application of the English system was most desirable. The condition of the Irish workhouses had lately attracted much attention, and it was to be hoped that they would be found suitable for the lunatics who, whether paupers or millionaires, ought to be treated in the same liberal manner. The conveniences and arrangements that were necessary were not to be found in Irish workhouses; and the danger was that, if the provisions of the Bill were not adequate, a bad system might be perpetuated, when otherwise it might be destroyed. He would not discuss the proposal to change the control from the Board of Control to the Local Government Board; but he would say that the Inspectors of Lunacy had always done their duty, and he hoped, when the change was made, those services would not be forgotten. The boarding-out of imbecile children and of adult lunatics, who were capable of being so dealt with, was adopted in Scotland, and had been followed for centuries in Belgium; and if it could be resorted to in Ireland it would relieve the gorged asylums and reduce the expenditure for such establishments. It seemed to him to be a proper remedy. If the Bill passed, the Government ought to consider some of the suggestions that had been made.

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, he was sure that every one of their Lordships would be in favour of any measure that would alleviate the sad and miserable condition of the pauper lunatics and idiots of Ireland; but he looked upon the present Bill with some mistrust, for it appeared to him that to carry it properly into effect would render necessary the forming of a properly constituted lunatic ward in every workhouse, and thereby increase the cost to the ratepayers. He was afraid, moreover, it would postpone indefinitely the passing of a better measure. The Bill did not give a magistrate power to commit to any workhouse in which there might be ample space, and which might have the licence of the Local Government Board; but it obliged a magistrate to order a committal to the workhouse of the Union to which the pauper belonged, without giving any power to vary the order. It should also be remembered that the habits of many of these unfortunate persons rendered it impossible that they could be associated with ordinary paupers. If the Bill were properly carried out, it would involve additional heavy charges on the rates, and they ought to be met by some grant from Imperial funds. Unless the Government were prepared to give that assistance, he should be inclined to think it best that the Bill should not be carried at that time. As special Notice had not been given of the measure for that evening, he did not, however, propose to move its rejection; but, when the Bill came to the third reading, he thought its rejection ought to be moved.

THE EARL OF ROSSE said, that he fully concurred with other noble Lords who had spoken, in giving a general approval to the Bill. But while doing so, he thought it would increase the expense to the ratepayers, and, at the same time, it would not give the lunatics any increased accommodation—in fact, if the Bill was passed in its present form, it would remain a dead letter. However, if in Committee some considerable Amendments were moved, it would, perhaps, make the Bill more satisfactory. There could be no doubt that its further consideration would involve, as his noble Friend (the Earl of Limerick) had remarked, an obligation on the part of the Government to consider the suggestion as to making some grant from the Imperial Exchequer.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he hoped the Government would not press

the Bill, as it did not appear to be acceptable to anybody. He could not oppose it; but he was equally unwilling it should pass in its present shape.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, that after listening to the speeches against the Bill, and still more to the speech delivered by his noble and learned Friend (Lord O'Hagan) in its favour, he did not think the prospects of the Bill were very bright. However, the Irish Government took the greatest interest in the measure, and had promoted it solely with a desire to relieve a great deal of suffering and misery; and, therefore, he should be sorry if the Bill were not read a second time. In moving the second reading, he made allowance for the two classes of objections, which he anticipated—namely, the objections of those who did not agree to the transferring of the maintenance of the institutions from the county cess, which was paid by the occupiers alone, to the poor rate, which was paid by the owners and occupiers combined; and the fears of the humanitarians, who, apparently, would prefer that these wretched creatures should remain at large in the streets, unless they were treated in the most refined and expensive manner in lunatic asylums of the best kind, and who would rather have nothing done unless their schemes were carried out. He now found that he had not rated those objections sufficiently high; and he saw how powerful their effect was in that House. He could assure their Lordships that all the criticisms that had been made on the Bill should be duly considered, and there should be no hurry in pressing it forward; but he hoped their Lordships would assent to the second reading.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that after the melancholy speech of the noble Lord opposite (the Lord President of the Council), he should be glad to know when they might expect the next stage of the Bill to be taken?

PAWNBROKERS BILL.—(No. 79.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clauses 1 and 2 severally agreed to.

Clause 3 (Assistance in the recovery of stolen goods to be given by pawnbrokers).

EARL FORTESCUE moved, in page 1, line 21, an Amendment to dispense with the attendance of a police constable in cases of search when notice had been given of stolen articles to the pawnbroker, and to provide for the attendance of the owner, or some friend, or servant, or relative of the owner, who could identify the article, which a policeman generally would be unable to do.

Amendment moved, in page 1, line 21, after ("behalf") insert ("other than a police constable.")—(The Earl Fortescue.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that considerable concessions had been made to pawnbrokers in that Bill, as compared with the Bill of last year. It was not as if the owner or policeman had power generally to overhaul the goods in the pawnbroker's shop; search would be carried on by the pawnbroker himself. If the Amendment were limited so that any person appointed by the owner, even though that person should be a police constable, could conduct the search, he would accept the Amendment.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he would accept the suggestion of the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack.

Amendment (The Earl Fortescue) (by leave of the Committee) withdrawn.

Amendment, in page 1, line 21, leave out ("acting"), and insert ("appointed by him to act,")—(The Lord Chancellor),—agreed to.

On the Motion of The Lord HENNIKER, the following Amendment made:—In page 1, line 22, after ("possession") insert ("received after the date of the robbery and.")

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Duty of pawnbrokers to answer police inquiries respecting stolen articles).

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE moved an Amendment providing that only constables specially chosen for the purpose should be empowered to conduct searches in pawnbrokers' shops. It was not right to intrust such powers to any inexperienced constable. A pawnbroker's business was of a confidential character, and he might reasonably object to the disclosure of his customers' secrets. A young and inexperienced constable might go into a shop where there were 20,000 articles, and insist on the proprietor turning over every one. It would be better that men with special knowledge in the matter should be appointed, and that the wishes of the pawnbrokers should, as far as possible, be acceded to. It should be borne in mind that the evidence given before the Committee of their Lordships' House showed that, as a class, pawnbrokers bore a very high character.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 3, after ("by any") insert ("specially authorized.")—(The Earl of Pembroke.)

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that if a constable came to search, he could understand the necessity of his coming with proper authority; but here the constable only came to inquire, and the pawnbroker was to search for himself.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON wanted to know who was to authorize the constable, and what was to be understood by special authority?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would point out that the clause only related to inquiries, and gave no power to the constable to search.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 5 (Pawnbrokers to enter in pledge book distinctive marks on pledges).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would propose, with the view of meeting an Amendment placed on the Paper by the noble Earl (the Earl of Pembroke), and by way of relieving the pawnbroker to some extent from liability, to substitute for the words "any articles pawned," the words "all watches or articles of plate or jewellery pawned with him, and all other goods pawned for the sum of 20s. and upwards." With that alteration he thought the clause would meet every reasonable objection. The entry of distinctive marks on articles of the description to which he had referred would enable a pawnbroker in a police court to say whether a particular article produced had been in his possession or not. He hoped their Lordships would adhere to the clause as amended, for it was, perhaps, the most valuable clause in the whole Bill; and as to watches and jewellery, the practice of 90 out of 100 of the respectable pawnbrokers in London was already to have columns in their books for an entry of the distinctive marks.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 27, leave out ("any articles pawned") and insert ("all watches or articles of plate or jewellery pawned with him, and all other goods pawned with him, for the sum of twenty shillings or upwards.")—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE EARL OF PEMBROKE said, he would admit that the alteration got rid of much of the objection he entertained to the clause; but, even with the proposed limitation, it would, in his opinion, prove extremely onerous to pawnbrokers, and would add so materially to their expenses that it ought to be struck out of the Bill.

LORD HENNIKER said, that the Act of 1872 only required nine columns in the pledge book. This clause proposed to add another column, to make the entries in which would require the employment of a skilled person, and add to the pawnbroker's expenses. He thought the clause a very oppressive one.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, he thought that the concession made by the noble and learned Earl on the Wool-sack was a very considerable one; and he hoped, therefore, his noble Friend (the Earl of Pembroke) would not divide the Committee. Some further revision might, however, be made in the clause as to the registration of marks on articles pawned. He held in his hand a spoon on which a crown and anchor could be clearly seen; but an ordinary inspection would not suffice to show that a broad arrow was mixed up with the other illegible marks. With the best intentions there would be a difficulty in carrying out the clause.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that he, too, had been examining his own watch, and was unable, even with the assistance of a magnifying glass, to make out the number. It consisted of five figures, and there was also a quantity of other marks, all equally illegible. Yet, by the Bill, the unfortunate pawnbroker was bound to have all these marks registered; and how he was to do that he (the Marquess of Salisbury) would like to know. He thought that some words should be introduced to show that the pawnbroker was only bound to record such marks and inscriptions as were practicable.

Amendment agreed to.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that, with a view to obviate the criticisms upon the clause, he would propose to amend it, so that the pawnbroker would be only bound to register "such clear and distinctive" inscriptions and marks as appeared on articles.

Amendment, in page 1, line 25, after ("such") insert ("clear and,")—(The Lord Chancellor,)—agreed to.

Clause 6 (Detention of persons offering stolen articles).

EARL FORTESCUE said, he objected to the provisions in the clause by which pawnbrokers were required to seize and detain persons who offered to pledge or sell any article or articles which the pawnbroker suspected or had reasonable cause to suspect had been stolen. It might be physically impossible for the pawnbroker to comply with the requirements of the law. In thews and sinews the pawnbroker might often be very inferior to the powerful Bill Sikes, whom this clause compelled him to attempt to seize and detain.

LORD ABERDARE said, it was necessary that the clause should throw the express duty of detaining persons offering stolen goods upon the pawnbroker wherever practicable.

On the Motion of The Earl of LIMERICK, the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 34, omit ("suspects or.")

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Remaining clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

Schedule agreed to.

LORD NORTON, in moving the insertion of a new clause, to follow Clause 21, said, it often happened that a man pawned an article for 10s. or 20s. and immediately sold the ticket, went to the pawnbroker, made a declaration that he had lost it, and next day, presenting the declaration, redeemed the article with the money which he had received from the vendee. Shortly afterwards the vendee honestly appeared, showed the ticket, and demanded the article pledged, and the pawnbroker was obliged to pay him the value. The only remedy he had was a prosecution at the Assizes entirely at his own expense, for the expenses of a prosecution were not allowed in such a case, and he had to pay from £10 to £20 in addition to the loss he had sustained by the fraud of the pawner. Giving a power in Petty Sessions to deal summarily with such a case by fine or imprisonment would remedy such injustice and check the frauds so prevalent. That was really the chief change needed in the pawnbrokers' law. Pawnbrokers were mainly a well-conducted class, not to be confounded with the marine store dealers; they helped to detect robberies, and were themselves constantly plundered with impunity.

Moved, In page 8, after Clause 21, to insert as a new Clause—

"So much of the twenty-ninth section of the thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth Victoria, chapter ninety-three, as enacts that any person making the declaration provided in the fifth sub-section of the third schedule of that Act, of a pawn-ticket being lost, knowing the same to be false, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour and liable to the punishment attached to perjury, is repealed; and in lieu thereof be it enacted, that such person shall be liable, on summary conviction, to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds, or to be imprisoned for not exceeding six months."—(The Lord Norton.)

Motion agreed to; Clause inserted accordingly.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Tuesday next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 136.)

PUBLIC HEALTH (DAIRIES, &c.) BILL.

(The Lord President.)

(No. 92.) COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clauses 1 to 12, inclusive, severally agreed to.

Clause 13 (Application to Scotland).

LORD BALFOUR, in moving the omission of the clause, said, that his object was to prevent the application of the Bill to Scotland. He thought it was a very unfortunate course to apply the Bill to Scotland, because the way in which the Bill was drawn showed that it was primarily intended to apply to England, since it proposed to transfer powers now exercised by the Privy Council to the Local Government Board. There might, or might not, be in future a Local Government Board for Scotland; but if there was to be, he thought it would be much preferable to wait until it was established, and then transfer from the Privy Council to that Board any powers it might be desirable it should exercise. The Bill, if passed, would take from the county and burgh authorities some of the powers they exercised under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act of 1878, and transfer them to the local sanitary authorities. In Scotland, the local sanitary authorities were small bodies, being the Parochial Boards of the landward parishes, and the Police Commission or Town Council, as the case might be, in burghs. He understood that one of the reasons for the proposed transference was that the powers of the Act of 1878 had not been generally exercised. There were at present 112 local authorities in Scotland under that Act, and only 24 of them had put the powers conferred on them in force; but, of the 24, not less than 16 were county authorities, and 8 were burgh authorities. There were 33 counties in Scotland and 78 burghs, and the effect of the change would be, that the execution of these powers in the landward districts would be entrusted to the same class of persons as in the burghs, who had already failed, with a small exception, to carry them out. Anyone who knew what the constitution of a Parochial Board was would agree with him that it was a very unfit body to have such extensive powers entrusted to it as were proposed by the Bill. It seemed to him that the parish was much too small an area in which to work an Act of this kind, and that it was much better and more economically done, and with much less friction, when worked by the county authority. If the noble Lord opposite (the Lord President) said that the county was too large an area, he (Lord Balfour) would reply that it was better to wait until a Local Government Board was formed for Scotland, and then see whether some other authority could not be devised for working the Act. If the Bill in the present state of matters were applied to Scotland, he was convinced that nothing but evil would ensue from it; and, so far from the Act of 1878 being more zealously worked, the very reverse would be the result. He moved the omission of the clause.

Moved, "To leave out Clause 13."—
(The Lord Balfour.)

THE EARL OF CARNARVON said, that there was a rather general impression that this Bill created certain new powers. Was that so? He believed it simply proposed a transference of powers already in existence from one authority to another, but thought it would be desirable that his noble Friend (the Lord President) should make such a statement on the subject as would re-assure those concerned.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, he was glad the noble Earl (the Earl of Carnarvon) had asked the question, because it gave him the opportunity of stating that the Bill was absolutely limited to the transfer of the powers of the 4th section of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act of 1878 from the Privy Council to the Local Government Board. The fact was that a purely sanitary clause found its way into that Act which had nothing whatever to do with diseases in animals, and was entirely concerned with matters affecting the health of mankind; and the proposal was to transfer the working of that clause to the Department which was concerned with all other sanitary matters, without the smallest addition. As to the proposal to omit Scotland from the Act, he had done his best, since the noble Lord opposite (Lord Balfour) last stated his views, to ascertain how the matter lay, and he had quite failed to convince himself that there was any sufficient reason for omitting Scotland. This was a purely sanitary matter; and if the Scottish sanitary authorities were fit to deal with all other sanitary matters, they were surely fit to deal with this, and they would henceforth be under the direction of the Board which was charged with sanitary matters. He failed to see how the Bill introduced into the other House, with reference to Scottish Business, affected this question. It proposed a Scotch Department in London, but not to meddle with the Departments in Edinburgh; and he had no reason to believe that it would affect anything except the management of Scotch Business in London. It would not affect the constitution or the powers of the Boards in Edinburgh. He, therefore, hoped the noble Lord would not press his Motion.

Lord Balfour

LORD BALFOUR said, he had no intention of discussing what was the precise effect of the Bill just introduced into the other House; but, if the view of the noble Lord opposite (the Lord President) was correct, the measure was of a much more limited nature than the people of Scotland believed. As to the Bill now before their Lordships, he repeated that, if the reason for it was that the existing authorities had not put in force the powers in the Act of 1878, it proposed, in order to correct that failure, to take away the administration of them from the authority in Scotland, one-half of which did put them into force, and to give it to an authority all over Scotland, corresponding with that of which only one-tenth had put them into force.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON said, he would ask his noble Friend (Lord Balfour) not to press his Motion. He thought the proposal of the noble Lord (the Lord President) was a very proper one. His noble Friend spoke about the local authority in Scotland putting the powers in the Act of 1878 in force. He believed his noble Friend was connected with some authorities who had done so; but still the fact remained that out of 112 local authorities in Scotland only 24 enforced these regulations. He disagreed with his noble Friend when he said that the parish was too small an area in which to put the Act in force. It seemed to him (the Duke of Richmond and Gordon) that the fact of its being a small area would make it much more easy to ascertain whether the dairies were in good or bad condition. His own idea was, that these provisions had hitherto done an immense deal of good; and he believed it would be greatly to the advantage of both countries that this Bill should pass into law.

LORD CARLINGFORD (LORD PRESIDENT of the COUNCIL) said, that under the Bill it was probable that the local authorities who had done nothing would hear something from the Board of Supervision, which possessed means of exercising a supervision such as the Privy Council did not possess.

Motion disagreed to.

Remaining clause agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment; and to be read 3<sup>a</sup> on Thursday next.

REGISTRY OF DEEDS (IRELAND) BILL.

(The Lord O'Hagan.)

(NO. 97.) SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD O'HAGAN, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it was intended to carry out the recommendations of a Committee which inquired into the subject of extending the provisions of the Bank Holiday Act to the clerks in the Registry of Deeds Office in Ireland. The proposal was to add four holidays to that which the clerks at present enjoyed, and he thought no one would be inclined to oppose such a proposal.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2<sup>a</sup>."
—(The Lord O'Hagan.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2<sup>a</sup> accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

RAILWAYS (CONTINUOUS BRAKES) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to provide for the use of Continuous Brakes on passenger trains on railways—Was presented by The Earl DE LA WARR; read 1<sup>a</sup>. (No. 136.)

House adjourned at Seven o'clock,

Leave given to the Committee of Selection to make a Special Report:—

SIR JOHN B. MOWBRAY accordingly reported from the Committee of Selection, That they had discharged the following Members from the Standing Committee on Trade, Shipping, and Manufactures:—Lord Eustace Cecil, Mr. H. W. Fitzwilliam, Mr. Justin M'Carthy.

And had appointed in substitution:—Mr. Brinton, Lord Claud Hamilton, Mr. Leamy.

Special Report to lie upon the Table.

QUESTIONS.

LUNATIC POOR (IRELAND).

COLONEL KING-HARMAN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will give some intimation, during the present Session, of the manner in which Her Majesty's Government propose to deal with the question of harmless lunatics and idiots in Ireland; and, if he will endeavour to bring in a Bill early next Session to legislate on this important subject?

MR. TREVELYAN: I do not think I could satisfactorily enter upon this subject in replying to a Question; but perhaps I may find an opportunity of doing so when the Estimate for the Lunacy Department is under consideration. I will endeavour to bring in a Bill next Session, should the Bill which has already been introduced in "another place" not reach the House this Session.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—SCHOOLS COMPULSORILY CLOSED.

MR. RANKIN asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether, in the case of a school compulsorily closed on account of infectious illness or for any other reason, instructions might be given to the Government Inspector of such school to take into his consideration the length of time for which the school in question had been closed, and to make a corresponding allowance in the acquirements of the children, so as to enable the school to be classified in the same standard, and so to earn the same grant, as it otherwise would have done if it had not been closed?

MR. MUNDELLA: Under the Code now in force the period during which a school is compulsorily closed does not count as part of the 22 weeks of attendance which qualifies a child for examination. The Inspector, however, may waive the examination of children who have suffered from epidemic illness; and the fact that the school has been compulsorily closed will be taken into account in assessing the merit grant, as the Code requires the Inspector to have regard "to the special circumstances of the case."

THE IRISH BUTTER TRADE—CORK BUTTER MARKET.

MR. A. MOORE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the evidence given before the Richmond Commission has satisfied him of the existence of grave abuses in the Cork Butter Market, particularly in the matter of the inspection; and, whether, if unwilling to take the subject in hand themselves, the Government would look with favour upon any well-considered scheme of reform promoted by private Members?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am afraid there is too much reason to think that some abuses do exist, especially in the details of the inspection; and, should any well-considered scheme of reform be promoted by private Members, I will be happy to give it my best consideration.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—WORKHOUSE HOSPITALS.

MR. A. MOORE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that the workhouse hospitals are in many districts the only similar institutions available for paying patients and people in well-to-do circumstances, who are suffering from infectious diseases; whether he is also aware that there are powers of compulsory removal of such persons from their homes under certain circumstances; whether it is a fact that all persons, except the men of the Royal Irish Constabulary, are compelled to wear the workhouse uniform, provided by the Guardians, whilst in hospital, and that great exception is taken to this by paying patients; and, whether, taking these facts into account, with a view to check the spread of infection, by removing every obstacle to such persons going into hospital, he would urge the Local Government Board to modify their rules in this respect?

Mr. Mundella

MR. TREVELYAN: The facts are as stated in the first two paragraphs of this Question. With regard to the dress of patients, the present practice has been in force since the year 1862. Boards of Guardians were then advised by the Local Government Board that persons in fever hospitals ought not to be allowed to wear their own clothing, in order to prevent the danger of infection when they returned to the neighbourhood in which they lived, but that a simple form of hospital dress, having nothing in common with the ordinary workhouse dress, should be provided. The Local Government Board believe that in some instances Guardians relax this rule in the case of the Constabulary and other paying patients; but they regard this relaxation as very objectionable. They think that persons returning to their own homes in the dress they have worn in hospital are likely to spread infection. This opinion appears to be well founded; and I fear, therefore, that any change in the regulations such as is suggested by the hon. Member would not be likely to tend towards the restriction of the spread of infection.

EGYPT—OUTBREAK OF CHOLERA.

MR. GOURLEY (for Sir EDWARD WATKIN) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, considering the appearance of epidemic cholera in Egypt, in the vicinity of the Suez Canal, Her Majesty's Government are taking steps to bring about an International Convention as to quarantine, with a view not merely to checking the progress of the disease, but also to minimising inconvenience and loss to the shipping interest and to travellers; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the scheme for International agreement as to quarantine formulated in 1879, by Sir Sherston Baker, barrister-at-law, and published in that year by the Association for the Reform and Codification of the Law of Nations?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: My hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland (Mr. Gourley) has a similar Question for Thursday, and I propose to reply to his Question now, as well as to that of my hon. Friend. Her Majesty's Government have no present intention of taking steps to bring about an International Convention or Congress as to quarantine, nor have they received any proposals to that effect. Her Majesty's Government are acquainted with the proceedings of the Association for the Reform and Codification of the Law of Nations, and the views of the author referred to.

STREET TRAFFIC (METROPOLIS)— TRAFFIC AT HAMILTON PLACE.

MR. ROLLS asked the First Commissioner of Works, If, in consideration of the great inconvenience caused by the block of traffic at the corner of Hamilton Place, arrangements could be made by utilizing Park Lane, at present almost unused, for the traffic going Southward, leaving Hamilton Place free for traffic going Northward?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that the Office which I represent has no jurisdiction whatever over the streets, and that I am quite unable to carry out what the hon. Member recommends. I also understand that the police, since 1870, have had no power of regulating the traffic in the streets so as to enforce any such regulation.

PARLIAMENT—PUBLIC BUSINESS—PRECEDENCE OF GOVERN-MENT ORDERS.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Mr. Speaker, I beg to move the Motion that stands on the Orders of the Day in the name of the Prime Minister, in accordance with the statement which he made in the House yesterday—namely,

“That Government Orders have precedence, this Evening, of the Notices of Motions and the other Orders of the Day, and that Government Orders have precedence To-morrow.”

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Do I understand that this is an Order merely for to-day and to-morrow, and that next week, when a Motion is made to take private Members' nights for the remainder of the Session, we shall then have an opportunity of considering the whole of the subject?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Yes.

MR. THEODORE FRY wished to express the great regret of himself and other Members that this course on the part of the Government would prevent the Committee stage to-night of the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday (Durham) Bill being taken. This was a measure which had already been read a second time by a majority of 3 to 1; and it was of so much importance that he trusted the Government would give a Saturday Sitting in order that it might be pushed forward.

MR. GORST could not say that he felt at all pleased with the precedent that was being set on this occasion. The principle on which the Business of the House had hitherto been conducted was this—If the Government wished to interfere with the days allotted to private Members, they either obtained the general consent of the House and of the Members who had secured those days, or at the end of the Session, when Public Business became urgent, a full statement of the intentions of the Government was made to the House. Neither of these courses had been taken, and he felt considerable alarm that this should be taken as a precedent, and that Governments in the future should come down and demand two or three days of private Members' time without conforming to either of the conditions he had named. He did not wish to oppose this Motion; but he thought it should not be allowed to pass without some protest.

MR. RYLANDS also would not oppose this Motion; but he wished to fix upon the attention of the Government the strong necessity there was for not allowing Supply to get further into arrear. He trusted that on Monday the House would have a statement from the Prime Minister that a certain proportion of Mondays and Thursdays would be devoted to this object, for Supply was already in a very backward state, and a considerable number of Votes yet remained to be taken. He quite agreed that it was desirable that those measures which the Government desired to pass should be properly considered; but it was equally important, and not less the duty of the House, that it should insist on having ample opportunities for dealing with Supply.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS agreed with what had fallen from the hon. Member who had last spoken. He thought the Motion ought to be agreed to only on the condition that a distinct statement was made on Monday as to the intentions of the Government with regard to the Bills before the House. The House also ought to insist on another matter, which was that if private Members' nights were taken the Government should not take up the "fad" of one particular section, otherwise he was quite sure the House would not grant the facilities which the Prime Minister desired. He hoped also that some arrangement would be made so that recourse need not be had to Saturday Sittings. Last Session, it would be remembered the House had an Autumn Sitting for the discussion of the New Rules, and just before the House rose in December the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hartington) gave a promise that the House should have an opportunity of reviewing the operations of the Sessional Order relating to the Grand Committees before the middle of this July. [Mr. GLADSTONE dissented.] The right hon. Gentleman shook his head; but there could be no doubt that there was a distinct understanding. He should like to know what the Government were going to do in the matter?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had no doubt that, after the Motion of the Prime Minister on Monday had been made, very little time would remain for private Members. But there was a question in which he was more particularly interested—the South African Question. He understood the Prime Minister to state that he was quite aware that a discussion would be desirable before the close of the Session. He (Mr. Forster) could only state that discussion was made more desirable by the statement that the Envoys were coming over from the Transvaal; and, as they would hardly arrive in this country before the Session closed, it was important that there should be some Parliamentary discussion before the Prorogation. The subject could not be very conveniently discussed in Committee of Supply; but he did not know that any other time could be asked. He hoped, however, that his right hon. Friend would consider the matter between now and Monday; and if it was decided to take the debate on the South African Vote, one night at the beginning of an evening would be fixed.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH said, it might, perhaps, be convenient to the House and the right hon. Gentleman, if he stated that, under the circumstances at present existing, he did not wish to hold the right hon. Gentleman to the conditional promise he had made as to finding a convenient time for the discussion of the Motion of which he (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) had given Notice nearly a month ago—that this House should resolve itself into a Committee to inquire into the state of affairs in South Africa. Since that time Her Majesty's Government had taken a very important decision with regard to Basutoland—the principles or the necessity of which he did not at all desire to question; and as to the details, they were not, and, perhaps, could not be, in a condition to be discussed at present. With regard to the Transvaal, he had been desirous, ever since the commencement of the Session, to bring this question under the consideration of the House, and he thought he had some reason to complain that he not been able to do so. He did not wish to dwell upon that now. What he had been anxious to do was, to prove to the House that the Transvaal Convention had failed, and that Her Majesty's Government were responsible for that failure. He thought that the very fact that Her Majesty's Government were preparing to revise that Convention, not yet 18 months old, in concert with persons who, for whatever reasons, had been unable or unwilling to fulfil their obligations with regard to it, showed that it was a failure; and, that being admitted, as he thought it must be admitted, surely it followed that the Government who concluded the Convention were responsible in the matter? Therefore, as the case which he desired to establish seemed to be incontestably proved by facts, he had no wish to call the attention of the House to what had already passed on that subject. But he thought there was much force in the views already expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster), especially after the statement that had been made, that the Convention was to be considered by Her Majesty's Government in concert with Envoys from the Transvaal, who could not arrive before the autumn; and it was surely desirable that they should have some distinct statement of what the Government contemplated in the revision of the Convention. He thought they ought to have a full opportunity of debating the matter in the House, and he doubted whether it would be an entirely satisfactory opportunity to do so on the Estimates. He would have thought, after the view expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford, that he, and those who agreed with him, might have been disposed to obtain by distinct Motion some expression from the House as to the direction in which that revision should take place. He had also been anxious to bring under the consideration of the House the condition of affairs in Zululand. He observed that his hon. Friend the Member for the North Riding of Yorkshire (Mr. Guy Dawnay), who had great personal knowledge of this matter, had given Notice of a Motion standing on the Order Book, which raised in direct and distinct terms an issue before the House. He did hope that, as he was not now asking the right hon. Gentleman to fulfil the conditional promise he made in regard to his Notice of Motion, he would favourably consider the claims of his hon. Friend the Member for the North Riding for an opportunity for discussion. It was a matter which had never been discussed in the House, and one on which those on his side of the House held very strong opinions, and on which they thought the judgment of the House ought to be taken.

MR. W. FOWLER pointed out that the Motion calling upon private Members to give up their Wednesdays was made very much earlier than was usual. In 1878 the Motion was not made until the 15th of July; in 1879 it was the 14th of July; in 1880 it was the 12th of July; in 1881 it was the 1st of August; and in 1882 it was not made until the 24th of July. He did not rise to oppose the Motion; but he wished to point out that they might almost as well be asked to give up Wednesdays altogether—[Cheers.—]—for now it was absolutely useless to put down private Members' Bills after the middle of June. [Renewed cheers.] If that was the opinion of the House, of course he would not complain; but till it was made known he thought private Members had a right to protest. He thought the principle involved in the question under discussion was a very serious one.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he was glad to see the Home Secretary in his place, as he was in the House when the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War made the statement referred to. There were a large number of Amendments on the Paper, chiefly in the name of his hon.

and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) and himself; and they waived those Amendments on the distinct understanding that the House should have the fullest opportunity of revising the proceedings of the Standing Committees. He only wished to say one word with respect to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) about Supply, and he hoped it would be pressed on the Prime Minister. Nothing could be more satisfactory than the way in which the Prime Minister had fulfilled the pledges with regard to Supply; but there were two Votes which he wished the Prime Minister to except from the ordinary course—namely, the Vote for the Representative in the Transvaal, and the Vote for Major Baring. The appointment of Major Baring would mark a new departure; and there could not be a better opportunity than on that Vote of reviewing the past conduct of Her Majesty's Government with regard to Egypt.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would endeavour to answer, as well as he could, the various points that had been raised. As there was an opinion that the public purse was a bottomless purse, and so capable of meeting every call upon it, so there seemed to be an impression in the House that the time at the disposal of the Government after the middle of July was virtually unlimited, and that they could give as much as every Gentleman might want for the discussion of what he deemed to be a very important matter. Now, he (Mr. Gladstone) must point out that the time which they might take, if the House chose to give it—and he was sure the House would bear witness that they had no desire to take it on this occasion, except with the free will of the House—was, after all, only a limited quantity, which it was not in their power to extend, and which they could do no more than distribute as best they could. In taking time to consider the course to be pursued, they had to regard more especially the condition of the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill. It was quite true, as the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had said, that the course proposed was quite an exceptional one, and that there had been a desire expressed in the House that it should be marked as an exceptional proceeding; and he was seconding the wish of the House that it should not be betrayed into making it a precedent, but that it should be distinctly and fully recognized that the proceeding at present asked for should not bind the House. It had been said that he never admitted a citation from Hansard. He believed that in the course, perhaps, of 50 citations from Hansard, which had been made for him or against him, there might have been one or two cases in which he had said that he could not recognize that they fully conveyed his meaning. With regard to what his noble Friend the Secretary of State for War had said about the revision of the Standing Order relating to Standing Committees, he found, on reference to Hansard, that what his noble Friend had said was—

“If it was proposed to renew the Resolutions, either in their present or in any other shape, it ought to be done when the House was in a condition to fully and adequately discuss them; and he would make every effort in his power to secure that that should take place before the end of July.”—(3 Hansard, [275] 517-18.)

That accorded with his own recollection. Of course, if the Government made no Motion the matter would fall to the ground; but he would say at once that they would not think it a subject at all fit to be brought forward after the House had ceased the full flow of its attendance; and he therefore trusted that that would be regarded as a satisfactory declaration. With regard to the question of Supply raised by his hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands), although it was quite true that the progress made had not been very great, yet it would not be forgotten that upwards of a fortnight was occupied at the opening of the Session in the debate on the Address, and that there was also an interruption—an unavoidable one, perhaps—which occupied two or three weeks in reference to the Parliamentary Oaths Bill. Under the circumstances, the Government were desirous of doing the best in their power, in the first instance, to dispose of the Committee on the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, and then to launch themselves into Committee on the Agricultural Holdings (England) Bill. He hoped that this would be taken as a distinct and final indication of their intentions to obtain the judgment of the House on these two Bills. With regard to everything else, he did not think any difficulty would arise; but the House would hold them responsible for making the best use they could of the limited fund of time now left, and hon. Members would be judges of how that was done. He quite agreed that a convenient time might be asked for the discussion in Committee of Supply of the Vote for the salary of Major Baring and for the Transvaal; but he was not able to say at present what desire or what cause there might be for a separate discussion with respect to Zululand, and he would rather not say anything then on that subject. He entirely agreed with what had been signified by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Forster) with regard to the Transvaal, and hoped a convenient opportunity would be found for the discussion of the question. With respect to Supply generally, he was sure his hon. Friend (Mr. Rylands) would not desire, by thrusting forward Supply, to prevent the adequate discussion of the legislative measures of the Government. The Government thought it was the desire of the House that the two Bills he had mentioned should have preference till they had got through the laborious stage of Committee. After that, or before that if necessary, they should have no disposition, on the one hand, to throw over those Bills which were of interest and importance to the country, and that the country wished to see passed, nor, on the other hand, to give these Bills an undue preference over Supply. He hoped the House would be disposed to sit patiently until these measures were disposed of. They should have a better opportunity of dealing with this subject when they came to consider it on Monday next.

MR. W. H. SMITH reminded the Prime Minister that as late as last Thursday he made an engagement with regard to the Navy Estimates, with which at present very little progress had been made. They were engaged in an important discussion on the condition of the Navy, and considerable time would still have to be devoted to it. He hoped, therefore, that an early day would be fixed for resuming the discussion on the Navy Estimates. With regard to the point referred to by the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), he hoped also that some early Monday and Thursday would be taken for Supply, seeing that the Government would have Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Fridays for their ordinary Business.

MR. STEVENSON expressed regret that the opportunity would be lost, through the arrangements made by the Government, of bringing on the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors on Sunday Bill, in which he could assure the House the public took great interest.

MR. RAIKES confessed that he was disappointed that the Prime Minister had not availed himself of the opportunity presented him to take a more decided stand with regard to Wednesdays, because he was sure the House would willingly respond to the Government taking that day. ["No!"] At all events, he was content to leave it on record that if the Prime Minister brought forward any proposal to appropriate Wednesdays he would support him. With regard to Tuesdays, however, the case was very different, and he would make an earnest appeal that there should be no invasion of Fridays before the end of July. He wished to call the attention of the Government to a very important Motion of which Notice had been given for the last Friday of the present month, and which referred to the question of National Education. With regard, also, to the Bill which stood first in the Orders of to-morrow, he desired to state that it would be met by a very substantial opposition; and he trusted that on Monday next the Government would be prepared to take a decided course in respect to Wednesdays.

MR. E. A. LEATHAM said, he had secured the first Order on Wednesday week for a subject in which great interest was felt by many Members in the House, and by a large portion of the public—reform of patronage in the Church of England. He had previously been unfortunate in getting an opportunity to bring forward this question, and it seemed as if he would be equally unfortunate this year. Last year he had no reason to complain of the postponement, because the Business then before the House was of an urgent character; but that was not the case now, and he put it to the House whether, under the circumstances, it would be fair for the Government to take Wednesdays? He had been in the House a good many years, and they had always been pottering with the Law of Elections and tinkering the Law of Bankruptcy.

In a year or two's time they would probably make an entirely new departure on both these questions.

MR. ONSLOW complained of the late period of the Session at which the Indian Budget was usually brought forward, and asked the Prime Minister to consider whether he would give facilities for the discussion of a Motion which he had on the Paper relating to India, and on which the whole question of the Egyptian policy of the Government would be raised? He also hoped the Prime Minister would be in a position, when the Papers relating to the Ilbert Bill were laid before the House, to state the views of the Government respecting that important matter. He trusted, moreover, that on Monday the Prime Minister would be prepared to state that it was not the intention of the Government to afford special facilities to private Members to bring forward any of the huge number of Liquor Bills which had been introduced. He also wished to know whether the Government would give a day for the discussion of the Congo Treaty, should any Treaty be agreed upon?

MR. CARBUTT remarked, that the affairs of India were generally left over to the end of the Session, and he hoped the Government would afford facilities for resuming the adjourned debate on the Motion of the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope).

MR. J. G. HUBBARD said, he wished to complain of the increasing attempts which were being made to dissociate private Members from the active work of legislation. Members were selected by constituencies because they believed them capable of promoting legislation on certain questions; but what opportunities were given them of doing so? If a Member by good luck succeeded in securing Tuesday or Friday for a Motion, the probability was that the Government would seize the morning for their own purposes, and count him out in the evening. If he obtained a place for a Bill on a Wednesday which was not in the Easter Holiday, the Whitsun Holiday, or the Epsom week, he might still find that soon after Midsummer his Wednesday was appropriated to the use of Government. He admitted that individual must give way to public interest; but he thought it hard that individual Members should be treated with injustice and caprice by the Government. He thought that it would have been better if the Government, instead of asking private Members to make a sacrifice on the strength of a statement to be made in the future, had made their statement first, and then asked for the sacrifice.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL complained that the only one of the important Bills which the Government intended to pass that related to Scotland was, the Parliamentary Elections (Corrupt and Illegal Practices) Bill, and that did not much matter so far as Scotland was concerned, for there were no corrupt practices in that country. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that there would be great disappointment felt in Scotland unless an opportunity was found of forwarding some of the Scotch Bills now before the House.

MR. WARTON considered there was nothing more discreditable in their proceedings than the way in which year after year the Indian Budget was relegated to the last week of the Session. With regard to the Wednesdays in that House, they were a perfect farce, as a rule, and nine-tenths of the Bills brought forward on that day were perfectly absurd and idiotic. The only useful measure passed during Wednesday this Session was the Sea Fisheries (Ireland) Bill, to which the Government had given a reluctant assent. He hoped that if private Members agreed not to enforce their rights on Tuesdays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, the Government would not yield to the demand of a few fanatical Radicals to have Saturday Sittings for the purpose of giving them an opportunity of airing their particular crotchets.

MR. LABOUCHERE trusted that the Prime Minister would stand firm, and would prove a perfect Herod to all those innocents on whose behalf appeals had been addressed to him, not making an exception in favour of any one of them. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the simplest plan would be to take all Tuesdays, all Wednesdays, and all Fridays, and, if there were any pressing legislative difficulty, to have Saturday Sittings also. [An hon. MEMBER: Why not Sunday?] He had no objection. What the country wanted was legislation. What Members wanted was to legislate as speedily as possible,

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 2nd July.]

[THIRTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Illegal Payment, Employment, or Hiring.

Clause 15 (Use of committee room in house for sale of intoxicating liquor to be illegal hiring).

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that before he proceeded to state his reasons in support of the Amendment standing in his name, he thought it desirable that the Committee should receive some explanation from the Attorney General as to the reasons which had induced the Government to place this clause in the Bill. His object in asking for that explanation was solely for the purpose of facilitating the progress of Business. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members opposite appeared to receive that statement with some amount of impatience; but the Committee were entitled to the explanation he asked for; and if it were necessary for the purpose he should feel it his duty to move to report Progress. Although the Amendment he was about to move did not meet all the objections which he entertained to this clause, it did so to a certain extent. The clause appeared to him to contain one of the most extraordinary and novel proposals ever introduced into a Bill—namely, that places where intoxicating liquors were sold should be excluded from being used as committee rooms on the occasions of Parliamentary elections. He could not conceive that there should be any objection to the use of public-houses as committee rooms either within or without the limits of Parliamentary boroughs, and he said it was for the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to justify the clause. He apprehended that the existing law was quite sufficient for any legitimate purposes the Government had in view with regard to the use of public-houses at the time of an election; if there were cases of disorder in houses licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor the law provided remedies which would meet any case of the kind; because they were able to punish the occupier of the premises by taking away his licence, or by any other mode which the law appointed. He could not understand, on general principles, why this particular class of buildings were selected to be dealt with in the manner proposed, or why it was that they were to be so dealt with only at election time. He pointed out to the Committee that in the case of elections other than Parliamentary elections, these taverns, hotels, and public-houses were the very places resorted to for carrying on the business connected with the election. The hon. and learned Gentleman would probably recollect that the London Tavern and the Charing Cross Hotel, amongst others, were made use of in such cases. If there was a charity school to be advocated, or a fund of any kind to be supported, it was always at institutions of that kind that the meetings were held; and he had never heard, in connection with them, that the fact of intoxicating liquor being sold there had led to any abuse. In his own borough, if there happened to be a meeting called for any public purpose, the premises sought out and used were one of the taverns or hotels within the limits of the borough. Unless the hon. and learned Gentleman could produce some justification of the clause, or state some substantial reasons why licensed premises should not be used as committee rooms on the occasion of elections, he thought the clause ought not to be allowed to remain in the Bill. He passed on to the next point with regard to committee rooms. Candidates would be allowed to have one room for every 500 electors in their constituency; and he would ask, where were they to find those rooms unless in the hotels and other licensed premises? In his own borough he would be entitled under the Bill to have no less than six committee rooms at the next Election; but he was sure that, although no man was better acquainted with the borough than himself, it would be impossible for him to find the requisite accommodation. Looking at this question from another point of view, everyone, including the hon. and learned Attorney General himself, knew what was the usual cost of hiring rooms for committee purposes. Licensed Victuallers, as a rule, had only one price, so that a candidate knew exactly what he had to pay; but under this clause he would be quite in the dark as to the cost of a room suited to his purpose. The Government said—"You are not allowed to use any room which comes within the category of rooms ordinarily used for electoral purposes; we prevent you holding your meetings in them; we have fixed a maximum line of expense which you must confine yourself within, nevertheless you must pay any price which is demanded of you." He said that this was not only an inconvenient rule, but also a very unjust one; because the candidate would be exposed to the necessity of seeking in out-of-the-way places for rooms which he could not get in the borough. Then there was the question of private houses, which in the clause was mixed up with the question of intoxicating drinks; and that was why he appealed to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to give some logical explanation of his reasons for introducing the clause. The restrictions sought to be imposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman appeared to him to amount to this—that people should not use any tavern or hotel for electoral purposes, because they might get intoxicated there. But, surely, the same thing might be said in the case of a private house. What was there to prevent people drinking too much on the premises of a private individual, or in a club? But he would not go into that question now. All he wished to do was to point out the inconvenient and illogical results which must follow, if the proposal in the clause were adopted. The hon. and learned Gentleman forbade the use of rooms in hotels and taverns, because liquors were sold there but he had already shown that if the law were carried out there was a legal remedy for everything in the nature of disorder which might take place. Although the clause struck at the business carried on in licensed premises, it would have the effect of protecting coffee taverns and temperance hotels, and, thereby, the honest trader who took out a licence would be placed at a great disadvantage. That was not fair or upright dealing in any way; and he felt sure there must be something at the bottom of it. He said that legislation of the kind proposed was not only pernicious, but humiliating. He was satisfied that the Attorney General himself must have attended committee rooms not only at respectable hotels, but at the public-houses in the borough of Taunton; and, that being so, it was impossible for him to conceive how the hon. and learned Gentleman, after his distinguished career, could come down to that House and kick away the very ladder by which he had ascended to the Treasury Bench. But what was the cause of this zeal on the part of the Government? He believed it was due to a desire to make things pleasant with the hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson); they knew there was the temperance vote hanging over, and they wanted to get hold of it. As had been pointed out last night, the hon. and learned Gentleman had never given a vote on the liquor question; and if he had any opinion at all with regard to it he had kept it entirely to himself. His view of the case was that this unjust and un-English-like proposal to shut out a respectable class of men was entirely owing to the desire of the Government to obtain the votes of the Blue Ribbon Army, and perhaps of the Salvation Army also; on no other grounds could he understand this superstitious feeling against entering into those buildings in which liquor was licensed to be sold. His proposal did not go to the very root of the clause; but it would, to a certain extent, raise the principle which it contained; and, therefore, reserving to himself the right of future opposition, he begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 4, after the word "premises," to insert "within the limits of Parliamentary boroughs."—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could assure the Committee that he was not about to follow his right hon. and learned Friend's somewhat discursive speech in all its details; and, although he made it a rule never to enter into any personal matters, he could assure his right hon. and learned Friend that he was entirely mistaken in his opinion with regard to the public-houses and hotels being used for the purpose of election committees in the constituency which he had the honour to represent. Both political Parties were in the habit of holding their committee meetings in the Town Hall and temperance establishments. The clause was framed with the desire to prevent the corrupt practice of treating; and if the right hon. and learned Gentleman asked him for proofs of the necessity of the clause he pointed to the Election Petitions, which would show that there had been a great deal of treating resulting from the transaction of business at elections in public-houses and hotels; and, therefore, he said that if the Committee were earnestly disposed to put a stop to this corrupt practice the clause was fully justified. But the right hon. and learned Member had pointed out that there were other means of corrupting people than by treating; and, in order to overcome that difficulty, he was willing to add, after the word "premises," in line 7, "or any other premises where refreshment shall be sold for consumption on the premises." In making this proposal, which, the Committee would perceive, brought temperance hotels within the clause, he trusted he had been able to do something to meet the objection of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that exceptional legislation was intended against the Licensed Victuallers.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he thought the Attorney General, by his proposal, had really increased the strength of the objection which his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Whitehaven had taken to the clause, inasmuch as he had materially enlarged the number of rooms or premises where these committees could not be held. It appeared to him that, throughout the Bill, the Government had considered far too exclusively the circumstances of large towns. It might be perfectly right and proper that committees should not be held in public-houses in towns even of moderate size; but every Member of the Committee would know that there were rural districts in England in which it would be impossible to find for the use of the candidate a committee room of suitable size, unless it were in public-houses, or in the private houses of electors of some position in the district. What would be the effect of this proposal? The houses belonging to private individuals would, no doubt, be readily opened as committee rooms, with or without charge, to the candidate with whose politics the owner agreed; but, just as in the case of the prohibition of hired conveyances, the present restriction would very materially affect the poorer class of candidates. He did not want to look at this question from a point of view favourable to any political Party, but from an impartial one; because he was sure that if they left in the clause anything that was in the nature of injustice they would make the provisions of the Bill unpopular. The Committee had decided that payment for carriages at elections should be an illegal act, and he would point out that that provision could only be carried into effect by very materially increasing the existing number of polling places. Now, for each of those polling places there must be a committee room; but he ventured to say that there would be, in many rural parts of England, places where by no possibility a suitable committee room could be found for the candidate who happened to be politically disagreeable to the principal inhabitants of the district where the election was to be held, except in a public-house, or a very inconvenient one in some small house. That was not a desirable result to be achieved; and he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman, even if he did not approve the Amendment before the Committee, would adopt some wording which would have the effect of relaxing the stringency of the clause in cases where it was impossible to obtain a proper committee room.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, no one would suppose for a moment that the right hon. Gentleman who just spoken would take any Party view of the question. For a long time there had been a grievance felt throughout the country, owing to the large growth of clubs; and now, for the first time, it was proposed by Her Majesty's Government that there should be an equality of legislation between licensed houses and private establishments in which intoxicating liquors were sold. He strongly suggested to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) to withdraw his Amendment; because the point which it raised could, in his opinion, be much better discussed on the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton); and, further, if the Amendment were withdrawn the Committee would be able to proceed to the consideration of the very important alteration of which the Attorney General had given Notice, and which, in his opinion, was deserving of the most serious attention of the Committee, inasmuch as it proceeded on lines of equality and justice.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, before the Question was put to the Committee, he wished to say a few words, because he did not see why boroughs were to be entirely shut out from the use of committee rooms in public-houses. In his own borough it was perfectly impossible to address the constituents in the out-lying districts unless public-houses were availed of in which there were large rooms, such as those generally used by the Oddfellows, Foresters, and other Friendly Societies. He had the honour to represent a large borough, in which it was impossible to conduct a house-to-house canvass; and the only way in which it was possible for a candidate to lay his political views before the electors was to make use of the accommodation offered by public-houses in the various districts. The Attorney General, by this clause of the Bill, and by the restrictions he was about to place on the clubs, entirely cut away from him the possibility of addressing his constituents. He would like to know how they were to meet their constituents, if they were to be debarred from the use of the large rooms which had been constantly used for the purpose of addressing the electors? Where there was a bond fide club, which had been kept up by the working class for a long time, and at which they were accustomed to discuss political matters on both sides of the question, he could not see the logic of prohibiting that club room from being used at elections. If the Government intended to carry out this proposal it was equivalent to depriving the constituencies of the right of listening to their Members; because it was impossible to find, in any other buildings than public-houses, rooms sufficiently spacious to contain a large number of electors. He was as anxious as the Attorney General himself to abolish all improper and illegal practices at elections; but this proposal of the Government would have no less effect than to prevent candidates from meeting their constituents, unless suitable rooms capable of containing a large number of persons were provided for them. For these reasons, he trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman would reconsider the clause with a view to its alteration.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE agreed that there were assembly rooms in many parts of the country which were used by candidates for the purpose of addressing their constituents, and which were in connection with public-houses. But this clause did not touch such cases.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had conclusively proved that it would be impossible to get committee rooms in many parts of the country if the clause remained unaltered. It had been suggested, however, that the necessary accommodation might be found in private houses. He could not conceive a greater incentive to treating than such an alternative; for instance, a candidate might hold his committee in the drawing-room, and it would be a very easy matter to say to the electors—"If you require any refreshment you have only to step into the opposite room; nobody will see you." When they came to the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), he trusted the Attorney General would pay some attention to the fact that it was impossible to obtain committee rooms in many places; and provide that, in the event of there being no suitable room available, the candidate should be allowed to hire one of the usual places through the Returning Officer.

MR. BROADHURST said, it would be well for the Committee to remember, in the first place, that there had been a great tendency to encourage the use of more committee rooms than were at all necessary, and that a great deal of the discussion then going on was entirely useless, because the committee rooms which some Members were contending for were really not wanted. Having been born in a rural parish, and having had considerable experience in matters of this kind, he believed there was no difficulty whatever in finding the necessary accommodation for electoral purposes wherever it was required. The hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) complained that the Government prohibited the use of public-houses, and that he would not have in consequence an opportunity of addressing his constituents in the out-lying districts of that borough. He thought the hon. Member, quite unconsciously, of course, had exaggerated the effect of the clause. He had himself attended, on one occasion, a meeting at Portsmouth, which was held at a place where he was certain it would be possible to gather together and address, in the course of a fortnight, the whole of the electors of the borough. The fact was, the Attorney General had acted very wisely and sensibly in introducing this provision, which he was sure would meet with the approval of a considerable number of people in the constituencies. That would be the view taken of the endeavour of the hon. and learned Gentleman to put down and prohibit the use of any place for election purposes where intoxicating liquors were sold. No one was surprised that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven should put his foot down for the maintenance of the old tap-room Caucuses; because, when they were abolished, he would probably find very considerable difficulty in carrying on some of those electoral arrangements of which he had, no doubt, had a large experience.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK rose to Order. It appeared to him that the hon. Gentleman opposite was referring to him in terms that were not consistent with Parliamentary usage.

THE CHAIRMAN said, he had listened to the observations of the hon. Gentleman, and he was unable to say that they were in any way out of Order.

MR. BROADHURST said, he did not mean to offer any affront to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. But the right hon. and learned Gentleman had had considerable electioneering experience, and, moreover, expressed himself strongly in favour of the old system of conducting elections in tap-rooms. He thought the Attorney General had taken a distinct step in the right direction; and he hoped that he would not listen to any appeal to recede from the position he had taken up. He did not for a moment expect—and he very much doubted whether the Committee expected—that the Attorney General would be able to satisfy the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven by his concession. It was not the desire of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that committee rooms should be prohibited at licensed houses; but it was his desire that they should be permitted in the future, as in the past, to be associated with the bad beer, and worse tobacco, which had the effect of confusing the electors, and preventing their forming any intelligible idea of the candidate's political opinions.

MR. RITCHIE said, he was glad to hear from the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst) that he had not intended to make any reflection on the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven; but, whatever his intention was, he, and other hon. Members on those Benches, certainly understood him to attribute to the right hon. and learned Gentleman an illegal practice. He would only say that the tone of the hon. Member's remarks were not likely to contribute to the progress of the Bill. They were all agreed upon the desirability of altering the law in such a way as would conduce to the purity of election. That was certainly his wish. He could not support the Amendment of his right hon. and learned Friend, because it would introduce a very invidious state of things if they were to allow in counties that which they prohibited in boroughs. It was all very well for his right hon. and learned Friend, who represented a constituency of 19,000 inhabitants, to make that proposal; but in his own constituency, which contained 450,000 inhabitants, it was necessary to work upon totally different lines. Now, the right hon. and learned Gentleman below him had contended that the clause should not apply to counties, because of the difficulty of obtaining in some poor and scattered districts committee rooms of sufficiently large dimensions. But the difficulty which the right hon. and learned Gentleman pointed to as existing in counties was certainly to be met with in his own constituency. In a large number of the polling districts of the Tower Hamlets the houses were all small; and if the use of the large rooms only to be found in public-houses were prohibited, he would certainly be shut out from addressing his committee in any large numbers. Through that a candidate might be unable, at the time of the election, to address any large meeting. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, that was not so.] He would give an illustration of a case which would certainly come under the clause. He himself was constantly in the habit of going round and addressing meetings of his committee. In a large borough, like the Tower Hamlets, the committee was composed of an immense number of persons—indeed, as many as could be got to join it—and he was in the habit of going round in the evening to address meetings of the committee. Those meetings were always largely attended, and they were looked upon as stimulating the efforts of the committee; and he could conscientiously say that if he was prohibited from holding them in the large rooms attached to public-houses it would be impossible to hold them at all, as those were the only rooms suitable to the purpose. It was often very essential that the candidate should be able to address his committee on their various duties, and on the necessity of their doing their utmost in the interests of the cause. That was why he objected to the provisions of this clause, and why he could not support the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck). That Amendment drew a distinction which ought not to be drawn between counties and boroughs, and he should vote, himself, for the entire omission of the clause.

MR. RYLANDS said, he was surprised to hear the Attorney General say that he intended to treat clubs established in boroughs as if they were low drinking houses, and as if they were otherwise open to the objection which, no doubt, existed to public-houses. In regard to public-houses, he quite admitted that there were serious objections, indeed, to committee meetings being held in them. He had known in his own case that public-houses were often used as committee rooms, and that an opportunity was thereby afforded for giving free drink to persons who visited the committee rooms. Therefore, he went entirely with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General in his desire to put a stop to this abuse; and certainly any sale of drink at a committee room which would degenerate into the giving of drink was a proceeding which they would all wish to avoid. But the hon. and learned Gentleman went beyond that, as he (Mr. Rylands) understood. The Attorney General proposed to extend the provision which he applied to licensed houses to respectable clubs which had been established for political purposes in all the large towns of the country. He could only speak in regard to Liberal Clubs; he knew very little about the Conservative Clubs, but he knew the Liberal Clubs of Lancashire very well. He was intimately connected with them, and he understood all about them in his own borough. In the principal polling districts in his borough there were Liberal Clubs, which had been established, and were supported by a number of highly respectable working men who took an active interest in politics. In two or three cases he believed that drink was sold in the clubs; but, as a rule—and he stated it on the best authority—the amount of drink purchased in the clubs was very slight indeed. The management and conduct of the clubs was in the highest degree respectable. What happened in connection with them? Many of his Liberal friends connected with the several polling districts of the borough were in the habit of meeting, from time to time, at the club, to keep an eye upon the general political interests of the ward. He presumed that his political opponents did the same in their clubs, and it was a perfectly legitimate thing to do. In the Liberal Clubs political discussions were encouraged among the persons connected with the Association. He was sorry that the Attorney General was not paying very much attention to what he was saying, as he was particularly anxious that the hon. and learned Gentleman should receive some information upon these points. He was informing the hon. and learned Gentleman that in Lancashire the proposal contained in this clause would create a very large amount of irritation and annoyance; and he wished the hon. and learned Gentleman to carry in his mind what it was that actually went on amongst the large constituencies of Lancashire. In the different wards of the large Lancashire boroughs the Liberal Party, and no doubt the Conservative Party also, met in their clubs, and at the time of an election those clubs were naturally the centres of the political influence of the respective wards. Then, were they going to shut up these clubs? ["No!"] If the Amendment were adopted, he understood that it would have that effect. What was proposed was, that in these clubs, where drink was only a minor incident in their constitution, no room should be used as a committee room. Well, he contended that that was a monstrous proposition, and that it struck at the political life of the great centres of the population. ["Oh!"] Certainly it did so. He could not account for the desire of the Attorney General to attack these Political Clubs, which, in his (Mr. Rylands's) judgment were most useful. He must say that he thought this proposal ought not to be proceeded with, and he trusted that the Attorney General would withdraw the clause.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he thought that what he had heard from his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) afforded a good lesson. As long as things were favourable to the Party who sat below the Gangway on the other side of the House, and so long as the penalties only affected that (the Opposition) side of the House, so long were hon. Members opposite anxious that the Bill should go on; but the moment it came to deal with that which he (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) held to be a most legitimate thing, whether in regard to one side or the other—namely, all these clubs, which were established in different localities—that moment the hon. Gentleman got up and denounced the clause as one of a highly objectionable nature, and one which ought not to be allowed to pass. They had a Maximum Schedule in the Bill, and he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had been going into far too many details. From the beginning to the end, the hon. and learned Gentleman had attempted to show that the people of this great country were not to be trusted for a moment whenever they came to an election; but that every one of them were more or less absolutely corrupt. The hon. and learned Gentleman was of opinion that nothing in the shape of temptation should be placed in their way, and that they should not have the power of getting a glass of anything to drink, or a mouthful of anything to eat. He wished to call attention to one of the statements which had been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman, because he gathered from it that the hon. and learned Gentleman was absolutely going to prevent any room whatever from being used as a committee room, or for any purpose in connection with an election, because the words of the clause were very strong—

“Any premises on which the sale by wholesale or retail of any intoxicating liquor is authorized by a licence (whether the licence be for consumption on or off the premises), or any premises where any intoxicating liquor is sold, or any part of any such premises, shall not be used as a committee room for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of a candidate at an election; and if any person hires or uses any such premises, or any part thereof for a committee room, he shall be guilty of illegal hiring, and the person letting such premises or part, if he knew it was intended to use the same as a committee room, shall also be guilty of illegal hiring.”

Consequently, wherever the room might be situated, if drink of any kind was sold on the premises, such room was prohibited from being used at an election time as a committee room. He ventured to say that the words uttered some time ago by his right hon. Friend the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) were words that ought not to be passed lightly over. He (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) knew what the rural districts were, and also what large towns were; and if they were to draw this hard-and-fast line around the candidate, they would place him in a position of the greatest difficulty in regard to obtaining committee rooms at all. The hon. and learned Gentleman, if he knew anything about elections in this country—and it was his bounden duty to make inquiries as to every part of England, so as not to place any candidate in a difficulty as to obtaining committee rooms—if the Attorney General knew anything of such matters, he must know that in the county districts the only places in many localities where there was a room at all was at the back of an inn, where there was usually a large room used for the meeting of Foresters and other kindred Associations. No other room could be obtained at all. He would ask if the hon. and learned Gentleman could tell the Committee where rooms fit for this purpose could be procured on the occasion of an election? If the candidate was a popular man, people would come from long distances to hear what he had to say, and the rooms in which he addressed the electors would be crowded. He must say he thought the Government were carrying this clause a great deal too far. He was in favour of putting down bribery and corruption; but a few good and well-considered clauses would have been quite sufficient, without going so much into petty details. If the hon. and learned Gentleman wished to pass the Bill he must make many concessions in regard to matters that were absolutely necessary.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) that the Bill went too far; but the House had assented to the principle, and they were now simply engaged in giving effect to that principle. He thought the alteration proposed to be made in the clause was distinctly in the right direction. It was a just cause of complaint that a person should be placed in an invidious position, and a ban put upon him, because he sold an article which was recognized by the community and the Legislature as a legitimate article of commerce. He thought the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman would make a commendable change. There were clubs which were public-houses in a complete sense; and he thought the proposition of the hon. and learned Gentleman would meet with general acceptance. He thought that the application of the change was misunderstood. He understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that these clubs were not to be used as committee rooms; but a club room might be used for a public meeting. The hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) said he would not be able, after the clause was passed, to go to a club and address a meeting. He (Mr. Cowen) did not understand the clause to prohibit anything of the kind. There was nothing that would prevent an hon. Member from visiting any club in the borough he represented and making as many speeches as he liked. All the clause prohibited was the establishment of a committee room where the business of the election would be carried on. There was no objection to the hon. Member addressing a meeting in any assembly room he might select. He would be quite as open to do so in the future as he had done in the past; but the clause would prohibit the transaction of the business of an election in clubs as well as in public-houses, where liquor was sold. In that respect, he thought the clause had a tendency to equalize all parties. Hon. Members would be aware that there were two kinds of clubs. There were clubs and clubs. There were clubs of which he did not wish to speak harshly; and, therefore, he would only say that he had no special liking for a Caucus Club.

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE wished to ask the Attorney General how such a case as this would stand? In the borough he had the honour to represent (Exeter), a Political Club existed containing a large room for the use of which it was expected that the borough and county Conservative Associations would pay an annual rent, and employ it for a committee room or other similar purposes. Members of the Club had a right to use the room in their individual capacities; and he wished to know if it would be illegal for them to hold meetings at election time in what might be regarded as a committee room? As far as he understood the Attorney General's meaning, the effect of his proposal would be that A, B, and C might not meet together as members of an election committee, but might do so as members of a Political Association.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was a matter of interpretation. In the case which the hon. Member had put to him, it was certainly intended that the clause should not apply in any way. In answer to the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) and the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), he would only say that they might hold as many meetings as they liked for the purpose of addressing their constituents. The large rooms capable of containing many persons were not the rooms they wanted for committee rooms, and the clause, as it was now worded, would not affect them. The intention of the clause was to prevent the carrying on of the business of the election, from day to day during the time of the election, at a place in which intoxicating liquors were sold. Hon. Members knew very well how the business of an election was conducted in such places.

MR. RITCHIE asked if it was not competent for a candidate to assemble his committee at a public-house for the purpose of addressing them?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it would be quite within the competence of a candidate for the purpose of addressing them as much as he liked; but if they sent out canvassers from that committee it would be an ordinary committee room, transacting ordinary committee work. Gathering the committee together for the purpose of addressing them would certainly and distinctly not be within the clause. All they had to deal with was the question whether the business of the election should be conducted in a public-house where the means for carrying on these corrupt practices existed, and where temptation might be employed? Hon. Members wished to separate the question of clubs from the question of public-houses. He quite agreed that, in one sense, it was a matter of detail. The hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) said there were altogether too many details in the Bill; but this was rather a serious and important question. The committee had been told that the matter would interfere with the whole basis of political life; but surely it was a very simple question, although a serious and important one, to say whether a committee room should be held at a public-house or not. He thought they might separate the question of a committee room being held in a public-house from the question of Political Clubs; and he would endeavour, if it was the wish of the Committee, to direct his attention to this matter, in order to see whether hereafter it might not be possible to include a provision in the Bill which should separate the club from the public-house.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, the question was, no doubt, a very important one, especially if it was taken in conjunction with a subsequent Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord G. Hamilton), which provided that the premises of any public elementary school in receipt of an annual Parliamentary grant should not be used as a committee room. It would become a serious matter, therefore, if there were no possibility of taking a club room for such a purpose. In regard to the question as it applied to large constituencies, he ventured to think that in large counties, like North-East Lancashire, North Lancashire, and Cumberland, if they excluded the possibility of taking rooms in a public house, and using them for committee rooms, there would be very great difficulty in obtaining rooms at all. He certainly failed to see how, in many cases, it would be possible to find a room; and when they came to consider the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex he should certainly support it. He should have a great deal to say bye and bye in regard to the question of clubs; but, in deference to the suggestion which had just been made by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, that they should postpone the consideration of that question now, he would defer those remarks for the present.

MR. CALLAN said, he thought the sop which the Attorney General had thrown out to the Temperance Party would before long be found a very disagreeable matter for digestion. No doubt, the hon. and learned Gentleman had yielded to the representation of some of the purists of the House with reference to the exclusion of public-houses. He thought a favourable addition would be made to the clause if it proposed to include coffee-houses, because in many respects they were much more objectionable than public-houses, and bore a worse character. He certainly thought the more they were brought under supervision, not only during elections, but at all other times, the better it would be for the public morality. It was suggested that rooms would be obtainable in every constituency without having regard to the public-house. Now, he had had the honour of assisting to conduct the first election of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar), in 1874. At that time he had charge of the Murrough district, and there was not a single house in the district except the priest's, the Protestant minister's, the schoolmaster's, and the public-house. He had addressed a meeting of 200 electors from the window of the public-house, and he had used the tap-room as a committee room. ["Oh!"] Yes; it was quite true that he did so, and he was made welcome to it without payment. He thought there were very few of the temperance advocates who would give the use of a coffee shop without requiring payment for it. In two places in his own county, he had had no other house to go to than the public-house. There was no other house in the parish except the police barracks, the Protestant and Catholic clergymen's residences, the house of the National schoolmaster, and one or two private houses. Therefore, if they carried this clause so far as Ireland was concerned, they would altogether prevent a candidate from addressing his constituents in certain remote districts. Legislation of this kind might be all very well in a Parliamentary borough where there were plenty of large public buildings; but in the country districts of Ireland such places were not to be found. The clause said—

"Such premises shall not be used as a committee room for the purpose of promoting or procuring the election of a candidate at an election, and if any person hires or uses any such premises or any part thereof for a committee room he shall be guilty of illegal hiring."

His objection would be largely removed if the Attorney General would add some words to carry out the suggestion of the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen), to which he understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to assent—namely, that the clause should only apply to a public-house which was used from day to day as a committee room. If the clause were passed in its present shape, and a case were brought before the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, he should like to know how Chief Justice Morris would deal with an unfortunate candidate who had used a room in a public-house once a-week for a month? High as the character of the Attorney General was as a lawyer, his remarks would not form the slightest guide to an Irish Judge in deciding what came under the operation of the clause. If anyone hired a room in one of these public-houses he would be guilty of illegal hiring, and would subject himself to the penalties imposed for illegal practices. Nobody who employed a public-house as a committee room, whether he was a Member of Parliament, or a candidate, or an election agent, would be knowingly guilty of the offence of illegal employment. But what was a committee room? If the Attorney General would define what a committee room was a great deal of the difficulty would be removed. It had been his fate to contest both a borough and a county, and in each case he had a bed room and a sitting room at an hotel, and he was in the habit of using the sitting room as a committee room. His friends went to him there, discussed confidentially with him what the state of the district was, what promises had been given, who were reliable and who were doubtful, and who ought to be called upon. That was simply committee work; and under this clause the room in which it took place would be held to be a committee room. But was he to be disqualified because half-a-dozen friends went to his sitting room at the hotel and transacted electioneering work there? If a Petition were presented against him he would be compelled to admit that he went over the election books, and that he used the room in every sense as a confidential committee room. If he wanted to address the electors he was obliged to address them from the windows of a public-house; and when he had finished addressing them he naturally went down stairs and mixed among them to ascertain what the state of feeling was. Probably he arranged who was to canvass the district, and because those things happened there, was the room to be called a committee room? If the Attorney General would put words into the clause, or into the Bill, showing that if a man made use of a room in a public-house in order to meet his friends, ascertain their views, and arrange for canvassing the district, the room he used was not to be considered a committee room, then his objections would be removed.

MR. E. STANHOPE desired to point out to the Attorney General that, so far from meeting the objection which had been raised by his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), he had introduced a fresh difficulty into the matter. His right hon. and learned Friend had pointed out, in regard to the country districts, how difficult it was to obtain a room. He could fully support what his right hon. and learned Friend had said, and he believed the same difficulty was felt even in the case of boroughs, and that it would be extremely difficult to get any other place for a committee room in the centre of a polling district than a public-house. If the public-house was prohibited they would have no alternative but to borrow or hire a room in the house of some elector living in the village—he was speaking now of county elections—and that would be open to the gravest objection. If they could not go to the public-house, they would have no other means of obtaining a committee room left open to them. In most county constituencies a candidate desired to meet his committee in each polling district before the day of election, in order that he might address them, and discuss with them the proper steps to be taken in conducting the contest, and in many cases, if the candidate was prohibited from engaging, for that purpose, a room in a public-house, he would have no means of addressing his committee at all. The Attorney General said the candidate might hire a room in an inn for that purpose, and that he might hold a meeting in that room; but he did not think that the hon. and learned Gentleman at all met the objections of his right hon. and learned Friend. On the contrary, it threw a fresh difficulty in the way.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he thought the experience the House had had of the Bill proved that every clause contained a pitfall for the candidate, and that the present clause surpassed in ingenuity all the other traps contained in the preceding clauses. The Attorney General told them that they might use a room in a public-house for the purpose of holding a meeting; but if at that meeting any unwary man who happened to be present took out his canvassing book and referred to the events of the past two hours, or was induced to anticipate a canvass two hours later, that act would constitute the room a committee room under the Act. A clause of that sort was, in his opinion, absolutely absurd. Any unscrupulous opponent might attend a meeting ostensibly for the purpose of hearing a speech, and he might induce an unwary elector to take out his canvassing book and make a communication to the candidate for the purpose of giving information, in consequence of which the candidate might be unseated for using a public-house as a committee room. He would also point out to the Attorney General that this clause would contribute very materially towards increasing the expenses of an election. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie) had remarked that in a large borough constituency like his, and also like that which he (Baron Henry De Worms) represented, it was the custom on both sides to address meetings of the electors in the committee rooms. Of course, they were obliged to hire rooms for those meetings, and if they were obliged to obtain others for committee rooms, it would add a considerable item to the expense. It was not now necessary to obtain special rooms for the purpose of holding a meeting; but they were able to make use of the committee rooms. If, however, this clause passed in its present shape, the candidate would have to incur the additional expense of engaging separate rooms for addressing public meetings. He should be glad to know on what principle the Attorney General proposed to exclude the use of committee rooms for that purpose? He understood the hon. and learned Gentleman to say that it was for the purpose of preventing treating; but he (Baron Henry De Worms) wished to know whether the facilities for treating would not be exactly the same in the case of holding a meeting in a public-house, as they would be in that of men sitting round a table in a public-house for the purpose of comparing notes in reference to the canvass? Of course, it might be alleged that the meeting only lasted one evening, whereas the work of a committee would go on for many days; but if it was argued that it was improper to have a committee room at a public-house because it would promote the practice of treating, then that argument was certainly applicable to the holding of a committee in a public-house for any purpose whatever. The hon. and learned Member now went further, and said that they should neither hold a meeting at a public-house nor at a club—acting on the principle of two wrongs making one right. If the hon. and learned Gentleman admitted the principle of the right of a candidate to address the constituents in a room attached to a public-house, he (Baron Henry De Worms) could not understand on what principle the hon. and learned Gentleman could exclude the use of a room at a public-house for any purpose whatever. He knew that he might be told that a committee sitting permanently in a public-house would produce drinking; and that any sort of Political Club, where drinking was allowed, ought to be placed under the same category as a public-house. He thought that at least a clause ought to be introduced specifying that particular rooms might or might not be used for the purpose of holding a meeting; that in such rooms drink might not be supplied, but the number of glasses of water which each speaker might drink should be fully set out in the Bill. They were arriving now at a point where they were making the restrictions under the Bill so severe that they would always be evaded; and they were so absurd that the friends of the candidates, on both sides, would be wary before they attempted to put the provisions of the Act in force, because they would be fully acquainted with the absurd stringency of the punishment which would be inflicted on one side or the other in the event of a person being found guilty under the Act. He was not in favour of anything like corrupt practices or treating; but he had had some experience in connection with contested elections, and he was satisfied that a clause of this sort would be utterly absurd, arbitrary, and unworkable.

MR. ONSLOW said, he had an Amendment later down upon the Paper somewhat on the lines of the suggestion of the Attorney General. He thought the Committee would agree that, as far as the statement of the Attorney General went, it greatly modified the clause. At the same time, when the proper moment arrived, he should vote for the rejection of the clause altogether, because he believed that it was the most monstrous proposition he had ever heard; that it would prove utterly unworkable; and that it was not only a pitfall to the candidate himself, but a pitfall to every member of his committee. Where was a candidate to go during an election? If he went to a public-house, the Attorney General ruled that it would be illegal for six or seven of his committee to go there and compare the day's work. Surely that was a thing that was constantly done, and must be done, in the conduct of an election. He had done it himself over and over again ; and he ventured to say that there had been no illegal practices resorted to, so far as his knowledge went. Certainly the gentlemen he had met on such occasions never treated him to anything, nor had he ever treated them. Under the provisions of the present Bill, the working men were treated as if they were perfect children. They would not know where to go, or what to do, or how they were to carry on the election. He should not vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Stanley Leighton), who proposed to exclude a church or chapel registered or licensed for the performance of public worship from being used as a committee room, because he thought those were the very places where a farce of this kind ought to be enacted, in order to show the solemn character of an election proceeding after the passing of the Bill. He presumed that it was intended in future to exclude places such as the Westminster Palace Hotel from being used for the purposes of a committee room. He thought it was absurd to say that a candidate should not have a committee there, or in some of the old county hotels. He believed, if this clause were passed as it stood, that there would be great difficulty, not only in the rural districts, but in the boroughs as well, in obtaining committee rooms. All he said was this—that if they did eliminate public-houses, they ought to eliminate other places where refreshments of any kind were sold. They ought not to hold a committee room over a butcher's or a baker's shop, because he believed an enormous amount of treating would take place at these shops—much more than in public-houses. The clause was utterly absurd and utterly unworkable ; and how the Attorney General, with all his experience of elections, could propose it, he could not conceive.

MR. R. N. FOWLER desired to say a word in regard to this clause, because he believed the constituency he had the honour to represent differed to a very considerable extent from that of any other Parliamentary borough or city, except, perhaps, the City of Westminster, which was very much in the same position. In the City of London the rent of rooms was simply enormous, and he did not see how a candidate was to conduct an election in conformity with the provisions of the Bill unless some special arrangement was made to allow him to hire committee rooms. He was disposed generally to be favourable to the proposition of the Attorney General that committee rooms should not be hired in public-houses ; but, at the same time, the hon. and learned Gentleman must bear in mind that while the great object of this Bill was to diminish expense, this particular proposal must necessarily increase the cost of elections in large constituencies. Therefore, it was a proposal that could scarcely be adopted. A publican would lend a candidate his room for a committee room almost for nothing. [A laugh.] Hon. Members laughed ; but he thought he was stating a well-known fact, and he might add that the publican did so for this reason. Quite independent of any improper proceeding, or of any treating or corruption, it brought people to the publican's house. Such people wanted refreshments, but they paid for them out of their own pockets. It was, consequently, worth while for the publican to let the candidate have a committee room for a very small sum. That being the case, although he (Mr. R. N. Fowler) was disposed to think the proposition otherwise a good one, it was undoubtedly a proposition to increase the expense of elections. Speaking of his own constituency, it would affect them probably more than any other, because the expense of engaging committee rooms would be simply enormous, and he would ask the consideration of the learned Attorney General to that point. The rent of a committee room in Cheapside, for instance, would be a very different item from the rent of one in Taunton. Probably he (Mr. R. N. Fowler) would have to pay 20 times as much as the Attorney General ; and, under those circumstances, he felt that it was a matter which required to be very carefully considered, because, although he admitted that it was a good proposition not to have committee rooms in public-houses, the proposal, if carried out, would tend largely to increase the expense of elections.

MR. WARTON remarked, that one of the most irritating things in connection with this Bill was the cool way in which the Attorney General pooh-poohed facts that were undisputed, relying upon the support of the majority behind him.

The hon. and learned Gentleman could say nothing, but he was ready to deny anything. He (Mr. Warton) would, however, make an appeal from the Attorney General as a Member of the Government to the Attorney General as a lawyer. The hon. and learned Gentleman was a distinguished advocate, and knew very well how to regard evidence in a Court of Justice. He would, therefore, ask the hon. and learned Gentleman how, supposing six hon. Members—the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), the right hon. and learned Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), the right hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther), the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), and the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ritchie)—how, supposing all those witnesses came into Court before the Attorney General, and told him, as a matter of fact, that in their respective constituencies committee rooms could not be obtained except at a public-house, he would receive their evidence? Would he not at once say that he could not resist the evidence? Undoubtedly he would, because in a Court of Justice he would be guided by common sense; whereas in that House he allowed himself to be led away by the feeling of the majority behind him. The scheme proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman had been shown to be utterly impracticable, both in counties and boroughs. It was all very well for the Attorney General to sneer at the right hon. and learned Member for Whitehaven; but that did not answer the fact stated by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, that in his constituency he would be unable to obtain a committee room. Sneers and jeers were not argument or evidence; and the hon. and learned Gentleman was driven to something worse than legal subtleties in order to make distinctions in which he even surpassed himself. The hon. and learned Gentleman said—"You may address your committee in any room you like; but it does not become your committee room." He (Mr. Warton) certainly felt inclined to take the Attorney General at his word, and to advise that on every occasion when a room in a public-house was so used, some such notice as this should be put up:—"Nota bene—I intend to address my committee repeatedly in this room; but it is not my committee room." He did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman would sanction such nonsense in a Court of Justice; he only sanctioned it while sitting on the Treasury Bench. He (Mr. Warton) entirely saw through the design of the hon. and learned Gentleman in this particular case. He was holding with the hare and hunting with the hounds. The hon. and learned Gentleman desired to strike a blow at the Licensed Victuallers. He disliked, and hated them; and this clause was drawn, first, to do injury to respectable traders in the country, who, although they carried on their business under legal restrictions, were a respectable and an honourable set of men. In the next place, the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to reject the clubs; but, in consequence of suggesting that no committee rooms should be allowed to be held in a club in which intoxicating drinks were sold, the hon. and learned Gentleman found himself subjected to a terrific onslaught from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), who told him that if he took away the use of the club rooms he would hear of the matter again from Lancashire. He (Mr. Warton) asked the Attorney General to have sufficient good sense to dismiss from the Bill these ridiculous clauses, which would only add to the expense of elections, and would produce no good effect whatever. The laws against treating were already sufficiently severe, and it was all nonsense to say that they would be promoting treating by permitting a committee room to be held in a public-house. Were they to have two classes of committee rooms at a greatly increased cost—one outside a public-house, and another in a public-house, where a candidate might address a meeting of his committee? He entreated the Attorney General to remove two inconsistencies from the Bill, one of which was a vexatious principle of undeserved imputation to the most respectable trade while the other would run imminent risk of being carried on the maximum scale of under the Act.

MR. RITCHIE said, he had no wish to prolong the discussion; but the remarks which had been made by the Attorney General in answer to his observations must not be passed over without notice. He had certainly made a complaint that the clause would prevent a candidate from addressing a meeting of his committee; but he understood now that if he hired rooms in a public-house, for the purpose of addressing a meeting of a committee, it would be legal. He wished to know if the hon. and learned Gentleman had considered the full significance of that fact? They had passed clauses of the Bill already saying that the candidate should only have a certain number of committee rooms, and they had passed a clause that he was not to pay for the display of bills. He could understand why he should not pay for the display of bills, and why he should only have a certain number of committee rooms; but now it was to be open to the candidate to engage rooms in every public-house of the borough in addition to his committee rooms, in which to hold meetings of the committee for the purpose of addressing them, and he might be able to placard the whole of those public-houses with bills convening the meetings. The consequence would be, if the suggestions of the Attorney General were accepted, that the provisions they had already passed, in regard to the display of bills and the limitation of committee rooms, would altogether be set aside.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he wished to put a question to the Attorney General. The hon. and learned Gentleman had informed the Committee that the holding of meetings in a public-house would not be against the clause. If that was the conviction of the hon. and learned Gentleman, it would be as well to insert words to that effect in the clause; because, although the hon. and learned Gentleman might hold that opinion, it did not follow that an Election Judge would take the same view as the Attorney General. At the present moment, if a candidate hired a large room in a public-house for meetings, it was usual to give him the use of a back room for the purpose of a committee room for nothing. The present proposal would, therefore, add to the election expenses of the candidate; because, instead of having a committee room for nothing, he would have to pay for the use of it, and also for the large room, which it would be necessary to hire for the purpose of addressing meetings of the committee. In the borough of Portsmouth there were about 20,000 electors. By the Schedule attached to the Bill, he would be allowed to have a committee room for every 500 voters, which would give 40 rooms altogether. But at the last election there were, as a matter of fact, 32 districts and 32 committee rooms, and now in future it would be necessary to have 40. He would have to bear the expense of those committee rooms, and beyond that the expense of rooms for holding meetings. Those requirements would add materially to the expense of an election, and the cost would be still heavier, if he was not allowed to make use of the clubs which existed at this moment, and which had been created for political purposes. They were not spurious, but real and legitimate clubs, in which political discussions were already carried on. He thought the Attorney General would facilitate matters a good deal, if he were to insert in the clause words which would govern the decision of the Judge, and which would provide that the holding of a committee at a public-house would not be against the principle of the clause. But as the effect of the clause would be materially to increase the expense of elections, he would suggest that the best way would be to withdraw the clause altogether.

MR. LEWIS observed, that little as he attempted to modify any detail of the Bill under which the candidate would incur expense, the Attorney General, by this clause, proposed to do away with the only means a candidate possessed, in most localities, and especially in country districts, of holding meetings and engaging committee rooms. As a rule, in rural districts, the only place which candidates had at their command was the tavern of the village, or small country town. The hon. and learned Attorney General proposed to shut that up. If the Committee would turn to Clause 46, they would see how much further this annihilation of the ordinary means of providing a committee room was carried by the Bill. By Clause 46 it was provided that no part of any premises used by the Returning Officer for a polling station at an election should be used as a committee room for a candidate at that election. Then, what would be the effect in a small country town? There might be in a village or country town, besides the public-house, some room or institution appropriated for public purposes; but that would be secured by the Returning Officer for the purpose of taking the poll. The tavern would be closed, which but for this clause might be resorted to by the candidate, and used as a committee room; while Clause 46 enacted that—

“The same part of any premises, or different parts of the same premises, shall not be used on the day of the poll at an election for a polling station and also for a committee room for a candidate at that election.”

No doubt he would be told that the limitation only applied to the day of polling; but that was the day when it was wanted most, and when the candidate desired to concentrate all his efforts. Perhaps the Committee would follow him a step further, and look at the next provision in Clause 46. Sub-section 2 said—

“If any person uses any premises or any part thereof for a committee room in contravention of this section, or hires the same on behalf of a candidate at an election, when he knows or has reasonable cause to believe that part of such premises has been engaged or will be required by the Returning Officer for use as a polling station at the election, he shall be deemed to be guilty of illegal hiring.”

So that a man required to be possessed of the gift of prophecy, in order, among other things, that he might escape the penalties of the Bill. He knew that it was perfectly absurd for him to say anything further. He was sorry to say that many hon. Members seemed to take delight in providing means of embarrassment for candidates on the day of election. The idea that the Bill would decrease the expenses of an election was most prominent; but this clause, instead of narrowing the expenses, increased them. He had no wish to defend the interests of the Licensed Victuallers. He did not look upon the matter from that point of view at all. He did not look at it from the electioneering agent's point of view, or from the publican's point of view; but from the beginning to the end he had looked upon the Bill in reference to the interests of the candidate, the influence and effect it would have upon him, and the dangers with which it was surrounding him. This clause was only one of those curious fetters forged by the Attorney General for the purpose of binding hand and foot an unfortunate candidate, and sending him to the poll in a distressed and embarrassed state of mind. What was a candidate for the City of London and other Metropolitan boroughs to do? Every public building would be closed against him. The Westminster Palace Hotel, in the City of Westminster, the Cannon Street Hotel, and all the old-fashioned taverns, formerly available, would be excluded from his use. Where was he to go? He would have to get an unoccupied house in a back street if he could find one. And how much would he have to pay for the use of a place of that kind for a month? It would be a very different matter if it were proposed to take the place for a year or seven years; but to let it for a month might cause a loss of the chance of letting it permanently; and, therefore, the owner would refuse to let it unless the candidate agreed to give him some £20 or £50. That was no fancy idea; but anybody who was acquainted with the City of London would know that it was likely to occur. Those who supported the Bill in all its intensity were setting up a sort of idol, to which they proposed to bow the knee at all hazards. Purity of election was their cry. He had no objection to purity of election; but they proposed to surround the candidate with all sorts of fences which were not really defences, and then to say to him, amid all these difficulties—“You must conduct your election with the utmost purity.” It was nothing but playing with the difficulty which stared them in the face. He would take his own case. Whenever he was engaged in a contest in the City of Londonderry he stayed at the head hotel in that city. His friends called to see him there; the canvass books were on the table; they called to tell him they had been to see so-and-so to see which way he was going to vote. He was most happy to see them, and to talk over the result of their labours in a most friendly way. But could there be any doubt, after this clause was passed, that the room in which this took place might be decided to be a committee room? Judges would be found eager, and even greedy, to extend the law, and say that it was an offence. Hon. Members, who never intended to stand for a constituency again, could shape the clause as they liked, because they would not feel the effect of it. But those who had hopes of a future Parliamentary life wanted to see how they could practically work an election. He hoped the Committee would not part with the clause until they had exhausted every effort to make it a sensible and a working clause, not in the interests of the publicans, for whom he did not care one jot, or in the interests of any voter, but in the interests and for the safety and protection of the candidate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he entirely agreed with the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) in the hope he had expressed, that the Committee would not part with the clause until they had made it a sensible and a working clause; and he, therefore, thought they had better direct their efforts to that object. The hon. Member had referred to Clause 46. But he (the Attorney General) would remind the Committee that that clause was open to amendment when it was reached, if the Committee thought fit to amend it. It was said that the publicans would let candidates at election times have rooms cheaper in their houses than they could be obtained elsewhere, and that, in some cases, they would let the candidate have a large room for nothing. Why was that? It was on account of the trade that went on there; it was because, at an election time, an abnormal amount of drinking went on at public-houses. There was generally a great congregation of people there, many of whom were electors and about to vote; the excitement in reference to the election was very great; and it was, therefore, advisable that committee rooms should not be held in such premises.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was doubtful whether they always paid for it, and he should like to know what guarantee the noble Lord had that they did pay for it? He believed it was a pretty well-known fact that the publicans allowed persons at election time to consume drink pretty freely without paying for it, and the candidate not unfrequently had long scores brought against him after the election was over. It was quite certain that many Members of the Committee had applications made to them after an election in regard to the consumption of drink which had taken place on particular premises, and at the instance of persons who were supposed to have had authority to order it, the drink itself having been consumed by electors. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had pointed out what a danger it would be in country places if persons went to the committee room and the least hospitality was displayed towards them. The danger would be greatly increased if the committee room was situated in a public-house; and he was afraid that in many cases the public-house would become, as a matter of fact, an open house with all its temptations. He knew there were many hon. Members who differed from that view; but he trusted that the discussion would not be prolonged, and he earnestly appealed to the Committee to consider whether the time had not now arrived when they ought to come to some decision in regard to the principle of the clause.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not think that any time had been lost, because they had been practically discussing all the Amendments which had been proposed to the clause; and, in regard to a clause of this kind, long experience convinced him that a general discussion in the first instance cleared the air to a great degree; and that, as a matter of fact, no time was, in reality, lost. The Attorney General said that economy and purity of election could not be promoted by the clause. Now, he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) did not think that economy would be promoted by it, because candidates would find it very much more difficult in a great many places to obtain rooms from private persons, who had not been in the habit of letting out such rooms, than in a public-house. Then, as to purity of election, the hon. and learned Gentleman stated, quite properly, that under the clause as many meetings might be held in public-houses as the candidate liked; but there must be no committee meeting there. A candidate might meet his committee and address them at a public-house; but he must not have a regular committee room there. Now, he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was very much afraid that that was a trap, not intentionally so; but he feared that it might become one. If a candidate was in the habit of going about from public-house to public-house to make speeches, of meeting his committee, of seeing them before he went in to deliver his address, and then of seeing them again when he came out, the room in which those things took place would be held to be a committee room, and there would be great danger of overstepping the law. If they were to retain the clause, there ought to be a definition of what a committee room was, or otherwise the candidate would be over and over again caught in a trap. It would be quite natural when he was going to make a speech for the canvassers to get up and show their books; and, in that case, the Election Judges would hold that it was a committee room, and an illegal practice, because it was in excess of the number of committee rooms authorized under the Act, and that it had been paid for, for the purpose of holding a meeting. He was of opinion that far greater disadvantage would be reaped from the clause than advantage; and he hoped, before the discussion closed, that the Attorney General would be able to see his way to amend the clause very materially, or to withdraw it altogether.

MR. GORST said, he had risen several times in order to try and save the time of the Committee by suggesting to the Attorney General why a debate should not take place, and why it would be better to withdraw the clause. It must be quite clear to the Attorney General that the clause did not prohibit the hiring of any number of rooms for the purposes of the election; it only prohibited the use of rooms when they were hired as committee rooms. He had noticed, in the speeches of some of the right hon. Gentlemen who had spoken from the Front Opposition Benches, an assertion that committee rooms must be had for the work of the election, and that they could not be dispensed with. The right hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), and the right hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), took that view of the question, believing that committee rooms were of the greatest possible assistance in the conduct of an election; and being willing, as usual, to throw over the boroughs whenever they thought it expedient to do so, they were perfectly ready to prohibit the use of them in boroughs, as long as they might be retained in counties. Perhaps those right hon. Gentlemen would allow him to tell them that they were entirely mistaken. He believed they had never been engaged in a contested election at all, and he did not think they knew anything about an election contest. As a matter of fact, nothing was more useless in an election contest than a committee room, with the exception of a central room. What was called a district committee room was absolutely useless. Such rooms were spread all over a borough, and no work was done in them at all; they were merely rooms hired for the purpose of feeding the publicans who owned them, and as a means of spending money in the borough. Would this clause stop that practice at all? All it forbade was the use of the committee room; but there was no prohibition against the candidate hiring as many of these rooms as he liked all over the borough, whether at public-houses or not. It would not matter as long as they were not used for the purpose of committee rooms. Now, he would like to ask the Attorney General what was meant by the term "using a room for the purpose of a committee room?" Suppose he (Mr. Gorst) hired a room in a public-house to meet his constituents, what would make it a committee room? He believed that people would go into it, would sit in it of an evening, would smoke their pipes there, and would call for something to drink; perhaps they would not always pay for it themselves, but it would be paid for by others, whose motives it would be for the Election Judges to find out. Well, what would make that room a committee room? Because, whatever it was, they might depend upon it that particular thing would never be done. If it was the use of pen, ink, and paper which constituted the room a committee room, very good care would be taken that no pen, ink, or paper ever went into it; if sitting around a table constituted a committee room, they would take care that the people who went there sat against the walls. Whatever performance constituted the use of a committee room that performance would be avoided, and there would be nothing to prevent a room being hired and drinking going on, unless this clause went a great deal further, and prohibited the hiring of more than a certain number of rooms for any purpose whatever. In that case it would be said to be an interference with the liberty of a candidate in addressing his constituents. Unless the hon. and learned Attorney General was prepared to carry the clause as far as that, he did not see what the good of the clause was. It would prohibit something which the candidate had a perfect right to do, and would leave quite open that which they desired to suppress—namely, the possibility of opening a number of rooms all over the constituency.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the Attorney General had made an appeal to the Committee not to protract the discussion, and he (Mr. Bentinck) would take the opportunity of stating the course he intended to pursue. He was bound to say that the discussion which had taken place had not satisfied him at all. He apologised to the hon. and learned Gentleman if any remark had fallen from him which the hon. and learned Gentleman considered to be of a personal character. He had not had the slightest intention of saying anything in the least degree disagreeable; and when he had alluded to the borough of Taunton he had only stated what happened during his own time—the time he represented the borough. It was always his practice to stay at one of the houses of entertainment in the borough—namely, an hotel. His right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had referred to a candidate living at one of these houses of public entertainment, and being waited upon by a committee, and he said that the candidate might, in consequence, find himself in a somewhat unpleasant position. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) hoped the Government would withdraw the clause, and, if necessary, bring up something new. At all events, it was quite certain that the suggestion of his right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire ought to be followed, and that a positive definition should be introduced into the Bill as to what a committee room was. What he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) proposed to do in this case was to withdraw the Amendment at present, because he thought that it might be more conveniently moved at the end of the clause.

Sir R. Assheton Cross

That was the suggestion which had been made by the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arnold), and it was one which he believed met with general support, and was the best course that could be adopted. Therefore, if the Committee would give its assent, he would adopt that suggestion. He had only one other observation to make, and it was in reference to the remarks which had been made by the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Broadhurst). The hon. Member seemed to be very angry with him (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), and had made some strong observations; but he was bound to say that he thought the hon. member had hit out rather wildly. The hon. Member talked of his (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) being connected with a Caucus, and having to do with the distribution of bad tobacco and sour beer. Now, as a matter of fact, he never was a member of any Caucus; and as to bad tobacco and beer, he thought any hon. Member whose acquaintance he had the honour of enjoying would know that it had not been his practice to supply his friends with such articles; but, on the contrary, the best that could be procured for money. In regard to his election experience, the hon. Member showed a want of knowledge which he might easily have remedied by referring to the ordinary channels of communication. The hon. Member had spoken in terms of reprobation of the practices indulged in at his (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck's) elections; but he could assure the hon. Member that the usual practice in connection with his elections was for him to be returned without any opposition at all. He really thought that the hon. Member must for a moment have fancied himself at a Trade Conference, where whenever he had a disagreeable opponent to deal with who was likely to occasion trouble he had him turned out. He did not think the hon. Member was likely to turn him (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) out, and he was not in the least afraid of anything the hon. Member could say.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, that before the Amendment was withdrawn, he wished to enter a protest against the statement of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), that committee rooms were absolutely unnecessary. Of course, he was unable to say what the case was in regard to the borough represented by the hon. and learned Gentleman; but he could speak for a much larger borough—namely, the one which he himself represented (Greenwich), and which was 13 square miles in extent. In that case, as in that of the large constituency of the Tower Hamlets, represented by his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. Ritchie), committee rooms were absolutely necessary. One committee room in the centre of the district would be perfectly useless. He should like to call the attention of the Attorney General for one moment to a point upon which he wished to elicit from the hon. and learned Gentleman a clear statement—namely, whether or not they were to understand that although the number of committee rooms was limited by the previous clause, the number of rooms in which a candidate could hold meetings of his committee for the purpose of addressing them was unlimited? This was a very important matter. He was quite certain that the Attorney General had no wish to provide traps for the unwary to fall into; but unless some further explanation was given, the result would be that a candidate, although acting in perfect good faith, would inevitably fall into the pit provided for him by this clause.

MR. BIGGAR said, he was of opinion that if the manner in which the clause dealt with committee rooms was correctly stated by the Attorney General, the provision itself was perfectly worthless. The object of the clause, as he understood it, was to put down treating at an election; but if there was any one place where treating would take place to a large extent, it was the place where the clerks made out their canvass books, to enable the election to be carried on. According to the doctrine of the Attorney General, meetings might take place in public-houses, the candidate might call the committee together, hold communication with them publicly, and then privately give every facility for treating to any extent. Now, he (Mr. Biggar) was no advocate for treating the electors. Nothing could be more hazardous than for the candidate to have drinking going on among his committee and paid employés; but unless the principle of this clause was very much altered, he did not see how that evil was to be avoided. He believed that the most sensible thing would be for the Committee to ignore the clause altogether. If the clause was intended to have any practical effect, it should prohibit the meeting of electors in a public-house, and the use of the public-house, or any other place where drink was consumed, altogether. If any other course were taken the candidate would simply hire a room, post up a placard to say "this is my committee room," and then the principal part of his supporters would go to a neighbouring public-house, and drink there just as much as if the committee room were actually in the public-house itself; and as far as the consumption of drink was concerned, the provision inserted in the Bill would have no practical effect whatever. Unless the clause were made much more stringent, he thought it would be just as well for the Attorney General to withdraw it altogether.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, he thought there was a very simple answer to the point which had been raised by his hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry De Worms). His hon. Friend asked if he was to understand from the Attorney General that a candidate could hire as many rooms as he pleased for holding public meetings, provided they were not used as committee rooms? Now, if his hon. Friend would look at the Schedule he would find that Part II. showed the legal expenses of a candidate, in addition to the expenses under Part I., and one of those items was the expense of holding public meetings. Then, if he went on to Part IV. of the Schedule, he would find that the maximum scale for boroughs, where the number of members on the register did not exceed 2,000, was £350; where it did exceed 2,000, the maximum amount was £380, with an additional £30 for every 1,000 electors above 2,000. If the candidate wished to spend £350 in holding public meetings, he could do so in a constituency which did not exceed 2,000; and in a constituency exceeding that number he could go to the extent of £380, with an additional £30 for every 1,000 above 2,000.

MR. RITCHIE said, he thought it was desirable that the Attorney General should give some kind of explanation in answer to the question which he had put, and which he considered to be a very important one.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had answered it already.

MR. RITCHIE begged the hon. and learned Gentleman's pardon; he had not addressed himself to the point at all. Clause 6 made it an illegal practice to pay money on account of any committee room in excess of the number allowed by the first Schedule of the Act. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that a candidate might hire a room in a public-house for the purpose of addressing a meeting of his committee; but that would not, of necessity, become a committee room, and the point, therefore, was this—that while the Schedule limited the number of committee rooms, the hon. and learned Gentleman was practically doing away with that limit by allowing the candidate to engage a room in every public-house in the borough for the purpose of addressing a meeting of his committee. The noble Viscount the Member for South Wiltshire (Viscount Folkestone) said the expenditure was controlled by the maximum set forth in the Schedule, and that was just what he (Mr. Ritchie) complained of. In addition to fixing a maximum, they were limiting the number of committee rooms, and yet were abolishing that limitation by saying that the candidate might hire a room in every public-house in the place for the purpose of addressing his committee. He wanted to know how the Attorney General intended to meet that point?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was afraid that he must intrude himself upon the attention of the Committee once more, or otherwise he might appear to be discourteous to the hon. Member who compelled him to do so. He certainly thought that he had answered the question put to him by the hon. Gentleman and also by other hon. Members.

MR. RITCHIE said, he had spoken three times, but he had not yet received an answer.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. member had spoken very often, no doubt. The object of the clause was to meet the case of committee meetings being held in public-houses, where meetings might be held in secret from day to day, nobody knowing what went on at them. The case was altogether different with regard to public meetings, and he did not care so much about them, because they were above-board and open to observation, and everybody knew what went on at them, and could provide a remedy if anything wrong was done. As to the question of expense to the candidate, if a man engaged more rooms than he ought to have he would have to give an account of them, and the full matter would have to be discussed. There would be two safeguards. First, there was a limitation as to the number of committee rooms; and, next, if a room was hired at a public-house, it must be used for public purposes. In the next place, if an excessive number of rooms were hired, the maximum fixed in the Schedule would come into play.

MR. GREGORY said, he thought the hon. and learned Attorney General had invited the discussion which had taken place upon this clause. He confessed, however, on looking at the Amendments upon the Paper, that none of them met the objections which had been so strongly raised, and in which he entirely concurred. A good deal of time would have been occupied in discussing the Amendments, and it was, perhaps, better that it should be occupied in discussing the clause generally as it stood. It seemed to him that the Attorney General had hardly shown sufficient confidence in his own Bill. What he appeared to contemplate was, that the mere fact of a committee sitting in a house of public entertainment would immediately encourage drinking. The hon. and learned Gentleman evidently left out the consideration of the disabilities to which the Bill subjected the committee and the candidate if drinking took place. One of the most important consequences was that the election would thereby be voided, and that the offence could very easily be brought home to the committee. Surely, then, it would be rather a safeguard and a protection that the committee should be sitting in a public-house, so that the agents of the candidate might prevent any practice of that kind being carried on, or any illegal practice whatever being resorted to. He could not help thinking that it was a mere chimera that was raised by the Attorney General, and that the clause was entirely uncalled for by any difficulty which would arise. It was unwarrantable to conclude that the mere fact that the presence of an election committee in a public-house or refreshment-house would lead to corrupt practices.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF wished to put a question to the Attorney General. When he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) addressed the Committee some time ago, he asked the Attorney General to put words into the clause to make it perfectly clear that holding meetings in a public-house would not be prohibited. He thought it was absolutely necessary, before they proceeded with this clause and divided upon it, that the Attorney General should tell them if he did intend to put words into the clause or not; because he had understood the hon. and learned Gentleman, by the gestures he had made some time ago, to say that he would do so. The hon. and learned Gentleman, however, had avoided saying so in express terms. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would give the Committee some explanation, or the Committee ought to meet the clause with vehement opposition.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he had been unwilling to make any positive promise; but he would give an undertaking to this extent—that he would, at the end of the section, or in the Definition Clause, introduce words excepting the hire of rooms used for the purpose of addressing meetings from the operation of the clause. Perhaps it would be advisable to take a Division on the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Whitehaven (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), in order to see what the opinion of the Committee was as to the principle of the clause.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK remarked, that if the hon. and learned Attorney General found that he could not define a committee room in the way he proposed, he hoped he would not leave out of consideration a case where a candidate was himself staying in a house of entertainment. That was a rather important distinction, and he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had already illustrated it by his own case.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he did not see how a Division upon the earlier Amendment would affect the whole of the clause. He himself had an Amendment lower down to include a club in which, by the rules, intoxicating liquors might be supplied to the members; but if he understood what words the Attorney General proposed to insert at the end of the clause, it might not be necessary for him to propose that Amendment. At the same time, it certainly was not his intention to acquiesce in the clause as it stood in the Bill. He thought that if the principle was once conceded that a committee meeting should not be held at a public-house, it would also be necessary to provide that it should not be held at a club in which intoxicating liquors were provided for the members. He did not see how it was possible to decide every question by a Division upon the Amendment now before the House; and, therefore, whatever was done in regard to the present Amendment, he should consider himself perfectly free to move that which stood in his own name.

MR. CALLAN said, he had prepared an Amendment which he thought would remove all the main objections which had been raised upon this point, and which would carry out very clearly what the Attorney General had stated, and what the hon. and learned Gentleman had no doubt stated in good faith. At the same time, the Committee could have no certainty and no assurance whatever that the Election Judges would construe the Act in the same sense and spirit as the Attorney General; and the Amendment he would suggest was to insert, after the word "election," in line 9—

"Provided, however, that nothing in this clause shall render illegal the use of any part of such premises for holding a meeting to address the electors."

If the Attorney General would accept such a Proviso, he thought it would remove a great part of the objections which had been raised to the clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, the object of the Amendment he had now to move was to exclude clubs from the operation of the clause. He was quite prepared to accept any modification of his Amendment which would draw a distinction between genuine clubs and what were sometimes called sham clubs, which were got up on principles very different, indeed, to those of the recognized clubs of the country. He believed he was perfectly correct in saying that in certain parts of the country clubs had been built, and built, in great part, for the special purpose of being used for committee rooms on election days, and for the promotion and procurement of the election of certain candidates. Why were clubs built for a special purpose not to be used for that purpose? It was a perfect libel upon most of the clubs of the country to say that they were badly conducted. As a matter of fact, hon. Gentlemen knew that the clubs of the country, as a rule, were conducted with perfect regularity and order. It did seem exceedingly hard to exclude from use buildings which were partly erected for the special purpose—a purpose thoroughly legitimate in itself—of aiding the election of a given candidate. He begged to move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 6, to leave out the words “or any premises where any intoxicating liquor is sold.”—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was an admitted fact that there were good clubs as well as bad or spurious clubs. He did not think it was possible to draw, for legislative purposes, a distinction between good and bad clubs. They must take the good with the bad, and ask themselves whether it was better to close a club or not on a polling day? Personally, he should vote against the opening of the clubs; but he admitted that that was an open question upon which there was a great diversity of opinion. He should like hon. Gentlemen to vote just as they pleased; of course, he knew they always did. He was, however, very gratified with the support he had received from the Committee hitherto; but he really considered that that was a question on which they all might take very different views.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, whether the committee of the Reform Club would be supposed to suspend its operation during the Westminster election?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, no election committee meetings were held at the Reform Club.

MR. W. H. SMITH desired to point out to the Attorney General the real danger of the proposal he was now making. He (Mr. W. H. Smith) understood it was proposed to exclude a genuine Political Club altogether as a place in which a committee, or a candidate, could hold their meetings. But he thought it was very probable that the members of clubs would form themselves into committees within the club itself, in spite of the candidate. The club room, or a room in the club, would not then be a committee room as far as the candidate, or the agent of the candidate, was concerned. If he (Mr. W. H. Smith) knew anything of the enthusiasm of the members of clubs, in such counties as Lancashire and Yorkshire, he was fully convinced, in his own mind, that there was not a club in those counties which, on the day of an election, would not be practically used as committee rooms, for the meeting of committees which would be most efficient committees for promoting the election of the candidate to which the members of the club attached themselves. Would that be a corrupt or an illegal practice, or would it come within the limit of the clause? There would be a committee room, and it would be in a building in which intoxicating liquor was sold. How could they get over the difficulty? He asked the hon. and learned Attorney General, with no desire to put difficulties in his way, because he thoroughly sympathized with the object the hon. and learned Gentleman had in view, which he understood to be to prevent spurious clubs competing with public-houses.

MR. GORST said, as the Bill now stood genuine Political Clubs would not be excluded. He supposed a committee could go into the Reform Club for the purpose of opposing or supporting the election of any particular candidate for the City of Westminster according to the rules of the Club; but if the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope's) own proposition was carried, then the genuine clubs would be forbidden to sit in any place in which intoxicating liquors were sold.

MR. W. E. FORSTER confessed that if those words were retained there would be a remarkable evasion of the law, or else the Political Clubs, especially in the large towns, would be very much interfered with. His experience was that all the ardent Liberal partizans met at a Liberal Club, and he believed that the same was the case in regard to the Conservative partizans. Although the members of the club might not actually form themselves into a committee, yet whenever they happened to meet in a club, at the time of an election, they talked about nothing else but the election. He did not suppose there was a committee in a borough which was so effective for the purpose of promoting any particular election as that formed of the members of the clubs, who generally happened to be active partizans. If the clause remained unaltered, the meetings of members of clubs, on days of election, would be prohibited. There would certainly be a feeling that such a prohibition was hardly fair. Clubs were, for all practical purposes, committee rooms; and, therefore, he (Mr. W. E. Forster) should avail himself of the suggestion of the Attorney General to vote as he pleased; and his vote would certainly be given against the retention of the words.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that no one doubted that the good Political Clubs which existed in many Northern towns would, if the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) were accepted, suffer great inconvenience. On the other hand, the Committee ought to consider that there were many clubs which were really nothing less than very inferior public-houses. Now, what he wanted to put before the Committee was that they were going to close the ordinary avenues to treating by prohibiting the use of public-houses as committee rooms; but, did they not suppose that if they shut the door in that direction, and left it open in another, very soon they would have a fine crop of so-called clubs, which in reality would exist for the purpose of treating at elections? They would be of mushroom growth. It was not necessary that a club should be as old as Brook's or White's, in order to be called a club. He fancied clubs would spring into existence shortly before a General Election, and die very likely as soon as the poll was known. The Committee was engaged in the great endeavour to put down bribery and corruption at elections. Was it not a necessity that any Act of this kind should inflict inconvenience, and very likely unmerited inconvenience, on many good and honest people? They had to look, not at the convenience of the candidate, and not even at the convenience of the voters, but at what they hoped to be the effect upon Parliament in the future, by stopping all the avenues to corruption. He considered that such an object, and such an aim, was one that would justify them in inflicting even greater inconvenience than would be inflicted, by prohibiting the use for committee rooms of all places where refreshments were provided.

MR. TOMLINSON said, the danger referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) was a serious one, and they did not get rid of it by shutting up clubs in pursuance of the Amendment now before them. It was a well-known fact that there were a great many clubs—political and non-political—which had no local habitation of their own. These clubs met at public-houses. Now, if a club, having a room of its own, was able to make itself into an informal committee, was it not equally possible for an informal committee to be formed in a public-house, and thereby bringing about great mischief to the candidate? He feared that they were not protecting themselves by this Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER desired to offer a remark or two upon what had fallen from his hon. Friend the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread). The difficulty he felt in the matter was this—that if the views of the Government were carried out they would have to abolish clubs altogether, to shut up their rooms, and not allow people to meet in them, because really their object was political. They were all formed for political purposes; and whenever a meeting of the members took place, they generally considered how they could promote or procure the election of their candidate. What was really required was a definition of what a committee room was; and he did not doubt it was a very difficult thing to arrive at such a definition. He considered it would be rather a mockery to stop committee rooms in one part of the town, and have rooms open in another part in which people met together, and all day long, and considered what steps could be taken for the promoting and procuring the election of a certain candidate. He did not suppose his hon.

Friend (Mr. Whitbread) was prepared to go so far as to say a club should have its doors locked on an election day. His (Mr. Forster's) difficulty was how they could prevent such a state of things.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE ventured to suggest that they, on the Opposition side of the House, had a right to claim the vote of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) in opposition to the clause. If the clause had any effect at all, it was clear that its immediate effect would be of a most pernicious character. The result of the operation of the clause would be that a vast number of institutions would spring up, like mushrooms, at the time of an election, and they would all be utilized for the most flagrant and corrupt purposes. Such was the opinion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), and therefore the Opposition ought to claim his vote on that occasion. The hon. Gentleman could not have used a stronger argument in favour of the statement urged two hours ago from the Opposition Benches—namely, that by the effect of drawing the strings too tightly they would produce a greater evil than that which now existed.

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE wished to make one appeal to the Attorney General to consider the case of a strictly Political Club which was also the headquarters, as the case might be, of the Liberal or the Conservative Party of the borough, for instance, of Exeter. In that borough the secretary to the Conservative Club was also the Conservative registration agent. In his capacity as secretary he had rooms in the club throughout the year, where, no doubt, he kept his registration books and papers, and carried on his work of promoting and procuring the election of certain men. When an election, however, came round, he would have to turn out bag and baggage, with all his books and papers, and probably, for two or three weeks, occupy rooms, it might be, on the other side of the street. Such was certainly one of the effects of this clause.

MR. RYLANDS said, they were discussing the question as to whether committees should or should not be allowed to be held in Political Clubs. In the first place, they were confronted with the difficulty as to what a committee really was. It might occur that a candidate would say that if there were no lists of voters, or other things usually appertaining to a committee, no committee was being held in any particular room. He (Mr. Rylands) was of opinion that they certainly could not prevent a number of electors meeting in a club, and reporting to each other the names of the different voters who ought to be seen, or about whose political opinion it was desirous to get some information. But whether that was done with the consent of the candidate or not, he (Mr. Rylands) had no doubt it would be asserted that a committee was being held in the club, and the candidate would probably be held to be guilty of an illegal practice. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) had said that if they refused to allow committees in public-houses, but allowed them in clubs, they would have spurious clubs created for the sole purpose of giving drink. It was not necessary to hold committees, in one or other of the clubs, in order to afford facilities for drinking. If they were going to stop treating in public-houses on the day of election, they were going also to stop treating in spurious clubs. Because treating in spurious clubs would be, in no sense, free from the penalty under the Bill. The question really was, did the holding of a committee in a spurious club necessarily lead to corruption? He considered it did; but he was of opinion that if they wanted to stop drinking on the polling day, they ought to pass a law that there should be no sale of drink on that day. He would like very much for the Attorney General to consider for a moment whether he could not meet the Gentlemen who raised objections on this point. Let it be laid down, for instance, in this Act that in those committee rooms held in clubs no drink should be sold or consumed. In fact, let it be made an illegal practice, if drink were sold or consumed. There could not be the slightest reason for inflicting such a serious difficulty on the political Parties of this country, as was now proposed to be inflicted through their clubs. He feared that this really amounted to the striking of a blow at institutions upon which, to a great extent, the political life of this country depended. In the large centres of population clubs did act as great institutions on political subjects. Clubs had their libraries, news rooms, discussions, and addresses delivered by their members; and in other ways political knowledge was disseminated by these institutions. These clubs, too, looked forward to the time of an election in the hope of making use of their promises to promote, or procure, the return of the candidate who held the views espoused by the members. He wished, again, to say that if the Attorney General would so frame his clause that no drink should be consumed or sold in the committee rooms of those clubs, he (Mr. Rylands) certainly would be satisfied.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, there seemed to be a great difference of opinion between the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) and the Attorney General upon this point. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley had said that the whole political life of Burnley depended upon its clubs. But when that remark was made a sceptical smile stole over the face of the Attorney General. Did not the Government see how absurd their efforts at securing purity of election were? They refused to allow a committee to be held in a public-house; but they made no effort to prevent a committee room being opened next door. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) admitted the immense inconvenience that would arise to electors if the clause remained in its present state; but the hon. Gentleman said, so great was the case at stake, that it would be worth while to make the electors suffer that inconvenience. The hon. Gentleman evidently did not seem to see what had been strikingly pointed out by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) — namely, that the political life of many constituencies depended upon its clubs. If they were going to pass what would really put a spoke in the wheel of those clubs, could they doubt for a moment they would deal a blow to the clubs, from which it would be scarcely possible for them to survive? ["No, no!"] An hon. Gentleman opposite cried "No, no!" Did he deny that these Political Clubs were called into existence chiefly with the object of conducting elections? [MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD: I certainly do deny it.] Did the hon. Gentleman deny that those clubs did exercise an immense influence at the time of an election? Did he deny that if they took away the stimulus to those clubs which elections provided that they would strike a blow at the very existence of the institutions? He (Mr. Balfour) could not imagine anyone who knew what these clubs were doubting that proposition for a moment. They were called into existence in order to carry their particular candidates through; and it was ridiculous to suppose that if they were prevented from carrying out their object at elections that a very serious blow would not be dealt them. He trusted the Government would withdraw this clause.

MR. CAUSTON said, he hoped the Attorney General would endeavour to prevent the establishment of sham clubs. He had not the slightest objection to bond fide Political Clubs, the members of which paid an uniform subscription; but what he did object to was that clubs should receive between elections handsome subscriptions and donations, in order that electors between elections might derive considerable pecuniary benefit, by eating and drinking, at the expense of the rich men of the Party. He trusted the Attorney General would deal with such a case in the Bill. He did not know whether that was the proper clause in which to raise such a point; but the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Balfour) just now said that he looked upon these clubs as the proper Party organizations for enlightening the electors on Liberal or Conservative principles. He admitted that Liberals had their clubs as well as Conservatives. It was all very well that they should have; but in some way or other the Committee ought to provide the means to prevent bribery and corruption and unfair treating between elections.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, it was extremely refreshing to hear the words of the hon. Member for Colchester (Mr. Causton), who certainly had had considerable experience in the organization of Liberal clubs. He had no doubt the hon. Gentleman's experience was so great that the observations he had just made would be of great interest in the district to which he belonged. He (Baron Henry de Worms), however, rose to point out the intense absurdity of the position in which the Government had now arrived by this clause. It had been pointed out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr.

Forster) that if the Government wished to be consistent they ought to put a lock on the door of every club on the day of an election. Now, he (Baron Henry De Worms) wanted to ask the Attorney General whether he did not consider it necessary that he should define what a committee room was, and what a committee meeting was? because he took it that the Government had some extraordinary system of curbing and disturbing freedom of speech in members of a club which met together for the purpose of discussing the election and of promoting, as far as they could, the interests of the candidate. And he feared that if the members of a club constituted themselves into a committee meeting, they would, by their act, render a candidate liable for the loss of his seat. Was it possible for absurdity to go further than this—that the members of the Political Club, be it Liberal or Conservative, should be debarred from meeting together at the time of an election for the purpose of promoting the interests of the candidate—the very purpose for which these clubs were really established? He could not conceive anything more oppressive or more ridiculous. If they carried the principle a little further they might say that agents might not meet in a private house for the purpose of promoting the interests or cause of any particular candidate. Where were the Government going to stop? This was really the worst form of political tyranny that ever was imagined. It was only the outcome of this grandmotherly legislation which, on the one hand, affirmed that the working man had not sufficient political influence, and, on the other, treated him as an overgrown baby.

MR. A. F. EGERTON said, it appeared to him that this clause was, in its entirety, an absurdity; and he should, of course, vote against it. But with regard to this particular Amendment, he should like to point out to the Attorney General that in the Division which he had represented for many years the state of things had changed very much since 1859. He first contested an election in 1859, and at that time there was hardly a Liberal or a Conservative Club in existence, and committee rooms were almost invariably taken in some public-houses. But since that time the circumstances had entirely altered in every village in South-East Lancashire; and he believed in every other Division of Lancashire there was a Conservative or a Liberal Club founded upon limited liability principles, and frequented by the most respectable inhabitants of the village. Those were precisely the places which ought to be committee rooms, because they were under the control of the respectable inhabitants of the district. What would happen if these clubs were closed, and not allowed to be used as committee rooms? Rooms would be taken near a public-house, and every facility for surreptitious drinking would be afforded; but if these clubs were allowed to be used as committee rooms—as he thought they ought to be, and for which they were largely intended by their promoters—there would be a certain amount of supervision over them, which would be entirely wanting if the electors were confined within the four corners of this clause. He hoped the Committee would reject the clause altogether.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the only outcome of this matter was that all consumption of drink must be prohibited on the day of election in public-houses and clubs, and also in private houses. It was quite clear that the Attorney General supposed there was a fixed idea that there was treating in public-houses; but, as a matter of fact, there was not; and he challenged the hon. and learned Gentleman to produce a single instance in which, where a committee met in a public-house, there was any amount of treating. Her Majesty's Ministers anticipated that there would be some treating in clubs as well as in public-houses; but would there not be treating in private houses also? If electors were turned out of clubs and public-houses, and took rooms near to a public-house, what was to prevent a large quantity of liquor being carried in and consumed, of course at someone's expense? He did not see how drinking could be stopped, because if people wanted to treat they would treat; and whatever number of Acts of Parliament were passed containing further stringent provisions, if people intended to do such things nobody could prevent them. In order to avoid these pitfalls and this invasion of personal liberty, with which the Bill bristled, he hoped this very ridiculous and stupid clause would be withdrawn.

Baron Henry De Worms

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, a question had been put by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) to which no clear answer had been given. No doubt the number of committee rooms would be limited by the maximum scale; but, of course, there was no limit to committee rooms if only they were not paid for. As his hon. Friend the Member for Wigan (Mr. A. F. Egerton) had said, there was not a village in Lancashire which did not possess a Liberal and a Conservative Club in which the electors met. When there was an election, the people would, of course, meet in these clubs, and many of them were necessarily employed in the conduct of the election. They discussed all the circumstances and arrangements of the election, and practically they used these clubs as committee rooms. If a candidate was seen going about with these people, or going into the clubs, he would be held to have consented to the use of the clubs as committee rooms; and, therefore, he was afraid that candidates would be placed in great danger, even by the legitimate use of club rooms in this way.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had noticed that one or two Members were adopting a view which he had ventured to put forward—namely, that clubs should be closed on the day of election; but he thought it would be a mistake to suppose that any effect this clause might have would be limited to the day of election. It would, he supposed, apply to the whole time.

MR. GORST asked how far this clause would go? In this House there were rooms which were constantly used by people who met to promote and procure the election of candidates. A vacancy hardly ever took place without a meeting between an intended candidate and the leading people of the constituency and the noble Lord the Member for Flintshire (Lord Richard Grosvenor), or the hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. Rowland Winn), in a room in the neighbourhood of the House. If such a meeting was a committee meeting, would it not be held in part of premises in which intoxicating liquor was sold? Under such circumstances, would not a candidate at the very outset disqualify himself for election by taking part in a committee meeting for promoting and procuring his election held in part of premises where intoxicating liquors were sold?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not think the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) could be serious in putting his question. The rooms within the House were held at all times, and not at any particular time. With regard to the question asked by the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross), and by the right hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), a distinction could be drawn between committee rooms in clubs, in which the parties were in the habit of meeting generally, and those which were employed at the particular time of an election. He was disposed to look favourably upon the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham. The whole effect of the clause was not to upset an election, but simply to impose penalties on certain persons. If persons met in a room in which they had been accustomed to meet, and showed their zeal, perhaps more developed on the election day, that room would not be a committee room for a particular election. He could not conceive it possible that a meeting of persons under these circumstances could be held as a committee room. There was, without doubt, great force in what had fallen from the right hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) if they could prevent the action of bad clubs; but it was impossible to draw a line. Whatever was the decision of the Committee upon this matter, the Government would accept it.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, hon. Members seemed to be carried away by the idea that by opposing this Amendment they would get rid of spurious clubs. He saw great objection to the existence of such clubs, and felt that they ought to be dealt with by law whenever a case arose; but that point did not arise here. The reason why he urged this Amendment was that these clubs were intended to be made centres of political life on one side or the other; and this Bill proposed that they should cease to be the centres of political life.

MR. LEWIS said, the Committee was in great difficulty through having to vote upon this Amendment at all. If they voted for it they would be in this position. They would be doing what he conceived to be an act of Pharisaical injustice to public-houses, on the hypothesis that, as they were centres of corrupt treating, they were to be closed; whilst, on the other hand, some places which were substitutes for the public-houses were to be allowed to remain open. To be consistent, the Government ought to prevent people drinking at all on the day of an election; and he did not think that some of these clauses were more stringent than that proposal. Such a provision would place everybody on an equal footing. He concurred in the view that there ought to be a definition of a committee room. It was all very well to leave that to the Judge; but anyone who had had any experience in these matters might take a totally different view from a Judge, and it would be impossible to say what view any particular Judge would take. The Committee being in this difficulty, and there being a widespread desire among Members to vote against the clause as a whole, he thought the best thing would be to strangle the clause piecemeal; and he should vote for the omission of these words, in the hope that, eventually, the clause would be entirely omitted, it being an additional infringement of the liberty of the subject.

Question put.

MR. ONSLOW proposed an Amendment, with the object of putting all kinds of vendors of refreshment, whether in the shape of food or liquor, on an equality. The Attorney General had stated that what he wanted to do was to prevent the meeting of committees in public-houses. He himself should like to see the same meeting of committees prevented in coffee taverns for the purpose of treating. It appeared to him to be quite as wrong to treat a man to coffee and tea and buns as to a glass of beer; and, therefore, he wished to insert, in page 7, line 7, after the word "intoxicating," the words "or other." That, he presumed, would include the selling of all non-alcoholic liquor—such as aerated water, tea, coffee, and cocoa—and what he desired was to put places where those liquors were sold on the same footing as public-houses. If they eliminated one class of Her Majesty's subjects from having one kind of committee rooms for election purposes, the same principle ought to be applied to all other subjects. He believed that, as the clause stood, grocers, who had licenses for the sale of drinks, would not be able to let their rooms; but, in order to make this clause consistent—obnoxious as it was—they ought to put in some words such as he suggested. He also wished to insert after the word "liquor," the words "or refreshment of any kind, whether as food or drink." That would include butcher's shops. He knew no place where treating could be done better than in butcher's shops. He had heard, on the best authority, that there was an enormous amount of treating when a committee met over a butcher's shop; and, therefore, if purity of election was to be obtained, all places ought to be put on an equality.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 7, after the word "intoxicating," to insert the words "or other."—(Mr. Onslow.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he should be glad if the hon. Member would not move this Amendment now. He quite admitted the danger of treating in these other places; but, as a matter of principle, there might be treating at temperance hotels as well as elsewhere. He had, however, stated that he would bring up an Amendment, in the proper place, which would apply the clause to places where food or drink was sold for consumption on the premises.

MR. ONSLOW said, that would go a great way; but, as a rule, chops and steaks were not consumed on the premises. If the hon. and learned Gentleman would also say "on or off the premises," he should be satisfied. If they prohibited drink, they must prohibit food, or refreshment of any kind. He would withdraw his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he wished now to move a clause, which he had prepared hastily, to meet the view of the Committee, as expressed, to some extent, by the Division which had just taken place. He thought he ought not to disregard a considerable minority as well as a majority. The Amendment they had been discussing was "any premises where intoxicating liquors are sold." These words would cover the case of clubs of all kinds. The question was raised upon the fact that in a club liquors were not sold, in an ordinary sense of the word, as meant by the Act of Parliament; and, in order to bring the point to a tangible form, he proposed to add after the word "sold," these words—

"Or is supplied to members of a club, society, or association, other than a permanent political club."

The clause would then read—

"Public-house or any premises where any intoxicating liquor is sold, or is supplied to members of a club, society, or association, other than a permanent political club."

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 7, after the word "sold," to insert the words "or is supplied to members of a club, society, or association, other than a permanent political club."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. WHITBREAD said, the words "a permanent political club" presented a difficulty to his mind. It would be a difficult matter for the Judge to decide, and he doubted whether a Judge could decide, what constituted "a permanent political club."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he thought it was very inconvenient to have to discuss this Amendment within a few minutes of the suspension of the Sitting. It was not so simple a matter as the Attorney General seemed to think. To "supply" was a very different thing from "selling." If a member of a club asked other members to dine with him and supplied them with liquor, that club would at once become premises in which committee rooms might not be taken. The Committee were driving committee rooms into private houses by the Amendment already passed, and now they were going to disqualify private houses from being places where anybody connected with a candidate could take or give refreshment to anybody else. That was a reflection which occurred to him from the word "supply," and he thought it would be wise now to report Progress. The Attorney General had proposed an important Amendment at the last moment, which he might have proposed an hour ago, and expected the Committee to come to a conclusion at once. He would move that Progress be reported, in order that this point might be properly considered, for he had great doubt whether it would not go a great deal further than the Attorney General intended.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Lord Randolph Churchill.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the Committee would not consider the course he had taken unreasonable. He saw no difficulty in considering the permanent clubs. There might be mushroom clubs springing up, and the object of the Amendment was to prevent that.

MR. GORST said, it appeared to him that the reason given by the noble Lord for reporting Progress was perfectly sound. He had listened attentively to the words of the Amendment as read; but it was impossible to catch them clearly, and he entertained doubts whether they would carry out the intention of the Attorney General.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that it was very usual for the Committee to afford some indulgence to the promoter and conductor of a measure; and bearing in mind that they were not now on the final stage of the Bill, there would be opportunities for considering any objections to this proposal later on. He admitted that what he was now saying was a claim to privilege; but as it was usual to give that indulgence to the conductor of a Bill when he was endeavouring to make a concession, he hoped Progress would not be agreed to.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, under these circumstances, he would withdraw his Motion; but he hoped the Attorney General would give a full opportunity subsequently to discuss the Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment (The Attorney General) agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day.

— — — — —
RUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES)
BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir William Harcourt,
Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles Dilke,
Mr. Solicitor General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 2nd July.]

[THIRTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Illegal Payment, Employment, or Hiring.

Clause 15 (Use of committee room in house for sale of intoxicating liquor to be illegal hiring).

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 6, after the word “club,” inserted by the last Amendment, to insert the words ‘or any premises where refreshment of any kind, whether food or drink, is sold for consumption on the premises.’—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

MR. ONSLOW said, the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman only partially carried out the views expressed in his Amendment, and he trusted he would agree to the addition of the words “or off,” after the word “on.” He pointed out to the Committee that the Amendment referred only to refreshment to be consumed on the premises;
but there was every likelihood in some cases that it would not be consumed off as well as on the premises. He would take the case of tea, which would very likely be given to certain voters, or it might be to their wives.

That tea, in all probability, would not be consumed on the premises, but consumed off the premises; and, surely, that practice ought to come under the category of illegal practices. Then, again, he pointed out that such food as meat of various descriptions had been, and might be, given again at elections, and that under this Act would be an illegal practice if the meat were consumed on the premises; but there was no possibility of it being consumed on the premises, it would be taken away and consumed off the premises. Therefore, he trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman would see his way to the acceptance of his Amendment, in order to make the clause symmetrical.
There would then be the same law for public-houses as for coffee taverns and shops. Let the Committee suppose that the committee room was over a baker’s shop; it would be very easy for the baker to give away bread or flour, which could not possibly be consumed on the premises. He could not see that there could be any objection to this alteration, which, it appeared to him, ran on all fours with the Amendment of the hon.
and learned Gentleman.

Amendment proposed, to amend the proposed Amendment by inserting after the word “on,” the words “or off.”—
(Mr. Onslow.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the suggestion of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr.
Onslow) was that the clause should apply to all places where things were sold, so that the purchase of an orange would come under the Amendment which the hon. Member wished to introduce. In this way, the proposed alteration would affect every retail trade.
He believed that, on reconsideration, it would be seen that the Government could not accept the Amendment.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he thought it desirable that this further Amendment should be placed in the same position as that which had preceded it—namely, that it should be brought up for consideration on Report. It was quite true the Amendment proposed to deal with a very minute matter; but he would remind the Committee that a great many minute matters were dealt with in this Bill, and it was an important feature in cases of this kind to consider whether they were carrying out their principles to the proper extent, or tying their own hands so tight as to prevent the attainment of the object they had in view. He would suggest that the Amendment should be brought up on Report.

MR. CALLAN said, he presumed, from certain grumblings which reached his ears, that hon. Members opposite were displeased with his speaking on this question. That was possibly due to a feeling that "coming events cast their shadows before." He would ask whether a Member of that House was not to be allowed to express his opinion when he rose to address the Chair?

THE CHAIRMAN said, he must call on the hon. Member to confine himself to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. CALLAN said, he, of course, accepted the ruling of the Chairman. He had risen for the purpose of appealing to the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) to withdraw his Amendment, and to ask the Attorney General to insert in his proposed Amendment the word "ordinarily" before the word "sold," because the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman might be made to operate unjustly against a candidate. Suppose a candidate took a committee room, and that the hostile political party also took another room in the house, and sold there refreshments, under these circumstances it might be held, strictly speaking, to implicate him in an illegal practice. But if the word "ordinarily" were used it would safeguard the proposed Amendment, and, at the same time, make the clause as effectual as the Attorney General wished it to be.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was willing to accept the word "ordinarily" as suggested by the hon. Member.

MR. ONSLOW said, it was with some reluctance that he asked leave to withdraw his Amendment. If it were an hour later, and more hon. Members were in their places on those Benches, he should have felt it his duty to test the feeling of the Committee; but, under the circumstances, he should certainly not trouble hon. Members to go to a Division.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, to amend the proposed Amendment by inserting, after the word "is," the word "ordinarily."
—(Mr. Callan.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, he regretted the minute details which the hon. and learned Gentleman had introduced into this Bill; yet if they did enter into minute details they should endeavour to be perfectly impartial in applying these restrictions. He trusted the Attorney General would accept the Amendment he was about to propose—namely, to add after the words the Committee had already assented to "or any church or any chapel registered or licensed for the performance of public religious worship." They had decided that no houses of physical refreshment should be opened for electoral purposes on the day of election or used as a committee room. He asked that the same rule should be applied to those places which were essentially established for the purposes of spiritual refreshment, and that for election purposes the churches and chapels of England should be closed. He could easily imagine that under the Church Boards Bill proposed by the hon. Member for South Northumberland (Mr. A. Grey) even churches might be used as committee rooms at elections. To the possibility of such a practice he wished to put a stop; he wished to prevent the possibility of scenes of irreverence taking place in buildings which were intended to be used for a wholly different purpose. He would now speak of the chapels of the United Kingdom. These buildings of the Nonconformists were registered, licensed, and established by law; they were, indeed, often in the legal possession of the official Trustee of the Charity Commission, who was a public officer. They could not, therefore, be considered any longer as purely private property, and he said they ought to be protected against the chance of irreverence. The minister or the Governing Body of one of these chapels might have such pressure put upon them at the time of an election contest that they might be almost compelled to place their chapel at the disposal of one of the contending parties, to the utter disgust of many of the congregation. The chapels were licensed for public worship, and he thought it right to say that they should not be used for any purpose except of a kindred nature—that was to say, the teaching of children, or other matters connected with the object for which they were established. It might be said that up to the present time no chapel had been used for a committee room. But it did not follow that they might not be used as such in the future. He believed there was no one on either side of the House who would not regret that the churches and chapels of the Kingdom should be used for electioneering purposes; and, therefore, he asked the Government to place its veto on their being so applied. By adding his Amendment to the clause the Government would not be injuring the Bill, but rather carrying out both its letter and its spirit. There was another aspect of this question to which he would ask the attention of the Committee. Many persons looked upon some of the churches of the country as nothing better than ancient monuments. They were looked upon as ancient monuments; not as religious buildings. That being so, he was right in saying that the feeling of some persons was so strong in the direction of secularizing them that he was justified in moving the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 7, after the word "premises," to insert the words "or any church or any chapel registered or licensed for the performance of public religious service."—(Mr. Stanley Leighton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was unable to assent to the proposal of the hon. Member for North Shropshire. The Government had declared, over and over again, their wish that this Bill should pass through the House without any Party feeling being excited, and he was quite sure that it would be the wish of the Committee that the discussion should proceed without the importation into it of religious feeling. He thought this was a very objectionable Amendment. Let the hon. Member for one moment consider the nature of the clause, and he would perceive that it was in no way connected with the proposal which he had made. The hon. Gentleman said he objected to churches and chapels being used for election purposes; but that question had nothing whatever to do with the present clause, which applied to committee rooms only.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, his objection was to churches and chapels being used as committee rooms.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, if the hon. Member could give him one single instance of a church or chapel having been used as a committee room he would very much strengthen his argument in support of the Amendment. He had given the Committee a promise that the word committee room in the clause should not include any room used for the purpose of public meetings. Why churches or chapels should be used for committee rooms, as was apprehended by the hon. Member, he was utterly at a loss to conceive. Moreover, the proposal of the hon. Member might be regarded as an invidious attack upon the Roman Catholic as well as the Nonconformist Bodies. He sincerely trusted that the hon. Gentleman would accept his assurance that the clause would not apply to any buildings used for the purpose of public meetings, and that he would not feel it necessary to prolong the discussion of a question which could lead to no practical result.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he did not assent to the proposition that this clause was simply meant to put down corruption, although no doubt that was its intention in the mind of the Attorney General. Although the clause appeared to be a very simple one it had given rise to considerable differences of opinion, as would appear from the many Amendments of which Notice had been given. They were now dealing with an Amendment on the Paper; but there was one farther on which dealt with Public Elementary Schools, and he hoped that the Attorney General would see his way to accept it when it was reached. He trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman, when they came to that Amendment, would not take the same objection as he had taken to the Amendment now before the Committee, and say that it was not relevant to the clause. Nobody, he was convinced, wished to see churches and chapels used for election purposes. He had a very strong feeling on the subject himself, and he hoped, before the Bill passed into law, this Amendment of his hon. Friend would be incorporated with it. He thought, however, that it would be better to bring it forward as a separate clause, because they had no desire to mix up a subject of this kind with questions relating to public-houses. As he had already said, he felt very strongly against churches and chapels being used for the purpose indicated; and he was bound to say that many things which had taken place in connection with religious buildings during the last General Election had shocked his mind very much. The practice was a growing one, although it might be said to be new, and he should be very sorry to see it extended. In suggesting to his hon. Friend that he should withdraw his Amendment and bring it forward in the shape of a new clause he would point out that if it were withdrawn, it would be in Order that it might become the subject of future discussion. If the Attorney General did not assent to that proposal the present discussion must, as a matter of course, be continued.

MR. COCHRAN-PATRICK said, he wished to point out that the Bill was intended to apply to the whole of the United Kingdom, and that, so far as Scotland was concerned, they would be placed in rather a peculiar position by the adoption of the hon. Member's proposal. The ecclesiastical buildings in Scotland were not consecrated buildings, as in England, and they were not altogether used for clerical purposes. The Established churches belonged to the heritors, and were frequently used for the purpose of public meetings of every sort. The position of these buildings would be peculiar; because, whilst some of them were used for purposes of public meetings, others were not, and he thought it right to point this out, because he foresaw that the proposal of the hon. Member would lead to great practical difficulties in the case of Scotch churches and chapels.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, he was very much obliged for the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), that he should withdraw his Amendment, and bring it up on Report in the shape of a new clause. He was quite willing to accede to the right hon. Gentleman's request, provided the Government would promise him their support. In that case the discussion would be postponed, and it would not be necessary for him to take up any further time in Committee. ["Divide!"] Hon. Members opposite seemed somewhat impatient of this subject; but they must not suppose that all the clauses of the Bill would be passed simply because they cried "Divide." He protested against the practice of shouting down hon. Members, and he trusted that some means would be found to check such disorderly interruptions. He hesitated to withdraw his Amendment, seeing that the Attorney General had expressed himself practically in favour of its principle, unless he promised it his support hereafter. If hon. Members opposite were honest in their convictions that churches and chapels would never be applied to election purposes, they could have no possible reason for objecting to such use of them being prohibited by the Bill. He would be glad to hear from the Attorney General what prospect there was for the Government entertaining his Amendment on Report, otherwise he should feel it his duty to proceed to a Division upon a question which involved so deep a principle.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, it seemed to him, however advisable it might be to prohibit the use of sacred edifices for election purposes, that the proposal of the hon. Member for North Shropshire (Mr. Leighton) was incongruous with the present clause. He would not say that it might not be well to re-introduce it on Report; but, at the present stage, it was clearly out of place.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, he should have been glad if the Attorney General had put down his foot a little more firmly with regard to the absurd Amendment of the hon. Member opposite. Why should places of worship be made the object of the exceptional legislation which the hon. Member intended? The object of the hon. Member in including churches in his Amendment was very clear, his real aim being the Nonconformist places of worship. The hon. Member knew very well that churches were so guarded that they could not be used for any purpose of the kind he had described. But, strangely enough, the Attorney General had said he objected strongly to chapels being used for political purposes. He (Mr. Illingworth) did not know that it was the duty of that House to guard Nonconformist places of worship. Those places of worship were the property of those who built them; and the guardianship of their sacredness in no wise belonged to the hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Stanley Leighton) might have some concern about the effect of those chapels on a General Election; but let him (Mr. Illingworth) draw his attention to the fact that National schools were always available to the Conservative Party, and that in no instance that he was aware of had they been used by the opponents of that Party. He hoped that neither now, nor at any other time would such a preposterous proposal as this be accepted.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) had an Amendment on the Paper, for the purpose of excluding the schools referred to by the hon. Member.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was anxious that the matter should be fairly and properly discussed.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON said, he would withdraw the Amendment now, and bring it up as a new clause.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ONSLOW said, he had an Amendment to move which, he thought, would be acceptable to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. It was after the words "committee room," in line 8, to insert "as hereinafter defined." He did not wish to renew the discussion they had had this afternoon as to what a committee room was to be. The hon. and learned Gentleman had, no doubt, promised to define what "committee room" was; but surely there could not be any objection to the insertion of these words.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he thought his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) had an Amendment on the Paper which came before that of the hon. Member.

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes; that is so.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that in the absence of his noble Friend, he would move the Amendment which was, in line 7, after the word "premises," to insert the words—

"Or the premises of any public elementary school in receipt of an annual Parliamentary grant."

He did not propose to offer any arguments in support of the Amendment, as the subject had been already thoroughly discussed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 7, after the word "premises," to insert the words "or the premises of any public elementary school in receipt of an annual Parliamentary grant."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the Amendment, coming as it did from such an authority—namely, the noble Lord who had been connected with the Education Department—no doubt, deserved careful consideration. He had considered the matter, and was of opinion that these school buildings ought not to be used as committee rooms; therefore, he should be prepared to accept the Amendment. He was not quite sure, however, that this was the proper place in which to insert the words, although if the hon. Member thought it right to press them, he would at once assent to them.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that if the hon. and learned Member would accept the Amendment, he would put it in here; but, if it should be later on found inconvenient, he would agree to its being taken out and put in somewhere else.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, there was another Amendment on the Paper, in the name of an hon. Friend (Mr. Tatton Egerton) which, in the absence of that hon. Friend, he would take upon himself to move. The object of the Amendment was to make the clause clear in regard to clubs. In ordinary cases, good clubs would be lent for the purpose of being used as committee rooms, and would not be let. The Amendment he had to propose would make it clear that the clause did not apply to clubs so lent, but only to those that were let.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 8, to leave out the word "used," and insert the word "let."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

Mr. Illingworth

Question proposed, "That the word proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the hon. Member probably did not see what would be the effect of this Amendment. If they passed it, the result would be that so long as there was no specific contract for hiring these premises—whether clubs or public-houses—they could be used to any extent. The proprietor of a public-house would be able to say to a candidate—"Come here and use my rooms as much as you like; I will not let, but will lend them to you." It was the use of these rooms, and not the contract that he (the Attorney General) objected to.

MR. TOMLINSON said, the clause contained these words—

"and if any person hires or uses any such premises or any part thereof for a committee room he shall be guilty of illegal hiring."

Clearly those words, which came later on in the clause, would stop the use of public-houses and clubs. The clause went on to say—

"and the person letting such premises or part, if he knew it was intended to use the same as a committee room, shall also be guilty of illegal hiring."

How "using" could make "illegal hiring" in the words of the clause, he was at a loss to understand.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the words the hon. Member referred to came later on.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that after the Attorney General's explanation he would not persist in the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ONSLOW said, he would now move the Amendment to which he had referred.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 8, after the word "room," to insert the words "as hereinafter defined."—(Mr. Onslow.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that he must again ask his hon. Friend not to press this Amendment. His hon. Friend wished to put him under a bond to define what committee room was; but he was not sure that he would be able to do it. He had promised to say what should not be a committee room—to insert some provision to the effect that the clause should not render illegal the use of these rooms for the purpose of holding meetings at which addresses were delivered to the electors. If he could give a definition in this matter he should be glad to do so. He had not had much time to devote to it—he had been trying to do it, however, although he could not say he had made much progress. It was not to be understood that in saying this he was giving a definite undertaking to furnish a definition.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he certainly thought the hon. and learned Gentleman was right in what he said. It was one thing to define what a certain thing was not, but it was a very different thing to define what it was.

MR. CALLAN said, he thought it would better for the words bringing about the proposed alteration to come in where he had suggested, and that the definition of "committee room" should be left for the Interpretation Clause at the end of the Bill.

MR. ONSLOW said, he saw the force of the hon. and learned Gentleman's objection, and would reserve his Amendment to the Report stage, when it was known how the definition of committee room stood. It seemed to him important to define in the Bill somehow what committee room was; and if the hon. and learned Gentleman did his best he should be perfectly satisfied.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. TOMLINSON said, that in the absence of the hon. Member whose name was next on the Paper (Mr. Tatton Egerton), he would move the next Amendment, which was, in line 10, to leave out the word "uses." When this were omitted something else would be suggested in its place.

MR. CALLAN claimed priority for an Amendment he had handed to the Chairman in writing, and which had reference to line 9.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to know to what the hon. Member was alluding?

MR. CALLAN said, he had handed to the Chairman an Amendment in MS., to come in after the word "election," which came in before the word "uses."

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Gentleman's Amendment should be moved at the end of the clause.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he would move the Amendment to which he had referred. It seemed to him that the construction of this part of the clause was very different to that of the first part. He could understand anyone hiring a room of this kind being liable to a penalty; but he could not understand anyone using one being liable.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 10, to leave out the word "uses." — (Mr. Tomlinson.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if the word "uses" were struck out, the use of rooms in public-houses would be entirely unchecked—it would be tantamount to saying "you shall not do a certain thing" without imposing a penalty for doing it. If they had said using should not take place, it was necessary to say what should constitute using.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he wished to move, in the name of his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex, to insert—

"Provided always, that this section shall not apply where it can be shown that no other suitable premises were available."

There were many county, and even borough, districts where no room could be secured for the purpose of a committee room, except in a public-house. He should like to take the hon. and learned Gentleman into some of the wilder parts of his own constituency. He would there find the houses very thinly scattered about. He would find no sort of public place for the transaction of election business, or the holding of meetings but the inns and taverns; therefore, if the public-houses were not to be used as committee rooms, the candidates for the district would have no rooms whatever which they could use for the purpose. And this was not a solitary instance. He believed there were many parts of the country where—as this Amendment suggested—they would only be able to obtain committee rooms in public-houses. The Amendment did not go so far as to state that in unqualified terms—it only stated that where it could be shown that there was no other suitable place available, a room in a public house might be used.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 13, to add—"Provided always, that this section shall not apply where it can be shown that no other suitable premises were available."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, they had already fully discussed this matter, therefore it would not be necessary for him to say much about it. He had done what he could to mitigate any inconvenience which would be felt from the absence of committee rooms; and, if he had stated clearly what was in his mind, hon. Members would be aware that he would agree to the Amendment if he could, but that he feared it would be dangerous to those candidates who wished to conduct elections as purely as possible; and whom he was doing all he could to protect. In the interest of the candidate he could not accept the Amendment. It might be that, being under the impression that there were no suitable premises elsewhere, the candidate, or the election agent, might take committee rooms in a public-house, and it might transpire, subsequently, that there were suitable premises elsewhere. Then he would have to judge what was "suitable," and that would be a duty which it would be most objectionable to throw upon a candidate; and the Judge, on a Petition, would have to say not what was a noun substantive, but what was an adverb, or a verb adverb. By the adoption of the Amendment, they would be putting the candidate at the risk of losing his seat. There would always be the fear of the candidate taking one view of the matter and the Judge another—of the candidate supposing certain premises were "unsuitable," and the Judge declaring they were "suitable." In the interest of the candidate the clause should remain as it was, for it would relieve him of all difficulty. He would know he would not be able to go to a public-house for his committee rooms, and he would not go. He would meet the hon. Member (Mr. Stanhope) and those with whom he was associated if he could; but, really, in the interest of those persons he was trying to protect, he could not accept the Amendment.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, there were many constituencies—his own, which was one of the largest in the country, amongst the number—where it would be impossible in certain districts to obtain a room large enough, except in a public-house. No doubt, it would be difficult to decide what was suitable and what was not suitable; but, at the same time, it could not be questioned that the clause would be felt to be objectionable in many districts. If the candidates were not allowed to avail themselves of rooms in public-houses, in many places the only alternative would be to put up tents for the accommodation of the committees. He hoped some modifying words would be agreed to before the clause was agreed to by the Committee.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he quite felt the force of the objection of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, and if he could see any officer to whom the duty of deciding what were and what were not suitable premises could be entrusted, he would press the Amendment strongly. The sheriff would hardly possess the necessary information to enable him to perform the duty—he was, of course, speaking of counties, as the Amendment would not apply to boroughs—and, besides that, the sheriff might be a strong partizan on the one side or the other. Let them take the Northern Division of Lancashire, for instance. In that district—in which he lived, and with which he was, therefore, familiar—there would hardly be a place, except a public-house, which they could get for use as a committee room. This, he was sure, was only one example of a numerous class of cases. As the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton) who had put the Amendment on the Paper was not present at this moment, he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had consulted with his hon. Friend who had moved it (Mr. Stanhope), and they had decided that the best course would be to withdraw the Amendment, and see whether, before the Bill left Committee, or before the Report, they could not find some authority on the spot to whom they could entrust the task of deciding what were and what were not suitable premises. He was quite sure that if the clause were left as it was at present, great difficulty and inconvenience would be the result. In many places this would happen—a candidate, knowing the advantage he would so secure in a particular district, would seize on the only available place, not a public-house, for his committee rooms, and the other candidate would be left without accommodation of any kind and would be, therefore, at a great disadvantage. He trusted that the discussion of the matter might now be postponed, and that the hon. and learned Gentleman would not shirk the duty of considering it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would consider the matter with the view, if possible, of carrying out the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

MR. CALLAN complained of the manner in which the Attorney General had treated him in this matter. The hon. and learned Gentleman had certainly been too liberal in assigning a room 10 feet square for a committee room. The candidate who would require a larger one would certainly run a serious risk of having his election annulled, supposing he were elected.

MR. WARTON said, he wished, before the Amendment was withdrawn, to make one or two observations which might be of utility later on. The Attorney General seemed to assume that in the case of every election there would be a Petition. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed always to have in his mind how far the Judge might consider that something was right or something was wrong. In the present case he might very well have accepted the Amendment, as it was eminently qualified to describe what was meant. He (Mr. Warton) trusted they would not have a Petition after every election under this Bill; but, however that might be, he certainly was of opinion that such an Amendment as this should be passed, in order to prevent candidates being in some cases altogether deprived of committee rooms. To his mind it would have been well if, throughout this Bill, they had been guided by the rules of plain common sense. Here would have been an opportunity for displaying it—here, finding that in some districts it would be impossible to get committee rooms except in public-houses, they should have allowed them to be taken in public-houses under due precautions and safeguards. He would not descend to particulars, as the Attorney General had done; but he earnestly protested against the principle that these matters would in every case be referred to a Judge, as though in every case an Election Petition were imminent. He was afraid that, in too many cases, Election Petitions would follow; but he protested against the assumption that they must follow in every case.

MR. WIGGIN said, he hoped the Attorney General would endeavour to devise some means of getting them out of this difficulty. In his own county (East Staffordshire) there were several large districts, such as Cannock Chase, where there was no other accommodation for committee rooms, or for holding meetings, than the village taverns. Unless they were allowed to use these places, there would be no places in which they could hold meetings. He did hope the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would do his best to get them out of this difficulty.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, the next Amendment stood in his name—namely, to add at the end of line 13—

“Provided always, That any club may be used as a committee room, if on the day of polling no intoxicating liquors are sold upon the premises.”

He did not propose to move this Amendment, but the next, which stood in the name of his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton), he should move. It was as follows:—

“Provided, That the section shall not apply where it is the ordinary practice of the owners of such premises to let them, or any part of the same, for chambers or offices.”

He did not think he could do better than put to the hon. and learned Gentleman one case to illustrate what the noble Lord had in view in putting the Amendment on the Paper. Let them take the case of the Westminster Palace Hotel. That was, undoubtedly, an hotel where intoxicating liquors were sold; but, on the other hand, a considerable part of it was used as private chambers, committee rooms, places for holding meetings, and the like. His noble Friend was of opinion that where rooms in the hotel were used as private chambers and had separate entrances, they should not come under the provisions of this clause. If the Amendment was not acceptable, he was sure his noble Friend would be willing to go farther, and to agree to a modification requiring the rooms to be altogether shut off from the rest of the hotel. He would agree to add the words, “with separate entrances” to the Amendment. He did not think he could put a case that was stronger than that of the Westminster Palace Hotel, which, as they all knew, was used very largely for committee rooms and similar purposes. Surely, if the part used for these purposes was distinct from that used for an hotel, there could be no objection to exempting it from the clause. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 13, add, “Provided, That the section shall not apply where it is the ordinary practice of the owners of such premises to let them, or any part of the same, for chambers or offices with separate entrances.”—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there added.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, as the Amendment originally stood on the Paper, it was very different from its present form, and he had several reasons for objecting to it. These objections did not apply to the Amendment as it now stood. He had no objection to the addition of the words, seeing that these chambers or offices were to have separate entrances. All he could say was, if the hon. Member would allow him to take up the position, he should like to consider the matter, and if nothing occurred to alter his opinion in the meantime to bring up the Amendment on Report.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Westminster Conservative Association possessed offices in a building belonging to the Westminster Palace Hotel. Directly the present tenancy expired, that portion of the building might be thrown into the hotel. This was a case in point. The words as to separate entrance had been put in at his suggestion, because, as they originally stood, there was strong doubt about them. If the hon. and learned Gentleman would accept the present Amendment in principle, and wait until the Report for making any alteration that he might consider necessary, the arrangement would be one which would be satisfactory to a great many hon. Members.

Mr. Warton

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he thought this proposal a very reasonable one, and he was quite ready to accede to it. He could hardly put the words down at the present moment.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman should, in any Amendment he might bring forward, except every portion of an hotel bona fide let off.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he thought the Attorney General should also put in words providing that the use of public-houses for the holding of public meetings should not be illegal.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he would consider that matter with the other.

COLONEL MAKINS said, there were many other places besides the Westminster Palace Hotel which would be affected by the clause if it were not amended, the Guildhall Tavern, for instance, where, no doubt, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had sat on arbitrations.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he should call attention to this subject again on Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CALLAN said, he would now move his Proviso.

Amendment proposed,

At end of the clause to add, "Provided, however, That nothing in this clause shall render illegal the use of any such part of any such premises for the holding of meetings or the addressing of electors."—(Mr. Callan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he would give as distinct a promise as he could to consider this Proviso, and would endeavour to see whether he could not give way so far as to allow a room to be provided in a public-house for candidates. He would also consider how far concession could be made, if it could be made at all, in the matter of using public-houses for committee rooms.

MR. CALLAN said, he would prefer having the point he was dealing with settled at once by the insertion of this Amendment. If, subsequently, anything should make it appear that his (Mr. Callan's) interpretation of the clause and the Amendment was not correct the clause could be again amended. The hon. and learned Gentleman had no objection to the Proviso, and he (Mr. Callan) could not, therefore, see why he could not accept it; it was no use waiting for the Report when they could settle the matter at once.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, that if the hon. Member would strike out the word "however" he would agree to the Amendment, reserving to himself the right of considering the whole matter later on. It appeared to him that for the purpose of saving time, the best course would be to accept the Amendment.

Original Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

To add, at the end of the clause, "Provided. That nothing in this clause shall render illegal the use of any such part of any such premises for the holding of meetings and the addressing of electors."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. ONSLOW said, that, as a matter of convenience, it would be satisfactory if the Chairman would read out the clause as amended to the Committee. Most of the Amendments which had been made had not been put upon the Paper, and many hon. Members, he thought, were rather in the dark as to what the clause really was.

THE CHAIRMAN read the clause as amended.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he thought the clause before it became a part of the Bill, ought to be corrected in its grammar.

MR. LEWIS said, that if anyone had felt a desire to move the omission of the clause before it was read from the Chair that desire must have been intensified by the reading. Whether he looked at it from a grammatical point of view, or from the point of common sense, his love for it did not increase by the operation which had just been gone through. He would not go into trivial matters; but would deal with the clause in its entire and general aspect. It had been greatly amended—he did not think there was a clause in the whole Bill which had been more altered during the process of incubation. It had been tightened here and loosened there, and it was a most 'ghastly instrument now that they had finished with it. For his own part, he maintained the opinion which he originally entertained—namely, that it was one of the most tyrannical, unnecessary, and opprobrious clauses in the Bill; and, at the risk of being charged with repeating arguments, after what he had heard of the present structure of the clause from the lips of the Chairman just now, he was constrained to ask where were the members of a candidate's committee to meet in the future? At a coffee shop? No; for under the benign influence of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) that had been closed to them, as well as the butcher's. The pastrycook's and the baker's had been closed up, and, under the influence of an ex-Vice President of the Council, the school-board premises, he believed, had also been closed up, and there was a hybrid sort of arrangement by which some clubs were omitted from the clause and some were not—it was a kind of clubable conundrum they would have to go through at every election as to what would, in the opinion of the Judge, be a club within the clauses, or a club without the clauses. And they had got finally, to this great height of purity of election—that a candidate must not have a committee in his own hotel. "What," it was said, "do you want to stop in an hotel for for the purposes of elections?" They were not to have meetings for the purposes of elections in their own hotels. Here were 638 Members—English, Irish, and Scotch—sitting down to manufacture these fetters for themselves, and imagining they were doing business which was worthy of the attention of the Legislature of the United Kingdom. It was one of the most marvellous things which could have happened in this 19th century. Anything more contemptible than this clause in all its aspects—in its general aspect, in its limited aspect, in all the details that had been introduced into it, either in the way of tightening or loosening, had never been passed by the British Legislature. Was it not contemptible, when they remembered that they had been since 2 o'clock that afternoon occupied in this way, knowing all the time that there were real solid matters of legislation awaiting disposal. But it had pleased Members—many of them, no doubt, because they thought they were saving some amount of expenditure at elections—to set to work to endeavour to improve this miserable clause. He should vote against the clause, mainly for the reason that it was opposed to the primary object the Government claimed to have in view in proposing the clause—namely, the diminution of expenditure. The effect of the clause must be to increase expenditure. It could have no other result. Under the genial influence of the friend of the publican sitting near him (Mr. Onslow), it narrowed the opportunity of all candidates of obtaining rooms for committees. In the counties some candidates would be at their wits' ends when occasion came, to know how practically to work the clause. He saw an hon. Gentleman opposite who, during the early discussions on this Bill, was considerably troubled in his mind to know how he was to manage his own social hospitality. The hon. Member had appealed to the Attorney General for advice as to how he was to get out of the difficulties which beset him in this matter; but with all his pleasantry and genial manner, the hon. Member for East Staffordshire (Mr. Wiggin) would experience great difficulty in obtaining a committee room in his county when this clause became law. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General managed to get majorities in the Lobby with him; but how many of the hon. Members who came in to vote for these tyrannical clauses really believed in them? How many who would presently attend to the summons of the Division Bell, in the exercise of their superficial and glossy purity really pretended that they believed in these stringent provisions, which, after all, were the mere display of tyranny? He did not believe there was any clause in the Bill which was more obnoxious to common sense and practical experience, and more defiant of the actual necessities of the case than this. Hon. Members had, over and over again, invited those who supported the clause to give them some intimation as to the class of buildings which would be open to them in many parts of their constituencies for the purpose of conducting the necessary business of an election. No answer was vouchsafed them. They were told, of course, that the chief object was to prevent any possible treating in the committee rooms; but, without any guidance from the hon. and learned Attorney General, they were in darkness as to what the committee room was after all; and he had no doubt that when this clause was passed—as it would be—it would be found to be one of those Parliamentary conundrums and pitfalls studying this magnificent measure, which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) seemed to think one of the greatest achievements of any Ministry.

COLONEL MAKINS said, that if a Division were taken he should vote against the clause. What had been said by hon. Members as to the difficulties which would result from the adoption of this clause was perfectly true; and he had in his mind a place where there was nothing whatever except a railway station, public-houses, a small shop or two, and a few farmers' houses scattered about a distance of two and a-half miles from the station. He should like the Attorney General to inform him where, in the future, they were to hold their committee meetings—where, save on the platform of the railway station?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT wished also to raise a protest against the clause. This proposal of the Government seemed to him one of the most gross cases of interference with the liberty of the subject which this Bill displayed. It was evident that in many large districts of the country—especially in county constituencies—there were no other places available for committee rooms than public-houses. The definitions of the Bill would present almost insurmountable difficulties on a trial. The question, what was a permanent political club, and what was not a permanent political club, was one which would raise infinite difficulties with the Judges in these trials. This clause, as had been pointed out by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen)—and he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) only regretted that the hon. Member had not gone into the subject more fully—was a ridiculous specimen of bad grammar; it was a most wonderful confusion and involution of sentences as read from the Chair. Surely, it would have been better for the Government to have postponed it. It was a very strange thing, indeed, that the Liberal Party, with all their anxiety for the liberty of the subject, should be introducing at this time clauses of such a character. He had heard a foreigner of great intelligence, speaking to day of a debate which he had heard in the House on this Bill, and he used this expression—"In no other country in the world would such interference with the liberty of the subject be tolerated." He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) believed that to be absolutely true. The Government were now carrying through a Bill which would be practically unworkable, and which would, so far as it had any result at all, have the effect of victimizing a few innocent Members—perhaps many. In the end, there would be a universal outcry and a revulsion of feeling against the Bill; all the time they had spent upon it would be wasted, for they would find it would be necessary, either to repeal, or so amend it, as to deprive it of its present characteristics. To his mind, it was extremely unsatisfactory that they should be wasting their time in this manner whilst there was so many questions of far greater importance demanding the attention of the House and the country. He cordially agreed with those who proposed the rejection of this clause.

MR. GREGORY said, as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was aware, he, for one, had not given any opposition to this Bill; but, on the contrary, he had endeavoured to assist the Government as far as he could. This clause, however, was really of a different character to those they had previously considered; and he could not help thinking that it was open to very grave and serious objections, not only as a matter of convenience, but also as a matter of principle. There could be no doubt that it was excessively restrictive in its character; and, as had been pointed out, might lead to very serious difficulty in its operation. He could not help thinking that for a clause of this kind some really valid ground should be shown, and he had failed to find anything of that kind during the discussion that had taken place upon it. As he understood, the only ground for the proposal of such a stringent and restrictive clause was that the presence of a committee sitting in a public-house might lead to an undue consumption of liquor. Well, the Attorney General in making this suggestion, he would point out, had not done credit to his own Bill. He (Mr. Gregory) could not help thinking that, under the provisions of the Bill, such a thing as that could not take place, because, if it went on to any extent, it would be a ground for voiding an election; and the members of a candidate's committee setting in a public-house, if they did not do their best to restrict the drinking that might be going on, would be each liable to serious penalties. This argument seemed to him altogether to meet the ground alleged for the introduction of this clause. The section, as it stood, was open really to so much objection in its language, and in the Amendments that had been accepted, that it was now almost rendered grotesque. There was an Amendment introduced by the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) to the effect that no committee should sit in a house where refreshments of any kind, whether food or drink, were sold and might be consumed on the premises. That Amendment would effectually put a stop to the use, not only of a public-house, but of the village grocer's, or the pastry cook's, or the baker's. The committee would be shut out from any shop where provisions were sold in a village, and he supposed would have to hold their meetings in the street. In a great many places they would have no place at all for their meetings. When one came to read the clause, as it stood, it was obviously open to misconstruction, and it could only lead to difficulty. No solid reason had been alleged for retaining it in the Bill, and great inconvenience had been pointed out which had not been met on the other side of the House. It would be unnecessary and unjust, and he, therefore, trusted the Government would consent to its omission.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that, though, of course, he should not expect the Attorney General to pay much attention to anything that fell from him, still he thought that the hon. and learned Gentleman could not have done less than give some little heed to the words of the hon. Gentleman who last spoke, who was recognized on all sides to be one of the oldest and most respected Members of the House, and also one who had very extensive experience in election matters, and whose object in addressing the Committee could not have been other than a worthy one. When such an hon. Member was addressing the Committee it did appear to him (Lord Randolph Churchill) that the hon. and learned Gentleman might have done something else than lay almost at full length on the Treasury Bench, ostentatiously paying no attention whatever to the speech that was being delivered. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Question!"] Well, he was only stating the fact. ["Order!"] He was not out of Order. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had not put himself to the trouble of even listening to the weighty argument that fell from the hon. Member (Mr. Gregory), who did not often address the Committee. Anyone would have thought that what fell from the hon. Member would have had, at any rate, some little weight with the Attorney General; but not only had the hon. and learned Member ostentatiously refused to listen to what had fallen from the hon. Member for East Sussex; but he committed a much more unpardonable crime, because he had paid no attention whatever to what had fallen from the Prime Minister this afternoon. The Prime Minister had deeply regretted his inability to provide more time for the discussion of important Business than that which the ordinary laws of nature allotted to them, and he had urged in the House the necessity of economizing the time they had to the last moment. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) had no hesitation in saying—and he would signalize to the House and the public the fact—that the Attorney General of England, who had been entrusted by the Prime Minister with the charge of this Bill, had wasted the whole afternoon, and two hours, minus a quarter, of the Evening Sitting, in passing a clause—["No, no!"—well, in endeavouring to pass a clause which literally was not worth the paper upon which it was set down. The clause was absurd; it was ludicrous; it was utterly futile in its aims; it was unintelligible in its language; and it would prove so unworkable that no Judge in the land would ever think of making an effort even to arrive at what was the intention of Parliament with regard to it. The hon. Member who had just sat down had talked about the only refuge for election committees being the streets, and, curiously enough, that had reminded him of a speech that the Attorney General made at Bristol a little while ago—he thought about two years ago—when the hon. and learned Gentleman denominated certain of his opponents as “gutter boys.” It appeared to him that the Attorney General had been anxious in this clause to bring his taunt into an Act of Parliament, and to reduce, not only his opponents, but also his supporters, to the level of “gutter boys.” He wished to ask the Attorney General—though he had not condescended to answer anything that had fallen from the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), or the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), and it was, therefore, hardly to be supposed that he would answer anything that fell from him (Lord Randolph Churchill)—if he would give the Committee a specimen of his great legal ingenuity by explaining, not what was his own aim, but what was the aim of the Government in inserting this clause in the Bill? What had the Government done? They had got out of the House of Commons a tremendous advantage in their method of conducting an election; they had obtained two tremendously strong guarantees for the purity of election. They had limited the number of committee rooms, and then had gone further—or, rather, they were about to go further—and limit the amount of a candidate's expenses, so that by no possibility, if the Bill was fairly carried out, could corrupt or illegal practices, or undue influence, be exercised. These things could not take place if they stuck at their two principles of limiting the number of committee rooms and the amount of a candidate's expenses. What could be the object of the Government in going beyond that and seeking to place the maximum of inconvenience upon the candidate? He wished to know whether the difficulties of Parliamentary elections were not great enough already—before this new law was passed? To hon. Members who wished to conduct elections with tolerable purity, and to save their seats in the House, was it not difficult enough to conduct elections now? Would the difficulties not be great enough even if the Bill stopped here and went no further—would the difficulties of conducting an election not be 10 times greater than they were if the Bill passed into law and obtained the Royal Assent now?—Would the hon. and learned Gentleman tell them what was the object of the Government in endeavouring to surround the return to Parliament of a candidate by so many insupportable and impossible obstacles as they found here? The Committee was agreeing to a clause of which the structure was not on paper before it. It was only in their mind in a most hazy form—he did not believe the Attorney General himself knew exactly how it stood, and he was perfectly certain that no other Member of the Committee had the slightest idea how it stood. The Attorney General in one of his speeches—and he had made a great many that afternoon—said he wished to put down the evil of drinking in committee rooms, and that if they did not insert this clause there would be a great deal of drinking in public-houses during elections. [An hon. MEMBER: Treating.] Yes, of course, treating by someone or other at public-houses as this clause was at present. In the course of the afternoon he (Lord Randolph Churchill) had read the clause over and over again, and he had come to the conclusion that they might leave it out of the Bill, or put it into the Bill, and they would produce no effect whatever, either more or less, on the amount of drinking that would take place at a Parliamentary election. The hon. and learned Gentleman said they were not to take committee rooms in public-houses, but they might take committee rooms next door to a public-house, so that members of a committee might step out of the one house into the other. By the fact of the committee room, which was not a public-house, being in such close proximity to the public-house, all the friends of the candidate, who wanted to drink, might go from the one to the other, and any amount of drinking could take place; in fact, committee rooms would be sought for in proximity to public-houses, and all the work they had done that afternoon, in spite of the Prime Minister's adjuration to economize the time of Parliament, would be entirely thrown away. All their efforts would have been useless, because of those absurd regulations, which, after all, were only handicapping and endeavouring to keep out of Parliament the candidates who, in all probability, they would like to see come into it. He could assure the Attorney General that he was in all sincerity putting these objections before him. As a general rule, he and those who thought with him had encouraged the disciples of right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Ministerial Bench by generally voting with the Attorney General; and it was, therefore, from no hostility to the Bill that he made these observations. He hoped elections would be as pure as possible; but as for the Bill, it would make very little difference to him as far as the constituency he represented (Woodstock) was concerned. He might be said to take a most impartial view of the matter. He believed these clauses, if they passed as they were, would add to the growing unpopularity of the Liberal Party; therefore, there was nothing more disinterested than his attitude in this matter. It occurred to him also that the Attorney General might have considered that which did not seem to have come before his usually highly imaginative mind, that the Bill, as it was drawn, was a Bill for promoting the decaying prosperity of the Bar, and for bringing the sands of Pactolus into the pockets of the senior, or of the dead or dying junior Bar, through the amount of Petitions the Bill would inevitably give rise to. The Attorney General might have considered that, when he was filling his Bill with every imaginable pitfall and trap, such as that committee rooms were not to be taken in public-houses. If the Bill passed in its present shape, no candidate in his senses would think of having a committee room during the progress of his election. It would be madness for any candidate to have anything approaching the nature of a committee room, except, perhaps, at a University election. If he had anyone to assist him, other than his authorized agent, he would be offering himself up to the Attorney General and his satellites, who, like vultures, gathered together from all quarters of the horizon when they smelt the wretched blood of the candidates. That was the whole object of the Bill. He proclaimed this—that the Attorney General had wasted seven or eight hours of public time in passing a clause which in its nature was so intolerable, and so utterly against all the ideas of liberty which, in spite of Parliament, were maintained in the Courts of Law, that no Judge would ever put it in force.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he did not wish to follow the noble Lord upon the points he had raised. They had discussed these clauses in detail, and it was scarcely necessary to go over the same ground again; but he agreed with the noble Lord that the section was too severe to be operative. But, at any rate, it was the decision of the Committee. He regretted that the noble Lord should have made any animadversions on the conduct of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. He (Mr. Cowen) had watched this Bill very closely, and was bound to say that the hon. and learned Gentleman had displayed very great ability and extreme tact and good temper in his conduct of it. The hon. and learned Gentleman had been troubled with Amendments on many occasions. He (Mr. Cowen) himself had had to bring before him suggestions which had not been acceptable to him, and invariably the hon. and learned Gentleman had received these proposals with great consideration. On reflection, no doubt, the noble Lord would admit that was the case, and would agree that it was an extremely difficult task to conduct through the House of Commons a Bill of this character, and that there had been great demands made upon the Attorney General's temper and patience. He thought it only fair that some consideration should be shown to the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. WHITLEY said, he could not agree with some things that had been said as to the Attorney General's conduct of the Bill. He believed that the hon. and learned Gentleman had been hardly used, because it was manifest throughout the discussion of the clause that he had, to a very large extent, accepted Amendments that had been moved on this (the Conservative) side of the House. The clauses were greatly benefited by the additions that had been made to it. Personally, he (Mr. Whitley) was one of those who should be glad to see no public-houses used at elections. He believed they had been the source of a great deal of corruption in the past. The clause, as originally drawn, bore hardly upon one section of the community—namely, the publicans, whom he believed to be as honourable a class of men as any other, and whom he should be sorry to see stamped as being specially responsible for the treating which had taken place at elections. He looked with great approval upon the Amendment which the Attorney General had consented to, to apply the clause to refreshment houses, and in that matter did not agree with the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory). He did not believe that the clause would touch the general shopkeeper; but understood it to refer only to refreshment houses, where food and drink might be used for purposes of corruption. As amended, the clause was now a great improvement upon the original proposal of the Government, and he, personally, felt very much obliged to the Attorney General for the way in which he had met the proposals which had come from the Conservative side of the House. After the hon. and learned Gentleman had accepted proposals emanating from this side of the House, it certainly was rather hard that he should now be taunted with having done so. If he (Mr. Whitley) voted against the clause, it would be on the ground stated by several hon. Members, even by some on the Ministerial side of the House—namely, that in country districts there would be great difficulty in finding rooms for committees if they were debarred from using public-houses.

MR. WARTON said, he was not going to make any ill-natured observations in regard to the Attorney General, whose goodnature and kindness of heart they were all so well acquainted with. But, with all his kindness of heart and goodnature, the hon. and learned Gentleman could not reconcile the Committee—and it was to be hoped would not be able to reconcile the Committee—to the adoption of this very singular clause. It was necessary for him briefly to recapitulate the history of the discussion on this clause. As it came before them originally it was simply an attack upon the Licensed Victuallers—it was simply a declaration that these men were a kind of pariahs, who were always acting improperly. When the Attorney General came to this strange proposition, however, he, to a certain extent, relented, and in his desire—and this he (Mr. Warton) said without the slightest reflection on the hon. and learned Member—to do justice to the Licensed Victualler, he still further restricted the number of possible committee rooms. The effect of all the Amendments assented to was this—that, practically, candidates would be left without any choice of rooms at all—that was what it came to. He was not, for one moment, blaming the Attorney General, whose good-tempered tact and kindness everybody was aware of; all knew he wished, if possible, to please everybody, but the result—as was the case in the old fable, to which he had not time to make more detailed reference—was that it ended in his pleasing nobody. The effect of all the hon. and learned Gentleman's attempt at conciliation was this—that in endeavouring to please one class and another, candidates at elections would be left without any committee rooms at all. He did ask the hon. and learned Gentleman most earnestly to consider what would be the effect of the clause as it now stood. Would it not be this—to increase very largely the expenses of elections? A candidate would not be able to have a public-house committee room; he would not be able to have a room in a house in which drink was sold; he would not be able to have one in an elementary school; and he was left in the position of being unable, in a country constituency, to obtain anything in the nature of a committee room at all. At the same time, the Committee were not told what a committee room was. They were left entirely in the dark in this matter; and it seemed to him that if they adopted the Amendment of the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) as to suitable premises, it would have been a great improvement. One of the great evils they were met with throughout this Bill, was the constant reference to the Judge. They were told that the Judge would take this view, and the Judge would take that view; whereas hon. Members who had been candidates at elections hoped that these matters would never come before a Judge at all. He had said before, and he would say again—he would prophecy—that the result of this Bill would be innumerable Petitions and innumerable unseatings of candidates for trifling and trumpery offences. Hon. Members had suffered great inconvenience from the manner in which the issue had been put before them. When the Amendment was brought forward by the hon. Member for Mid-Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope), by which it was proposed to omit the words "or any premises where intoxicating liquor is sold," there was a sort of tacit understanding that the question of clubs was connected with that. He (Mr. Warton) had been compelled to vote with the Government, as many Conservatives had done, in the narrow Division that took place; because, as a lawyer, he could not help looking at the words narrowly, and thinking that the words did not apply to clubs. It had been held, on the highest authority, that liquor was not to be sold at a club; the members had to pay for their liquor as they paid for their dinners; but in the eye of the law that was not "paying;" it was something in the nature of a transaction amongst themselves, a sharing of common property. Many Conservatives had been obliged to vote according to their consciences, because these words, in accordance with the law, did not convey the result which was supposed to be conveyed to the Committee. Nothing in the whole course of the discussion on this clause had struck him with more amazement than the way in which, at a quarter to 7 o'clock, the Chairman put this Question; and it had been passed, without anybody saying a word on the subject. He had no doubt this Amendment of the Attorney General would lead, in the end, to very considerable discussion. There would be the greatest difficulty in deciding what a permanent club was—whether permanence meant a club that had stood for a long time, or whether the description would apply to a house newly erected or newly acquired. That was a point which he (Mr. Warton) could not deal with—it was a question for the Judges. The clause was now left in such a state of hopeless entanglement, that when the Judges came to interpret it they would be very much puzzled to say what was a permanent political club and what was not, and would find it very difficult to draw a distinction between those good clubs and those bad clubs, of which much had been heard. He was always anxious to speak of the law as he understood it; and as he gave his vote for the Government on the question of law he, therefore, hoped they would give him the credit of speaking for the law honestly. If anyone pretended to say what the law was, he was bound to disregard Party considerations altogether; and it was as a lawyer, and not as a Party man, that he maintained that the Amendments of the Attorney General left this clause in a state of hopeless confusion. To say that these difficulties that had arisen were to be solved by the Judge was a terrible thing. He hoped these cases would not go before a Judge; but it was because he thought that the section was left in such a hopeless state of entanglement that he, for one, should vote against it. He must say he believed the section was one of the most muddling, interfering, troublesome, sections in the whole Bill; but he did think that the Attorney General, in his anxiety to save the time of the Committee, would have done much better to have withdrawn the clause. Feeling, as he did, the necessity, in point of time, for their making progress with measures of importance, he could not help urging on the Government to cut out this provision, which was confusing, and which would lead to expense, not to the Legal Profession, but to the unhappy candidates, who would be entrapped into all sorts of difficulties.

COLONEL ALEXANDER wished to ask whether, under this clause, it would be permissible to use churches and chapels for electioneering purposes? In Scotland it was the constant practice to use churches and chapels for the purpose of holding meetings. He himself had preached from a Presbyterian pulpit; and he had no doubt that the Prime Minister, who was also a Scotch Member, had performed a similar feat. The people of Scotland would be deeply grieved and disappointed if they were precluded in the future from using their churches and chapels for this purpose, as they felt that such use added very much to their sanctity; and if they were deprived of it, he was certain there would be considerable difficulty in many places in finding places equally suitable for the holding of meetings.

MR. GORST said, that when the clause was originally proposed it was a very bad one, and one the Committee would have done well to reject; but he had no hesitation in saying that it had been made infinitely worse by the Amendments introduced into it, and if it was desirable to oppose the clause originally, it was imperative on the Committee to do so now. It had become a trap for unsophisticated and uningenious candidates. In the first place, no one knew, and no one had been able to tell them yet, what a committee room was. The Attorney General had been appealed to, over and over again, to tell them how the Judges were to define these words—to define what a committee room was, what it was that made a room into a committee room. The Attorney General did not know, and the Judges would not know, what a committee room was; but the Judges would have to find out. The candidate, he supposed, would have to have a committee room—not many, because where many were employed numbers of them were useless. Where, however, was the candidate to hold his committee meetings? He was shut out of the public-houses; he was shut out of all the places where intoxicating liquor or other kinds of refreshments were sold—indeed, he was not sure that the candidate was not shut out of the butcher's shop or the grocer's. [An hon. MEMBER: Oh! yes.] It was clear he was shut out of his hotel. The man who had the imprudence, during an election, to reside at an hotel would, no doubt, have to take extreme good care in everything he did, that the hotel did not accidentally become a committee room. Since the Committee adjourned for the dinner hour, candidates had been shut out of all schools, he was told. He did not know whether they were shut out of all churches and chapels. It seemed to him that if they only knew what a committee room was they would find that no committee room could be held except in the street. The candidate was shut out of private houses where he had the imprudence to give anything to eat or drink; and the whole effect of the clause was that the candidate would, first of all, have to wonder what it was that made a committee room, and, if he was clever enough to find that out, he would have to take precious good care that he did not make any house in the borough which he desired to represent into a committee room. But, then, by this extraordinary trap for the man who might wish to conduct his election purely, there was the most perfect licence to use any room he liked in a public-house, school, church, or chapel, or refreshment room, for purposes of election, so long as it was not a committee room; and he could not conceive anything more likely to promote illegal practices and extravagant expenditure during an election than this unlimited means of hiring rooms all over a borough or county, except in public-houses. This clause was originally aimed against Licensed Victuallers specially. Now, as amended, it appeared to have been turned into a most ingenious trap to catch unwary candidates, and into a most ingenious arrangement for allowing the most extensive corruption to prevail. The only class whom he supposed the Attorney General desired to benefit were the lawyers, because this certainly was a clause that would encourage Petitions. If the Attorney General had brought in the clause with the view of assisting members of his Profession who were not Members of the House, and to put a little honest money into their pockets by promoting Election Petitions, it was an admirable clause; but, if it was intended to promote purity of election, it was a very bad clause indeed, and he hoped the Committee would reject it.

MR. GRANTHAM said, it was quite clear this was a clause aimed solely against public-houses. When the clause was originally proposed, it was seen to be unfair to treat public-houses invidiously; but now, as amended, it was one of the most useless and absurd clauses ever introduced into a Bill of this nature. Why, in the name of fortune, they could not have a committee room in a house in which food was sold passed his comprehension. Those who had any experience whatever in electioneering matters knew quite well how difficult it was to get rooms at all for the use of committees. He should certainly vote against the clause, and he hoped, by so doing, a protest might be entered which would have some effect on the Bill.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE desired to say, in a very few words, the reason why he should support the elimination of this clause. As his hon. and learned Friend who had just sat down had pointed out, as first drawn the clause appeared to be aimed at public-houses. The Attorney General had altered it because, as he had pointed out in an early period of the debate, he did not wish to make any invidious distinction between licensed houses and other houses; he had, therefore, accepted an Amendment bringing coffee-houses and other refreshment houses in the same category, and he showed to the Committee that the sole purpose of drawing up the Amendment was to prevent candidates, and those who were likely to support candidates, from being led into temptation. It was evidently the opinion of a great many hon. Members that this clause, as it now stood, was thoroughly unworkable. Personally, he considered it absolutely unnecessary; because, if hon. Members would look at the 1st clause of the Bill, they would find that treating in any way whatever was to be regarded as a corrupt practice, and anyone who indulged in such a practice would be liable to the loss of his election, and possibly to a prohibition to sit for the constituency which he had been wooing again, at all events for the then Parliament. If candidates were so idiotic as to use public-houses for purposes of treating, he did not think it was at all necessary for the Committee to pass a clause that should save them from their own folly. This clause was absolutely unnecessary, it being provided in the 1st and 41st clauses that these things should not be done under pain of heavy penalties; therefore, he should vote against the retention of the clause.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON supposed that, after what his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel Alexander) had said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would see that he was quite mistaken when he told the Committee that churches and chapels were not used for election purposes. Why, the Prime Minister himself had desecrated churches and chapels by utilizing them for some beggarly electioneering work in Scotland. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General proposed, he believed, to provide in the clause that schools should not be used for committee rooms; a fortiori, chapels should be included in the prohibition. He appealed to the Attorney General to either accept his Amendment, or to put aside the clause altogether.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he had considerable sympathy with the object the Attorney General had in view in not allowing committee rooms in public-houses. Looking, however, at the subsequent part of the Bill, and at the very stringent regulations that were made as regarded expense, he did not see how it was possible for them to work the Schedules of the Bill unless they were to have committee rooms in public-houses. As he pointed out in the few words he addressed to the Committee earlier in the afternoon, the expense of committee rooms would be very much increased by the clause as it now stood. Candidates could get committee rooms in public-houses at a very much less cost than they could get them in other houses. Under the circumstances, he should find himself reluctantly obliged to vote against the clause.

MR. RITCHIE wished to defend the Prime Minister from the charge of sacrilege which had been brought against him. In Scotland it was not considered a sacrilege to address meetings in churches and chapels. As a matter of fact, it was a very common practice; and therefore the right hon. Gentleman could not be open to the charge made against him by the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stanley Leighton). Such was not the case in this country, and he (Mr. Ritchie) thought it would be an invidious thing if candidates were allowed to address the electors in churches and chapels in England. It was perfectly certain that members of the Church of England would regard it as a sacrilege to address meetings in their churches, although it might not be considered so by those who attended chapels—[“Question!”]. It was the Question; the question was raised by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He (Mr. Ritchie) desired to say that he should certainly vote against the clause. The clause, as he understood it, had been proposed in the interest of the reduction of expense, and also in the interest of purity of elections. So far from the clause reducing the expenditure of candidates, he believed it would really increase their expenditure. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London (Mr. R. N. Fowler) had shown that he, at any rate, would be placed at a great disadvantage in consequence of not being able to employ the houses of Licensed Victuallers, because he would have to pay very much larger sums for houses other than those of Licensed Victuallers. But apart from this, the hon. and learned Gentleman had told the Committee that in addition to the committee rooms, which would be allowed under the Bill, candidates would be allowed to engage public-houses for the purpose of addressing meetings. If this clause did not exist a candidate could engage the large room of a public-house for a committee room, and he could also use it for the purpose of addressing meetings. According to this clause a candidate would be obliged to engage a room for his committee in a house other than a public-house, and he would be obliged to engage a room in a public-house for addressing meetings. He would, therefore, be put to two costs instead of one. With the object of promoting purity of election, he understood the Attorney General to advocate the limitation of the number of committee rooms. It was contended that it was a very common mode of corruption to pay a large sum for the purpose of engaging a large number of committee rooms, and that was one of the grounds on which the Attorney General had advocated the limitation of committee rooms. He (Mr. Ritchie) wanted to know how they could support the present proposition on the ground of purity of election, if a candidate was to be at liberty to engage a large number of rooms in public-houses for the purpose of addressing meetings? If it was a means of corruption to pay large sums of money for the purpose of engaging committee rooms, it surely was an equal means of corruption to engage rooms for the purpose of addressing meetings. He could not conceive how, either on the ground of purity of election or the reduction of expenditure, this clause could possibly be supported. Believing, as he did, that the clause would neither tend to the purity of election nor the reduction of expenditure, and believing also that it amounted to the casting of an unnecessary slur on a large and respectable body of tradesmen, he should vote against it.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND said, there had been so many alterations made in the clause that he did not think half the hon. Members in the House knew how the clause now really stood. Perhaps the Chairman would be good enough to read the clause again?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) rose to a point of Order. The hon. Member was not present, some time ago, when a similar request was complied with. It would be inexpedient to establish a precedent by requiring the Chairman to read the clause, whenever a request was made by Members who had been absent, when it had been once read. He trusted the Committee would not establish a bad precedent by requiring the Chairman to read the clause.

MR. RAIKES entirely agreed with what had been said by the Attorney General as to the irregularity of appealing to the Chair to read a clause again which was before the Committee; but, having said that, he was bound to say he did not think the Attorney General had done much to shorten the discussion by laying such stress on that point, because, no doubt, a great many Members of the Committee had come into the House since important Amendments had been introduced into the clause. Might he suggest that there would be no impropriety in the Attorney General himself reading the clause? He understood that the Attorney General had consented to insert words in the clause which would make it competent for any candidate to address his constituency in any public-house. In short, that the same Government which prohibited the holding of committee meetings in public-houses was actually about to introduce words to legalize the practice of candidates addressing their constituencies in public-houses. He was bound to say, if that was a fact, they had reached the consummation of the ne plus ultra of hypocrisy. Years ago he remembered having seen meetings held in public-houses on behalf of Parliamentary candidates. When he was an Undergraduate at Cambridge he attended some of the meetings of the Liberal candidate, which were invariably held in a public-house; and he remembered pretty well the scandalous system of drinking and treating which always ensued at those meetings. Was he to understand that this clause, which proposed to tighten and to strengthen the law with regard to the admitted irregularities which might arise in case committee meetings were held in public-houses—was he to understand that the same Cabinet which was proposing to tighten and strengthen that law, was actually about to introduce words which would perpetuate one of the most absolute forms of corruption at the present time?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) had charged the Government with hypocrisy. Why, as a matter of fact, the provision as to the holding of meetings in public-houses was inserted in the clause at the suggestion of the very Friends of the right hon. Gentleman himself. They had asked that meetings should be allowed in the large rooms of the public-houses, on the ground that it very often happened that large rooms could only be found in public-houses. Having yielded to that change, which came from an hon. Member opposite—he presumed the right hon. Gentleman at the time the concession was made was absent—the right hon. Gentleman now came forward and accused them of hypocrisy. Under the circumstances, he did not think that the Government need take the words of the right hon. Gentleman very much to heart.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, and the Government in general, liked to pose as martyrs because they considered they were doing their duty. If the Government, however, had been here a long time to-day, they themselves were responsible for taking up the time of the Committee, and they must not regard hon. Members as their vassals and slaves. When an hon. Gentleman (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) asked that the clause should be read, instead of his request being complied with, the Attorney General got up and read the Committee a lecture. If the hon. and learned Gentleman had not committed that great mistake, which certainly was not usual in him, they would not have the shameful altercation and disturbance which was likely to ensue. He maintained that they had a right to have the clause read; and, although the Attorney General might desire it, they did not intend to vote in the dark. They had a right to understand the clause as it stood. He agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman that they had pressed upon him certain Amendments to this very ridiculous clause; but, having pressed upon him those Amendments, they desired, before they voted on the Question that this clause should stand part of the Bill, to have the whole clause read. He would, therefore, ask the Chairman very respectfully to be good enough to read the clause, and not allow the Committee to be dictated to by the Attorney General. Certainly, unless they had the clause read again, he should move that the Chairman do now report Progress.

MR. ONSLOW said, that he, with great deference, asked the Chairman once before to read the clause; but at the time there were very few Gentlemen indeed in the House. The Attorney General must remember that an immense number of Amendments to the clause had been accepted, most of which had not been on the Notice Paper at all, and that scarcely one of the Amendments, as they stood on the Paper, had been agreed to. The Attorney General had met hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House with the greatest frankness and the greatest good temper, and he could readily understand the position of the hon. and learned Gentleman in wishing to pass the Bill as soon as possible. This clause, however, was one of the most important clauses of the Bill. Some most important Amendments had been made in the clause, such as had not been made in any other clause of the Bill. He did not wish to detain the Committee more than a few moments. Indeed, he only rose to appeal to the Prime Minister, even if it was a little irregular, to say one kind word in order that the clause might be read from the Chair, so that hon. Gentlemen who were not in the House when the clause was read some time ago might know exactly how the clause stood.

MR. PELL said, he could imagine nothing more inconvenient than that the Chairman should be required to read different clauses of the Bill. Considering, however, the importance of the present clause, he thought that, as so many Amendments had been made to it, an exception might be made in this case. If it were, however, read from the Chair, he hoped the Committee would not take this as a precedent for their future guidance.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he hoped that this novel request for the renewed reading of the clause from the Chair would not be pressed. It would be a complete innovation. Indeed, he did not believe that on more than three or four times in the last 50 years, over which his Parliamentary experience extended, had a clause, as amended, been read from the Chair. He asked the Committee to consider the request in all its bearings. It was a dangerous request to be made at all; and certainly it was a request which came with very little grace—he did not now refer to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Evesham (Mr. Dixon-Hartland)—from a Gentleman who had absented himself from the House during the greater part of the discussion, but who, having just arrived, made a peremptory demand from the Chair, and threatened that unless the demand was conceded he would report Progress. It was not that he (Mr. Gladstone) begrudged the few moments that would be occupied in reading the clause that induced him to appeal to the hon. Gentleman not to press a demand to which the Government could be no party. A very evil precedent would be established if, in the course of a particular discussion, any Gentleman could ask that the clause should be read from the Chair. Besides that, it was not a very easy matter for the Chairman to read the clause as amended. It was very difficult, indeed, to incorporate the marginal alterations made by the Chairman in a manner perfectly sufficient for his own purposes, but not for the purposes of others. He did entreat the Committee to recollect how dangerous a precedent would be established in this matter.

MR. ONSLOW said, he did not think that would be regarded as a precedent at all. He had asked the same thing himself on a previous occasion when the Speaker was in the Chair, and the right hon. Gentleman at once complied with the request.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL rose to Order. With the object of saving the time of the Committee, he thought, instead of listening to long lectures from the Attorney General and the Prime Minister, they ought, upon this matter, to appeal to the supreme authority of the Chair, and to ask the Chairman whether a bond fide appeal had not been made to him, and whether that appeal was not within the right of a Member of the Committee? He respectfully asked the ruling of the Chair upon this point?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he must—[Cries of "Order!" and "Chair!"] If hon. Gentlemen would only restrain their impatience they would find there was nothing disorderly at all in what he was going to say. He begged to say there was no question before them, as he apprehended, of Order involved in this matter. He had never asserted that it was irregular for this clause to be read from the Chair; nay, more, he believed that if 50 hon. Members, one after the other, were to get up in immediate succession, and to demand that for 50 times the clause should be read from the Chair, there would be nothing disorderly or nothing irregular in their so doing. There would, however, be extreme inconvenience if the case were carried to absurd lengths.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he had asked the Chairman for a ruling on the point, and he would again most respectfully ask the opinion of the Chair upon the matter?

THE CHAIRMAN: I cannot say there is any point of Order involved in the question. It may, however, shorten matters if I state exactly what took place. The hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) had an Amendment on the Paper, and that Amendment was accepted, or partly accepted, by the Attorney General. The hon. Member (Mr. Onslow) then asked me, as a point of Order, if I would read the clause as it then stood amended. I informed him there was no point of Order at all, but I said I had no objection to reading the clause; but I did find some difficulty in reading the clause, owing to the various Amendments that had been made; and I did not read it in such a manner as I could have wished. Having read it already twice, at the request of hon. Gentlemen, I think it can hardly be necessary, or perhaps hardly proper, that I should read it a third time.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER entirely agreed with the opinion that had been expressed, that there was nothing irregular in an appeal to the Chair to have a clause—the character of which was doubtful to the Committee—read; but, when an appeal was made to the Chair, and the Chair did not respond in the affirmative, it was a distinct declaration, on the part of the Chair, that the Chair was not prepared to read the clause: What he (Mr. O'Connor Power) objected to was that hon. Gentlemen, in that (the Opposition) part of the House, should take the authority of the Chair into their own hands, and should not only determine what the Committee should think, but what the Chair was to think, as to the performance of the Chairman's duties. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) concluded his speech with a threat, for he said—"Sir Arthur Otway, I ask you to read the clause, and if you do not, I shall move to report Progress." [Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF at this point rose, but was met with loud shouts of "Order, order!"] He (Mr. O'Connor Power) was sitting quite close to the hon. Gentleman, and he (Mr. O'Connor Power) was now in the hearing of the Committee, and what he ventured to say was this—that neither the Chairman nor the Committee would stand such a slight for two seconds if it was made by an Irish Member.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF rose to Order. He distinctly said—[Cries of "Order, order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN: Mr. O'Connor Power is in possession of the Committee.

MR. RITCHIE rose to a question of Order. He wished to ask the Chairman whether, if an hon. Gentleman, in the course of the address of another hon. Gentleman, rose to Order, he was not entitled to be heard?

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power) was speaking to a point of Order. ["No, no!"] The Question before the Committee is that this Clause 15 stand part of the Bill.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL rose to Order.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question before the Committee is that Clause 15 stand part of the Bill. Do I understand that the hon. and learned Member for Mayo is not speaking to a point of Order?

MR. O'CONNOR POWER trusted that if he should, by accident, become out of Order, the Chairman would not fail to give him the usual intimation; and he hoped he should not be swayed by the example of hon. Gentlemen near him in disregarding the Chairman's ruling. As the question of Order seemed to be disposed of, he wished to address himself to the point at issue, whether it was necessary, in order to enable the Committee to arrive at a decision, that the whole clause should be read from the Chair? He respectfully submitted there was no such necessity, and that hon. Gentlemen who had recently arrived would be inflicting a great hardship upon those who were in possession of the facts of the case if they were to insist upon any such reading; but, at the same time, he wished to avail himself of this opportunity of protesting against the license, which some hon. Gentlemen permitted themselves, in discussions in that House, and he wished to say that hon. Gentlemen below him ought not to imagine that, because they had not the misfortune to represent Irish constituencies, they had a right to do what they liked.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, they had got into rather a heated discussion upon a somewhat unimportant question. As he understood the matter, before they divided many hon. Members were anxious to know how the clause stood, and with that object the Chairman was requested to read the clause. The Prime Minister considered that that would be an evil precedent to set. Might he (Mr. Balfour) suggest that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, who was in charge of the Bill, should read the clause as amended instead of the Chairman; and might he also remind the Prime Minister of this fact—that before they separated at 7 o'clock an appeal was made to his noble Friend (Lord Randolph Churchill) not to press his Motion for Adjournment, though his noble Friend pointed out that as they had not the words of the Amendment of the Attorney General on the Paper, it was very difficult for them to give a decision upon their import? His noble Friend yielded to the appeal of the Prime Minister. Would it, therefore, be too much to ask the Government to yield to the reasonable request, and read to the Committee the clause on which it was now expected to vote?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) asked that he might be permitted to mention what had really occurred. When they re-assembled that evening they had arrived at a certain stage of the clause. The Chairman yielded to a request to read the clause; and after other Amendments had been made, and other Provisoes added to the clause, the clause was put from the Chair, and then the Chairman was again asked, as a matter of courtesy, to read the whole clause as amended. He did so, and when a few other hon. Members arrived at the House it was asked that the clause should be read a third time.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: It was read to the Committee about a quarter past 9 o'clock.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was first read immediately after they re-assembled at 9 o'clock, and it was read a second time immediately when the Question was put that the clause be added to the Bill. It stood to reason that if every hon. Member, when he came to the House, could insist upon the clause being re-read, considerable inconvenience would ensue. It was a precedent that could not be allowed for a moment.

MR. RAIKES said, he thought it would be almost impertinent, after what had fallen from the Prime Minister, for him to add anything as to the extreme inadvisability of endeavouring to provoke from the Chair a further source of discussion. The Chairman could exercise his own discretion as to whether he complied with the request of any hon. Member to read the clause, and he would only do so if it were desirable in order to facilitate the deliberations of the Committee. He (Mr. Raikes) thought it would be a matter of extreme misfortune if any questions of this sort were precipitated in order to disturb their Business, which was already sufficiently confused. He (Mr. Raikes) should not have been sorry if the Attorney General had given them some hint as to some of the words he had added; but, after the course taken by some Members of the Committee, perhaps he was exercising a wise discretion in the course he was pursuing, although he (Mr. Raikes) was not a little surprised to find himself in accord with the hon. and learned Member for Mayo (Mr. O'Connor Power), whom he remembered was not always the most disposed to support the Chair. He was, however, very glad to be fortified with the hon. and learned Gentleman's support on this occasion; and he did appeal to the Committee whether it was worth their while to continue to waste the very precious moments at their command on a matter of this kind?

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes) represented a constituency where there were no committee rooms, and where even the candidates themselves were not allowed to show themselves during an election. But the result of the Attorney General's refusal of a very courteous request on the part of the hon. Member for Evesham (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) had been a very great waste of time. Whether hon. Gentlemen were right or wrong in making such a request, the hon. and learned Gentleman might courteously have acceded to it, and then the Committee would have known what it was they were asked to vote upon. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) would not have troubled the Committee again, had it not been for the long jeremiad of the Prime Minister, in which the right hon. Gentleman had referred to him. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) only wished hon. Members to know what it was they were to vote upon; and if the information had been given at once, without that remarkable outburst from the Attorney General, they would have been in the Division Lobby long ago. In order to enable the Government to give the information now he would move that the Chairman be directed to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff.)

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that as there seemed to be some dispute about the time when this clause, as amended, was read from the Chair, he might mention that he noted the time when the incident occurred. The clause was read quite distinctly from the Chair at about five minutes past 10 o'clock, and therefore there could be no necessity whatever for reading it again now.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he hoped they might now be allowed to come to a decision upon the clause. It was a great misfortune, after the clause had occupied the attention of the Committee for so long a time, that a decision should not be arrived at? He had not taken any part in the discussion with regard to the question of reading the clause over again; but difficulties did sometimes arise from the House being more full at one time than at another, and from Gentlemen who had not heard what had passed being unacquainted with the particular matters under discussion. But it was, he thought, a question of expediency and discretion as to what were the occasions on which a clause should or should not be read again; and, under the present circumstances, he hoped his hon. Friend would not persist in his Motion. He fancied that most hon. Members in the House had their minds pretty well filled on the subject, and were in a position to come to a decision upon it.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition had not altogether gathered the exact position in which his hon. Friend (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) stood with respect to this clause. The right hon. Gentleman could not be aware that the claim, or the request—for, after all, it was nothing more than a request, and a reasonable one—[Interruption.] The Junior Lord of the Treasury (Mr. Herbert Gladstone), who presumed — [Interruption.] The Junior Lord of the Treasury was not in the House when the question was originally raised, and seemed to have been brought in for the purpose of cheering the Prime Minister. [Interruption.] If the Junior Lord of the Treasury would kindly allow him (Lord Randolph Churchill) to proceed, and would not imitate the extremely evil example of some hon. Members, with whom the Prime Minister had often to remonstrate — [Interruption.]

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The noble Lord must address himself to the Chair.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he had been led into these remarks on account of the prominent part that was taken rather unusually by the Junior Lord of the Treasury. What he wished to do was to point out to the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition that the Motion for reporting Progress — on which he rather hoped his hon. Friend would take a Division — was brought about by the request — the most courteous request — of the hon. Member for Evesham (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) to the Chair being abruptly and with great brusqueness suppressed by the Attorney General, and declared to be irregular. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition would not think them wanting in any way in respect to him, if, in spite of the words which had fallen from that right hon. Gentleman, and which certainly, on ordinary occasions, would have very considerable weight, they on that side of the House were determined to show to Her Majesty's Government that when a minority, even though it might be a small minority, made a reasonable request it ought to be respected. They were a minority who had on no single occasion obstructed or interfered with the progress of the Bill. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" and "Question!"] He challenged any hon. Member who sat on the Ministerial Benches — [Cries of "Question!"] That was the Question. He was supporting a Motion to report Progress — a Motion which he said they were entitled to make because they had not opposed the passing of this Bill through the House. He repeated, that a reasonable request was made for information, and that the Attorney General, presuming on the forces which were behind the Government, and on the singular state of excitement which had been developed among those forces to-night, endeavoured brusquely to suppress that request. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) was sure that if the Leader of the Opposition were in possession of all the circumstances of the case he would be inclined to take a favourable view of the position in which those hon. Gentlemen who supported the Motion were placed. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) certainly hoped that his hon. Friend would go to a Division.

MR. CHAPLIN said, he was unable to follow the noble Lord in the view that his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition had been unable to grasp the situation; but, however that might be, he did not think the noble Lord was in a very much better position himself. The noble Lord had stated just now that the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) made a claim and a reasonable request to the Government. Now, unless his (Mr. Chaplin's) ears had altogether deceived him, it was neither a claim nor a request, but a threat, and a threat which had been put into practice by the Motion to report Progress. He wished to ask hon. Gentlemen on that (the Opposition) side of the House in whose interest it was that the claim, or request, or threat, had been made? He apprehended that those who had been attending to their duties in the House—who had sat throughout the discussion—were perfectly well informed at that moment as to the nature of the clause under discussion; and, if so, it followed that the claim was made entirely on behalf of those who, like himself—and he acknowledged that he was to blame for not having been present—had absented themselves from the House throughout the evening. But he did not think, because he had chosen to absent himself throughout the evening, that he should come forward at that late hour of the night (12.10), and call upon the Chairman of Committees, under a threat, to read the clause, the nature of which he ought to have instructed himself upon. He should think himself guilty of a most impertinent act if he did such a thing. He hoped that, under the circumstances, his hon. Friend would think better than to go to a Division on a Motion which could not be justified.

MR. GORST said, he did not know how long the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) might have been in the House; but it was clear that he had entirely failed to acquaint himself with the situation. It was not the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff), but the hon. Member for Evesham (Mr. Dixon-Hartland), who made the request to the Government, and that hon. Member had been attending in his place throughout the discussion. What was asked of the Government was, he (Mr. Gorst) was bound to say, a fair request, which ought to have been conceded in common courtesy; because the Prime Minister could not have forgotten that at 7 o'clock that evening the Committee accepted certain words proposed by the Attorney General which were not then on the Paper, and which they might have waited to have seen put down on the Paper for the Evening Sitting. On the request—the very courteous request—of the Prime Minister, all opposition to those words was withdrawn, and the words were allowed to be added to the Bill; and he (Mr. Gorst) thought that courtesy ought to be returned for courtesy, and that when a request was made, after dinner, by a Member like the hon. Member for Evesham, who certainly was not a vigorous opponent of the Bill, that request ought to have been granted. It appeared to be the desire of the Government, and, so far as he could judge, it also appeared to be the desire of the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, that the Committee should divide upon the clause without knowing what it was; for he would venture to say, without fear of contradiction, that not only did the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin) not know what it was, but there was not a single Member on the Front Opposition Bench who knew what it was, and he was perfectly certain that very few of those who sat opposite on the Ministerial side of the House knew what it was. Indeed, he was not quite sure that even the Prime Minister himself knew exactly how it stood. Of course, if it was the desire of the Committee to come to a conclusion upon the clause when no Member of the Committee, or when only a very small minority indeed, knew what they were voting about, let them do so—let them reduce the Parliamentary procedure of that House to the absurdity of passing such things in such a manner. But it really was the fact that these proceedings in Committee on these Bills were pushed to an absurdity, the Government relying, not upon the votes of intelligence, but upon brute force. [Interruption.] He was sorry to see that certain hon. Members were trying to usurp the functions of the Chair by calling him to Order. It was absurd for these matters to be decided by Members who had not heard the arguments.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Motion before the Committee was that Progress should be reported.

MR. GORST said, he was trying, as well as the disorderly interruptions of hon. Members opposite would permit him, to address himself to that question, and he was endeavouring to give reasons why they should not insist on the Committee voting upon a clause with the terms of which they were not acquainted; but he was much hindered by the disorderly interruptions of hon. Members opposite. He was saying that the Government ought to rely upon the votes of persons who had heard the discussions, and who were acquainted with the clause upon which they were going to vote, and that they ought not to rely upon the ignorant votes which they could summon in from the Library and the Smoking Room to overbear those who had been endeavouring to support them in passing this Bill, and who were simply animated by an honest desire to know what it was they were voting about.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND said, he was in his place at 7 o'clock when Progress was reported, and a few minutes after 10 he merely asked that the clause might be read, so that he might not be in ignorance of what it was he was called on to vote upon. If the Attorney General had simply appealed to him, and asked him not to press his request, he would at once have given way, as he wished to show every courtesy to the Government. All he had asked for was for honest information, and he was very sorry that any debate had been raised upon the matter, as he had no desire to see the time of the Committee wasted. He merely wished to know where they were.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF merely wished to say one word with regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Chaplin), who had accused him of having been guilty of a great act of impertinence. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had not made a threat to the Government. The hon. Gentleman had declared that the request made to the Government was not a courteous request, but a threat; and in saying that he entirely misunderstood the subject. The hon. Gentleman was not here himself at the time, or he would have known that the request he had referred to as not a courteous request was that of the hon. Member for Evesham (Mr. Dixon-Hartland), and had nothing to do with anything that he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) had had to say. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire had come up from Newmarket, not having assisted in any of the debates that day, and he was perfectly unaware that a short time before 7 o'clock the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill), simply at the request of the Prime Minister—a request which, no doubt, was most courteously made—had withdrawn a Notice to report Progress. Now, all that was asked for at the present moment was that hon. Members might be allowed to know the terms of the clause upon which they were asked to vote—it would not take two minutes to give the desired information. ["Question!"] What he was saying was the Question. If Progress should now be reported, hon. Members would have the text of the clause upon the Paper tomorrow, and then they would know what it really was; but at the present moment they were asked to vote upon it without knowing what were its terms. He, therefore, respectfully put it to the Prime Minister to let them know exactly what they were going to vote upon, for, surely, the right hon. Gentleman did not wish them to vote without knowing what was the Question before them.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question put.

THE CHAIRMAN: The "Ayes" have it.

MR. LEWIS: Sir Arthur Otway—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is too late; the Question has been decided.

MR. GORST: I beg to say that the hon. Member for Londonderry rose before the Question was put.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I heard the hon. Member for Londonderry most distinctly challenge your ruling.

MR. ONSLOW: I rise to a point of Order. If the hon. Member for Londonderry had not got up, I should have got up myself some considerable time ago.

THE CHAIRMAN: If the hon. Member for Londonderry had risen before I put the Question, certainly I should have no desire to interfere with him.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER rose to Order. When the Chairman of Committees gave a decision the other evening, although the right hon. Gentleman admitted that that decision was made by mistake, the whole Conservative Party protested against any alteration, and that decision had to stand. Now, he (Mr. O'Connor Power) was prepared to be guided by one rule applicable to all sections of the House; but he was not prepared, as a Member of the Committee or of the House, to have one rule applied to the Conservative Party, and another rule applied to Irish Members; and he maintained that as the decision of the other evening was allowed to stand, notwithstanding the mistake of the Chairman, the decision of this evening ought to remain, notwithstanding the mistake which affected the hon. Member for Londonderry.

Mr. Gorst

THE CHAIRMAN: Mr. Lewis.

MR. LEWIS said, he would not detain the Committee for more than a very few minutes, simply for the purpose of informing hon. Members who desired to have the clause read, but who had not been able to get it read, what he understood to be its present condition. He thought it was a matter of great importance that there should be a clear understanding as to what was the present condition of the clause. He did not wish to enter into any discussion as to whether it was reasonable or not to ask to have the clause read again, seeing that it was read by the Chairman at about five or ten minutes past 10 o'clock; but it was, perhaps, unfortunate that the clause should have been altered in so complicated a way that even the Attorney General had not in his possession an actual record of its present condition, or he was sure the hon. and learned Gentleman would have read it to the Committee. Many alterations had been made in the clause. In the first place—and he begged to call the attention of hon. Members to this fact—an alteration had been made so as not to exclude the use as committee rooms of clubs of a permanent character. On the other hand, a committee room of a candidate could not be hired in any house in which refreshment of any kind, whether meat or drink, was sold upon the premises. He need not say that that was a most extraordinary and extreme alteration to make, and it would have the effect of excluding every room in every house of a baker, butcher, or grocer, or any class of traders who sold refreshment of any kind, whether liquid or solid. Another important alteration which had been made in the clause was that committees were not to be held in any school room under a school board. But a far more serious and important alteration than any he had yet mentioned was one at the end of the clause which enabled meetings to be held by candidates at licensed houses of every description, though they could not have committee rooms there. He asked the Committee to vote against the clause as it stood; and he maintained that they ought to do so just because they had no accurate record of it, if for no other reason. He was not going in the least degree to join in the dispute as to the propriety or the inconvenience of asking the Chairman to read the clause again; but as no Member of the Government had before him an accurate record of the condition in which the clause now stood, that was an abounding reason why Progress should be reported to enable them to see the clause in print.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 146; Noes 111: Majority 35.—(Div. List, No. 164.)

Clause 16 (Punishment of illegal payment, employment, or hiring).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. LEWIS moved that Progress be reported, it being now 1 o'clock, and the House having been sitting since 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Lewis.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the Committee would sit a little while longer, as it was now earlier than the hour at which Progress was usually reported. He thought he could meet the views of hon. Members with regard to Sub-section 2, by agreeing to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), which was to strike out all the words from "hiring" to "shall" in line 20. That would have the effect of narrowing the clause very much, and if the Committee would consent to deal with that matter, he would then consent to report Progress.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK asked whether the Attorney General would make any concession with regard to the amount of fine? The hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) proposed to reduce the fine to £5; and he thought if the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General could see his way to reducing it to that amount, that would give satisfaction.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the two hon. Members who had Amendments down with a view of reducing the fine had been called, but had not risen.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he thought that that did not preclude an Amendment being moved, and he should move to reduce the fine.

[Thirteenth Night.]

MR. LEWIS said, he had not factiously opposed the Bill, and he should not be so discourteous to the Government as not to accede to the appeal, although personally he reserved to himself the right to move the omission of the sub-section.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. KENNY said, he wished to move the omission of the words "one hundred," and insert "fifty." His object was to make the clause more workable, believing that all offences of illegal payment would be quite met by a fine of £50, instead of £100. He was of opinion that extreme punishments were calculated to prevent the effective working of the Act, and that if the Committee agreed to this Amendment the working of the Act would be very much simplified.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 16, to leave out "one hundred," and insert "fifty."—(Mr. Kenny.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought the Committee would realize that he had yielded as far as he could. He must point out that this section imposed no imprisonment, but simply a money fine, and even that fine might be reduced within the discretion of the tribunal. This was a matter of very small importance, and he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. LEAMY asked whether there was to be an appeal in every case? Because he did not think it would be right to enable magistrates to impose a fine of £50 without an appeal. If this was to be a matter for summary conviction, the right of appeal would be given under the Summary Jurisdiction Acts; but it would never do to allow magistrates to impose a fine of £50 upon a man with whose political opinions they differed. He would ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether conviction under this section would come under the Petty Sessions Act in Ireland? If that were so, he should see no objection to the section standing.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) said, he believed there could be no doubt that this matter would come under the provisions of the Petty Sessions Act, and that, therefore, there would be an appeal.

MR. WARTON said, that he was not anxious as to whether the amount was £50 or £100; but there was a far more important question arising here than that. The Attorney General had stoutly resisted an Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke) with a view to the summary punishment of election improprieties during an election. There was nothing in the clause just passed, or in this clause, to prevent instant action being taken for illegal payment, employment, or hiring, while the election was proceeding; and he wished to point out the importance of considering the practicability of the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. He hoped the Attorney General would consider whether he could carry out that Amendment with regard to treating and other crimes which had been passed by for the present, for it seemed to him that the only practical way of putting down all kinds of election crimes was by dealing with them on the spot. He thought they might fully trust the magistrates not to be led away by political feelings, or to turn a case one way or another by reason of political considerations, but to act entirely on the evidence before them. The Attorney General had been strangely inconsistent in rejecting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman, and then allowing certain crimes to be punished, as they could be under this section, while an election was actually proceeding. The Attorney General had rejected the Amendment because he chose to assume that magistrates would not do their duty in consequence of his allowing them to act while an election was proceeding in cases of illegal payment, employment, or hiring. If there was any sincerity in the Government in wishing to put down bribery, the only effective way to do that was to have a tribunal on the spot to punish crimes as they were committed.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. and learned Member to speak more to the Question before the Committee. There is not a word about tribunal in this clause.

MR. WARTON said, the words "summary conviction" were in the clause, and if the Government took objection upon that ground it would be the duty of the Committee to scrutinize every line very closely; and the next time that occurred he should move an Amendment to draw attention to the thorough inconsistency and hypocrisy of the Government.

MR. GORST said, he thought that the statement just made by the Attorney General, in reply to the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis), was calculated to mislead the Committee. The Attorney General for Ireland had said that in Ireland there would be an appeal. That might be so; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman rather implied that there would also be an appeal in England. Was it not the fact that in England there would be no appeal at all? He wished to ask the Attorney General to state distinctly whether, under this clause, imposing a fine without imprisonment, in England there would be any appeal whatever? Would it not come under Section 19 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, which gave an appeal only when there was imprisonment?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, his right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland had stated that there would be an appeal under the Petty Sessions Act in Ireland. Under the English Act an appeal only lay when there was imprisonment, and therefore under this clause there would be no appeal. This question of tribunal and appeal would come under consideration upon Clause 29, or it could be dealt with under Clause 51.

MR. WARTON protested against the habit of the Attorney General of referring the Committee to subsequent clauses. It was important they should enter on a discussion of this point. The Attorney General allowed the magistrates to summarily convict in some cases, but not in others.

MR. RAIKES said, he should like to have a little more information upon this clause. He thought it was desirable that the Attorney General should take steps to gather whether an appeal could be allowed in such cases. He remembered a case in a recent election where an enormous amount of damage was done in a borough—several thousand pounds' worth of injury to property—and in respect to which parties were summoned before the magistrates. There was a whip-up of magistrates, the Mayor was there on the Bench, and he was scheduled afterwards by the Commission, and he was assisted by other magistrates, whose names were also subsequently scheduled, and by the casting vote of the Mayor they succeeded in rejecting the claims of those persons whose property had been damaged. Having this instance in his mind, he thought that a more unfortunate tribunal than borough magistrates for deciding matters of this kind could not be imagined. He hoped, therefore, some form of appeal would be provided.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, the hon. Member who moved the Amendment could not have looked at Clause 51. If he referred to that clause he would find that, as the Bill stood, a person feeling himself aggrieved might appeal to Quarter Sessions. He hoped the Attorney General would consider, in relation to that provision, whether he could give the same tribunal jurisdiction in the direction as to which the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) was so anxious. But, as the Bill stood, the Amendment was open to all the objections the Attorney General pointed out. He did not entertain distrust of the magistrates; there might be some bad, but he did not believe there were grounds for any general distrust; but for the sake of the magistrates, and the possibility of there being any such distrust, it was very undesirable to trust to them entirely. He only rose to point out that there was an appeal under the Bill, and in the discussion of that clause there would be a more proper opportunity for entertaining this proposal.

MR. KENNY said, under the circumstances, and as Clause 51 provided for an appeal for any person aggrieved under Section 16, it was not necessary to press the Amendment, and he would, with permission, withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 17, after the word "is," to insert the word "personally."—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

Amendment agreed to.

[Thirteenth Night.]

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 18, to leave out from after the word "hiring" to the word "shall" in line 20.—(Mr. Gorst.)

Amendment agreed to.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, the Amendment he had to propose had reference to the clause as it originally stood; but the object was one in which the Attorney General participated. There was nothing in the Bill to punish any Association, the agent of which had been guilty of illegal practices; it merely punished the agent, merely subjecting him to a penalty of £100; but if the Association were also punished, and a certain stigma placed upon it, gentlemen who were asked to subscribe to the Association would naturally be somewhat chary of associating with a body which had been punished for illegal practices. He was informed by legal friends that the Amendment, as it stood, was inadmissible, for it was not possible to fine an Association—some individuals must be made liable; and he would, therefore, propose to insert before the word "Association" the words "the committee or directing authority of." The Attorney General would see the object he desired to gain; and if he preferred other words, or would undertake to insert words to meet the object, he (Lord George Hamilton) would leave the matter to him.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 20, add the following subsection:—"(3.) If the agent of any Association shall be guilty of the offence of illegal payment, employment, or hiring, or shall aid, abet, or, by the payment of money, or in any other manner, confirm any such offence, the committee or directing authority of such Association shall be guilty of an illegal practice, and be liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the noble Lord did not think he gave any promise to accept any particular Amendment; he had only given a general opinion as to the undue intervention of an outside Association. The Amendment would go a good deal further than was intended, for under it any Association, the agent of which was guilty of any illegal practice during an election, would be liable to a fine of £100. Thus an Assurance Office in London might have a person acting as its agent in a distant town, and this agent might be proved guilty of an illegal practice at an election with which the Company had no concern, and yet under the Amendment the Directors would be liable to a fine of £100. There was evidently a mis-carriage of words in the Amendment in giving expression to the idea intended to be conveyed. He would suggest that the noble Lord should withdraw his Amendment, and raise the point in a more substantial manner later on.

MR. WARTON submitted that the noble Lord might, by the introduction of one word, make all clear. If the word "political" were introduced before the word "Association" in the first line in the Amendment, then it would have no effect on other Associations.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he was afraid the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member would not meet what he proposed, for it need not necessarily be the action of a political Association; there were many non-political Societies that might materially interfere in an election. But he could see that the drafting of the Amendment would not do. He would take the advice of the Attorney General, withdraw the Amendment, consult with his legal friends, and see if, on Report, he could raise the Amendment in some other shape.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would move to report Progress, and for this reason. In reply to the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) the Attorney General intimated that the Bill would not be proceeded with beyond the Amendment standing in the name of that hon. Member, the omission of Clause 16, and it was to be assumed the hon. Member so understood the Attorney General, for he had left the House. It was only fair, therefore, in his absence, that the clause should not be passed, and that the hon. Member should have an opportunity of urging his objections on the morrow to this particular clause.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Biggar.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there was some little misunderstanding on the part of the hon. Member for Cavan. He had stated distinctly what he proposed to do with the clause, and the hon. Member for Londonderry, knowing what the Amendments were, and knowing that the clause would be taken, had left with the understanding that the clause would be taken, and what he objected to would be taken out.

MR. BIGGAR said, his hon. Friend the Member for Ennis (Mr. Kenny) corroborated him in the impression he gathered from the undertaking given by the Attorney General; and he certainly did think it would not be acting in good faith towards the hon. Member for Londonderry to pass the clause. It could really make no material difference, for if there was no objection raised to the clause, it would pass at once at the next Sitting without discussion.

The Committee proceeded to a Division:—

The Chairman stated he thought the Noes had it; and, his decision being challenged, he directed the Ayes to stand up in their places, and Five Members only having stood up, the Chairman declared the Noes had it.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. LEAMY said, he understood that while the hon. Member for Londonderry was in the House he proposed to move the rejection of Sub-section 2; and the Attorney General said if the 1st section of Clause 16 were allowed to pass, and certain other Amendments were accepted, it would still be in the power of the hon. Member for Londonderry to move the rejection of Sub-section 2. The hon. Member for Londonderry, it seemed to him, had gone away under the impression that it was possible for him to move the rejection of Sub-section 2; and, in the absence of the hon. Member, he was willing to make that Motion.

MR. CALLAN said, he was in the House when the hon. Member for Londonderry spoke, and his belief was that it was understood that if the Amendment to leave out certain words were accepted, the first question to-morrow would be that Clause 16 stand part of the Bill; and he arranged with the hon.

Member to attend punctually at 12 to discuss the retention of the clause, and the hon. Member left the House under that impression.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would not take advantage of any mistake, if mistake there was; but there really was none. It was impossible that the hon. Member for Londonderry could misunderstand. He informed the hon. Member that he was going to accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), and that of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst); and thus the clause was rendered quite different to that which the hon. Member for Londonderry had proposed to strike out; and thereupon that hon. Gentleman left the House, willing to accept the clause, and he did so immediately he knew what he (the Attorney General) was going to do.

MR. LEAMY said, that, after this statement, he would not press his objection.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

BILL [Lords].—[BILL 205.]

(Dr. Lyons.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Lyons.)

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the hon. Member when he proposed to take the Committee stage? He believed this was a Bill very generally accepted, and that there was no opposition to its principle; but he, in common with many hon. Members, had received a number of papers, which seemed to indicate that to one clause in the Bill much exception was taken.

DR. LYONS said, this was not the Bill to which the hon. Gentleman referred—this was not the Bill affecting medical men. It was a Bill for a special purpose—for giving the Royal University of Ireland power to do that which its predecessor, the Queen's University, did—to nominate to the Medical Council. It was a very simple Bill of one clause.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL
ORDERS (No. 5) BILL.—[BILL 224.]

(Mr. John Holms, Mr. Chamberlain.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. John Holms.)

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN said, that, before the Bill was read a second time, he wished to ask his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade (Mr. J. Holms) what the intention of the Board of Trade was in regard to this and other Bills which involved the establishment of the principle of electric lighting? He understood that there was considerable opposition to the present Bill, and that Petitions had been lodged against it. If that were so, and he believed he was correctly informed in the matter, the Bill would appear to come under the 2nd and 3rd sub-sections [of the 4th clause of the Electric Lighting Act of last year; and he would, therefore, ask his hon. Friend if it was the intention of the Board of Trade, under those circumstances, to move that the Bill be referred to a Hybrid Committee?

MR. J. HOLMS said, that, in reply to the hon. Baronet the Member for Glamorganshire, he had to state that this was a somewhat novel undertaking, and that it was one of the first Provisional Order Bills which had come before the House since the passing of the Electric Lighting Act which proposed to remit them to the consideration of the House of Commons. It was therefore, perhaps, desirable that the matter should be more fully considered than would probably be necessary under ordinary circumstances. In a matter of this kind it was of great importance that the regulations should at the beginning be completely brought under the cognizance of the House. Therefore, in the nomination of the Committee to inquire into the merits of the Bill, the Government would be open to consider any suggestion to refer the measure to a Hybrid Committee.

MR. E. STANHOPE only desired to make one remark upon what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Board of Trade. If this particular Bill contained principles of novelty and importance, the nature of the Committee to which it was to be sent was well worth consideration; but it would be of no use to call upon any Select Committee to consider the Bill unless there was somebody appointed to bring before such Committee any substantial points of objection. If the Bill were not opposed at all, it appeared to him that it would be absolutely useless to send it to a Select Committee.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he had ascertained at the Vote Office that there were at the present moment a number of Electric Lighting Bills before the House involving all sorts of complications; and, if they were going to make a new departure on the subject, it was most undesirable that Bills of this kind should be run through the House without being thoroughly examined by a competent Committee, and that every provision should be carefully scrutinized before it was passed. It seemed to him that these Bills, to a certain extent, sinned against the principle which he certainly should have thought the President of the Board of Trade and Member for Birmingham would have insisted upon—namely, the principle of local authority and local self government. If the principle of local self government was worth anything at all it ought to apply to a matter of this kind, which was purely a matter for local government. He thought it was the duty of Parliament to exercise great care before it thrust a speculative Company upon the local authorities with power to provide electric lighting and to tear up the streets without the consent of such local authorities. In the Strand district, which was affected by the present Bill, he understood that the local authority was strongly opposed to the provisions of the Bill, and it was most undesirable that an opposed Bill of this kind should be run through the House without a thorough and competent examination.

MR. STEVENSON said, that these Bills, although unopposed, had undergone a careful examination before their provisions had come before the House; and it was no part of the functions of the House to facilitate an opposition to unopposed Bills. It was quite true that the Electric Lighting Act of last year was passed without exciting much attention at the hands of the House; but the Act was the result of an able Committee that gave a long time to its consideration last year. Under that Act these Electric Lighting Provisional Orders had been prepared, and every person interested in the matter had an opportunity of being fully heard before the Board of Trade, and bringing forward any objection. It was not desirable, he thought, to afford an opportunity for opposition now, where hitherto there had been no opposition. An unopposed Bill must necessarily go before some Committee, in order that the clauses contained in it might be settled; but it was a very different thing to give facilities for opposition, when no opposition had been offered at the right time.

THE CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES (Sir ARTHUR OTWAY) said, he could not help thinking that the course proposed by the Secretary to the Board of Trade was one which would best commend itself to the House, because it afforded an opportunity to the House, if it were so minded, of referring the Bill to a Hybrid Committee, instead of the ordinary Select Committee. His hon. Friend had not prescribed any particular course, but said he would afford an opportunity to the House, on a future occasion, of expressing and giving effect to its opinion on the matter. For his own part, he (Sir Arthur Otway) was rather inclined, seeing the importance of the interests involved in the matter, to support the appointment of a Hybrid Committee; but he was perfectly open to be convinced by the arguments which might be used on the other side. In regard to unopposed Bills, the operation which took place was of a different character from that which was generally supposed. Unopposed Bills often required a very careful examination, and a great deal of responsibility was thrown on those to whom the duty of examining them was intrusted. He must say, speaking for himself, that he considered an unopposed Electric Lighting Bill just the Bill that should be examined as carefully by the Committee before whom it was sent as an unopposed Bill. He advised the House to concur in the course recommended by the Secretary to the Board of Trade, and to reserve its decision as to the tribunal before whom the Bill should go when the nomination of the Committee was proposed. It would then be for the House to determine whether they would refer the whole of these Bills to a Hybrid Committee or to an ordinary Select Committee.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES)
BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(*Mr. Attorney General, Sir William Harcourt,
Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles Dilke,
Mr. Solicitor General.*)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 3rd July.]

[FOURTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Illegal Payment, Employment, or Hiring.

[Fourteenth Night.]

Clause 17 (Power of High Court and election court to except innocent act from being illegal practice, &c.).

MR. WARTON said, he had an Amendment before that of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson), which he was sorry he had not had an opportunity of placing on the Paper. It was, in line 24, after the word "election," to add the words "or the Court of Election Commissioners." They had, in this Bill, re-established and strengthened the Court of Election Commissioners appointed under the Act of 1852; and it was quite possible that in the course of the inquiry made before that Court some allegation might be made as to one of those illegal acts which were not to be tried on Petition, and some candidate or agent might suddenly find his character affected on some point not raised during the trial of an Election Petition. As this was an Equity Clause, he was quite sure the Attorney General would view his Amendment favourably. The principle of Equity should apply whether the Court was an Election Petition Court or a Court of Election Commissioners—the latter Court being carefully preserved by the 10th clause of this Bill, which they had passed. It seemed to him that it would be advisable to leave it open to the last moment for some accusation to be made of some of these illegal practices that they had been dealing with during the past day or so against either a candidate or an agent, or some other person—some accusation that might only come out during the evidence, and might occur to the surprise of the person or persons interested. If it was not troubling the Attorney General too much, he would urge him to agree to these words.

Amendment proposed,

In page 7, line 24, after the words "Election Court," to insert the words "or a Court of Election Commissioners."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sorry to be obliged to say "No" to this Amendment, which had taken him by surprise. He did not wish to give this power to the Election Commissioners. The object of the clause was to prevent the extreme penalty, which was the loss of a seat, being inflicted on a candidate in consequence of some act of inadvertence, or from accidental miscalculation committed. The Commissioners would only come into play after an Election Petition had been determined; and he did not wish to delegate such duties as these to the three gentlemen who might sit as Commissioners. The powers ought to be exercised by Judges; and he, therefore, hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GIBSON said, he had an Amendment to slightly extend the clause and remedy an omission in drafting. He did not propose to go at any length into the matter, and would merely suggest that after the second "agent," the words "or person" should be inserted.

Amendment proposed, in page 7, line 26, after the second "agent," to insert "or person."—(Mr. Gibson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought the insertion of these words would be an improvement. Therefore, he would agree to the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BIGGAR said, that as the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) was not in his place, he would move one of the Amendments standing in the hon. Member's name—namely, in line 32, to leave out "payment, employment, or hiring." It seemed to him that if a candidate deliberately acted in this way by an illegal "payment, employment, or hiring," he had a right to suffer the penalty.

[After a pause, the hon. Member resumed his seat, remarking that he would not move the Amendment.]

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that, in the absence of the right hon. Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke), he would move the Amendment which stood in his name—namely, that after the word "arose," to leave out these words—

"From inadvertence, or from accidental miscalculation, or from some other reasonable cause of a like nature," and insert "from some reasonable cause."

During his own last election some wickedly-intentioned person placarded Liverpool with a statement to the effect that he had retired in order to contest Mid Cheshire, and he was obliged to placard the town denying the statement. Everybody in the House would know that the statement was perfectly untrue. Nevertheless, increased expenditure on his part was rendered necessary by the placard; and if this Act had been in force the result might have been that the maximum amount of expense might have had to be over-stepped at the last moment. The Amendment would cover a difficulty of that kind.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could not accept the words proposed. He was willing to accept an Amendment which stood in the name of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), to make such an act as that complained of an offence under the Act. He had carefully considered the question whether he could be more elastic than he had been; and though he could not say that it would be unconstitutional to give such powers as those mentioned by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) to the Judges, nevertheless it would be a very great power to confer upon them. A candidate might expend a large sum of money from what he might consider some reasonable cause; but the Judge might take a different view of the reasonableness of the cause. A candidate might look upon anything as reasonable—such, for instance, as taking some thousands of people for a house-to-house canvass; but the Judge might think that it was a distinctly illegal practice. The candidate might say—"But I could not have a house-to-house canvass without employing a large number of persons; therefore, in order to carry on my election I found it necessary to spend a very large sum of money." He (the Attorney General) wished he could accept the Amendment; but he thought the Committee would look at the object the Government had in view, and would agree with them that the law should be such that, when it was framed, it should compel obedience to it. It seemed to him that the words—were sufficient to cover any substantial difficulty which might arise. At any rate, if these words were found to be insufficient, at a later stage he would promise to introduce words to obviate any difficulty.

MR. TOMLINSON said, that during the discussion on the previous clause he had been under the impression that the Attorney General placed great reliance in the common sense of the Judges. Some very important questions had been left to their common sense; and, that being so, he could not for the life of him see why they should not leave it to their common sense also to say whether the excuse given for a payment was a "reasonable" one or not. Surely, the power ought to be left with them of saying that the candidate ought not to be mulcted in a very heavy penalty for some expenditure that he might feel himself bound to incur. If they were to rely at all upon the Judges, they might, at least, leave them to say whether a reasonable cause existed for an expenditure. He did not suppose any Judge would look upon such an expenditure as the payment of thousands of persons for the purpose of a house-to-house canvass as a reasonable expenditure; and that was the only point the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General raised as a reason why he could not accept the Amendment.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he should like to see the words the Attorney General proposed to accept, on the Motion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), to make acts such as had been referred to offences under the measure. He should like to know what the Attorney General proposed to do, so that on Report he might suggest some other words to meet the case he had in his mind, if the suggestion of the Government was not sufficient.

MR. WARTON looked upon these words as very satisfactory, with the exception of those "of a like nature," which would tend too much to limit the discretion of the Judge. What acts could be committed which would be "of a like nature" to "inadvertence or accidental miscalculation?" It seemed to him that the clause would be much more satisfactory if these words were omitted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if he struck out the words "of a like nature," he should be practically accepting the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross). As to circumstances of a like nature, it seemed to him that, supposing a candidate was deceived by the statement of some person who came to him for money, and who said that he had been employed, when, as a matter of fact, he had not, such a circumstance as that would apply. Again, a candidate, or an agent, might be misled in making an appointment, or he might be misled into asserting that he had had a certain clerk in his employment, when, as a matter of fact, he had not.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WARTON submitted that the words in Sub-section (c)—

"That such notice of the application has been given in the county or borough for which the election was held as to the Court seems fit"— would not render the provision more satisfactory. This was an unnecessary provision, and if the Attorney General would omit all unnecessary provisions from his Bill he would get the measure through much more rapidly. If a man considered himself entitled to relief from the penalties of the Bill he would be sure to make application, and to give notice of it. Therefore, it was quite unnecessary to retain these words. The Committee had had several of these absurdities before, and it was quite time they had done with them, if they were to make progress with the Bill. He would move the omission of Sub-section (c).

Amendment proposed, to leave out Sub-section (c).—(Mr. Warton.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought the sub-section ought to remain. [Mr. Warton: Why?] It should be retained for this reason—that the error to be provided against arose out of a public transaction—namely, the election. The constituency were interested in the question of the relief claimed, and might object to its being afforded. Therefore, in order that the matter should not be decided behind the backs of the constituency, provision should be made for advising them of what was going to take place. The sub-section would provide for this notice, which would give the constituency an opportunity of making themselves heard, if necessary.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GIBSON said, he would now move the Amendment which stood in his name, and which was consequential upon the Amendment which had been already accepted. It was in page 8, line 2, after "agent," insert "or person."

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 2, after the word "agent," to insert the words "or person."—(Mr. Gibson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. WARTON said, he would submit whether it would not be better to say "such person?" The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would see that the words "such person" would identify, without the possibility of mistake, the person intended. They had used the words "such candidate;" and he thought that to be accurate, and to be in keeping with the provisions they had adopted, they should here employ the word "such." If they did not adopt this Amendment they would not be able to say who the person was.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would consent to the insertion of the words "or person" after the word "agent," in line 8 of page 8, striking out the word "or," in line 7.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Election Expenses.

Clause 18 (Nomination of election agent).

MR. ONSLOW said, he wished to propose, in page 8, line 12, to insert after the word "person," the words "not himself." He had personal knowledge of two hon. Members who sat in that House, and who were their own election agents; and he therefore thought it quite reasonable that this Amendment should be adopted. [Cries of "Agreed!"] He quite understood that it was "agreed;" but he should like to ask the Attorney General what he meant by the words "so far as circumstances admit" in the Amendment which he was about to move? The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that, if a man was his own agent, why should these words be put in at all? But, surely, for all practical purposes, if a candidate managed his own election he took the part of an agent under the Act; and all the pains and penalties attaching to offences by agents under the Act should attach to him.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought he had explained this matter already to the Committee.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would now move an Amendment which had been suggested by the hon. Member who had just sat down. He had received a great many communications, both in public and private, that there were many purposes for which the candidate might wish to be his own agent. He did not think it would occur very often. Still, he could not deny that if a candidate chose to be his own agent he should be allowed to undertake the duties.

Amendment proposed,

In page 8, line 14, after the word "agent," insert as a new sub-section—"A candidate may name himself as an election agent, and thereupon shall, so far as circumstances admit, be subject to the provisions of this Act both as a candidate and as an election agent; and any reference in this Act to an election agent shall be construed to refer to the candidate acting in his capacity of election agent."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. WARTON said, he really thought that if the hon. and learned Gentleman would study these words carefully he would come to the conclusion that they would have a most injurious—he might say a most tremendous—result. He (Mr. Warton) intended to formally move the rejection of all the words after the word "agent," in line 3 of the clause, for the reason that they were not sufficiently limited. The hon. and learned Gentleman said by his Amendment that any reference in this Act to an election agent might refer to the candidate. The words were far too wide.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warton) would, perhaps, allow him to interrupt him. The whole of the sub-section was covered by the words "and thereupon," which provided that until the man chose to occupy the two positions of candidate and agent the difficulties in question would not occur.

Amendment agreed to.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he saw the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt) had an Amendment on the Paper, to leave out Sub-section 3, which said—

"One election agent only shall be appointed for each candidate; but the appointment may be revoked, and in the event of such revocation or his death, whether such an event is before, during, or after the election, then forthwith another election agent shall be appointed, and his name and address declared in writing to the returning officer, who shall forthwith give public notice of the same."

He wished to ask a question about this sub-section. What did it mean? What would follow it? Would all acts done by the former agent—for instance, the appointment of the sub-agents—cease to hold good the moment the agent ceased to hold his position? Supposing an agent was appointed, and for certain reasons it was necessary to revoke his appointment, would all those whom he had appointed cease to occupy an official capacity?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that that was not his intention. He had not had his attention called to the matter; but when he looked into it, if he found that it was necessary to provide that the people appointed by the agent should continue at their posts he would introduce words to effect that object.

DR. LYONS said, he wished to call attention to an Irish Act of Geo. IV., c. 58. It appeared that the general principle of this Act was to diminish the expense of candidates to the sum therein mentioned. In Schedule B the candidate was to pay a sum not exceeding £100 to the agent. This measure, he believed, still remained; and as he did not find it mentioned in the Schedule of this Bill, he wished to draw the attention of the Attorney General to this—that if that measure continued in operation, it would entail a charge of £100 on the candidate in addition to the other expenses. He did not think that this was contemplated by the Legislature in this matter. The object of the Bill, he understood, was to minimize the expenditure.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Act referred to by the hon. Member (Dr. Lyons) was an Irish one; but the present was a general measure, which probably would override the provisions of that Act. He would, however, look into the point. But he would clear up what the right hon. Gentleman (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had said. If he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) would look at Clause 19, Sub-section 4, he would find these words—

“The appointment of a sub-agent shall not be vacated by the election agent who appointed him ceasing to be an election agent, but may be revoked by the election agent for the time being of the candidate, and in the event of such revocation, or of the death of a sub-agent, another sub-agent may be appointed, and his name and address.”

The right hon. Gentleman would find the point he had raised answered in those words.

DR. LYONS said, he was not aware that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had put the Act to which he had drawn attention in the Schedule.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) promised to consider the point.

MR. BIGGAR said, he should like to suggest to the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General whether it would not be desirable, in a Bill of this sort, to make a Schedule of fees for the unavoidable expenses at elections of such persons as polling clerks, personation agents, and so on. In the Ballot Act there was a Schedule; but it was more or less indefinite, because many of these people pretended they had performed other duties for which they were not at all appointed, and in that way endeavoured to extort more than their regular fees from the candidate. He would suggest to the hon. and learned Gentleman whether it would not be desirable, so far as possible, in the Schedule attached to the Bill, to lay down what should be the fees? As to the election agents, they knew very well, by the measure quoted by the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons), that £100 was a legal fee in Ireland; but in many cases in that country the agents contrived to get much larger sums. Sometimes it happened that agents who were employed, and who were not conducting agents, insisted on much higher fees than the election agent would be entitled to under the Bill. He had heard of a case, during the Election of 1874, in an Irish county, where an assistant solicitor claimed a fee of 150 guineas from one of the candidates. The ground of his claim was not that he had given services which had occupied certain time, but that his political influence was worth a considerable amount, and that, therefore, he should be paid the large fee he claimed. He (Mr. Biggar) considered that these charges were great evils, and that in a Bill of this sort, to prevent a candidate from controversy or annoyance of discussion with solicitors and others, there should be a Schedule of fees attached to the Bill. Such a Schedule would be a ready answer to any fraudulent claim. He would urge upon the Attorney General the desirability of accepting this suggestion. He should be very glad if the Attorney General would give him his attention. The hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to be discussing some other matter with his Colleagues, while he (Mr. Biggar) was speaking. Under the circumstances, there was nothing for him to do but to repeat what he had said before.

[The hon. MEMBER proceeded to repeat his observations.]

THE CHAIRMAN: I must call the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that he is repeating every word he has just addressed to the Committee.

MR. BIGGAR said, the Chairman was perfectly right. The reason, as he had explained, why he repeated his statement, was simply this—during the time he had been addressing the Committee the Attorney General had been in conversation with his Colleagues. He (Mr. Biggar) had wished to elicit a reply; but, seeing that the hon. and learned Member was conversing all the time with the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, he had had no opportunity of knowing what had been said.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, his attention had not been diverted from the substance of the hon. Member's remarks. Now, this question of extortion was of peculiar interest to the county of Cavan, and to the hon. Member (Mr. Biggar), who seemed to have been unfortunate in that county, seeing that so strong a man had been unable to prevent overcharge. But the charges the hon. Member had alluded to for polling clerks, personation agents, and others were regulated by the Act of 1875. Probably the hon. Member would study that Act a little more, and if he did, he would find that beyond a certain sum the candidate was not bound to pay one single farthing. However, there ought to be no fear of any clashing between this and any Irish Act of Parliament; and if it were found that inconvenience arose in this way he would promise to obviate that later on.

MR. GIBSON said, he thought the hon. Member for the City of Dublin (Dr. Lyons) had done good service by calling attention to this Irish Act. All through this Bill he saw that the position of the conducting agents was left in a state of studied ambiguity. He was at a loss to discover what was intended by the Attorney General with regard to these conducting agents. What did the hon. and learned Member propose that they should receive in future—was it £100, £150, £200, or more? Was it intended to allow a large payment to be made, not for any corrupt purpose, but to secure the best class of men to do the work? If they prevented candidates employing first-class men who were accustomed to work of this kind, they necessarily drove them to the employment of a lower stamp of men, who would do the business of an election, perhaps, in a way which probably was not contemplated by the Bill. If they compelled the candidates to go to a low and inferior class of agents, they might only be able probably to secure the services of those who had become parties to practices which the Bill condemned. He (Mr. Gibson) had not been able to put any meaning upon the words in Clause 25, which said—

“So far as circumstances admit, this Act shall apply to a claim for his remuneration by an election agent, and to the payment thereof in like manner as if he were any other creditor, and if any difference arises respecting the amount of such claim,” &c.

The Committee would there note the fact, “so far as circumstances admit.” What was the meaning of those words? He (Mr. Gibson) had the honour to represent a constituency (the University of Dublin) where any question of this kind was not likely to arise; but he had very carefully considered the point, and he did not think that the Government could have any distinct or definite view present to their minds as to whether this Bill was intended to apply to the claim of conducting agents; and if it was intended to apply to them, whether it was with the view of keeping them down or the reverse. He would not, however, at the present moment, press the Attorney General for an answer as to the meaning of those words.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would give the answer at once. The words quoted by the right hon. and learned Gentleman would apply to the claim of a conducting agent, as it would apply to the claim of any other creditor. They meant that the claim must be sent in to the Returning Officer, and it did not in any way affect the question of amount. This question had been discussed already, and it had been asked—“Can you get good agents for the payment of £100?” Well, in his own experience he had found that, as a rule, the better the election agents were the less money they wanted; in fact, the best agents he had ever known had been those who had refused to take a farthing remuneration. They worked not for money, but for their Party.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: Would the hon. and learned Member give me the address of some of these agents?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the noble Lord would not require the address of these gentlemen, as there were other influences at work upon which he could rely. These agents did what they could—they did their best—for their Party, and felt in doing it that they were performing the highest duty of citizenship. Personally, he had no fear in regard to this matter. The hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) had acquiesced in his view of the matter. He could not define the amount an agent was to have, and the agent must take his chance with other persons. As he had said, it was very often more advisable to appeal to the political views of these gentlemen than to discuss the amount of remuneration they were to have.

MR. RYLANDS said, he himself entertained very strong opinions as to the class of agents which should be employed, and as to the maximum remuneration to be fixed in the Bill; and he thought it might be fairly considered whether that remuneration might not be dealt with in the Schedule, apart from this other expenditure. They must, of course, have election agents.

MR. WARTON remarked, that this was a question of very great importance, and was not to be shirked in this way by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. It was all very well to talk about men working for nothing. The hon. and learned Gentleman might be able to get some people to work for him for nothing; but that fact would be entirely owing to his position. The people might expect to get something through the hon. and learned Gentleman's influence, seeing the position he held in connection with the Government, and might be willing to conduct his election for the sake of the interest they took in the success of the Party. But the ordinary agent exercised his functions from a business point of view, and expected to be properly remunerated. In nine cases out of ten the election agents expected to be paid, and they would not get a respectable and able election agent unless they gave him a respectable fee. One of the reasons why he should move the rejection of the Bill, when the proper time came, was because there was no provision in it for the payment of respectable agents. ["Oh!"] It was all very well for hon. Members to say "Oh!" This was a question which had to be faced. They had a provision in the Bill for the employment of one agent, and no more, and the 4th part of the 1st Schedule dealt with the expenses of all the people employed—in fact, all the election expenses were lumped together in what was a most absurdly small sum. There was no provision for the employment of a decent agent, and all that could be given to him would be as much as would be squeezed out of the ridiculously small maximum. A respectable agent required to be paid 100, 200, or 300 guineas. Under any circumstances, they would have the option of being able to work for nothing, or not. If the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General could point out whether there was any provision for the payment of a respectable agent, he (Mr. Warton) should withdraw a great deal of his opposition to the measure. The great majority of these agents were men of business, and knew their value, and they should be paid a fair price; and if they were not in the rare position that the Attorney General himself might be in of being able to secure agents without payment, they would have to resort to disreputable means, and the result would be that elections would be disreputably conducted. If there was one thing more necessary for the proper application of this measure than another, it was that candidates should have the power of employing respectable agents. In this matter the Attorney General seemed to have a supreme contempt for the interest of his followers.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he did not propose to trespass at any length upon the patience of the Committee. ["Oh, oh!"] Hon. Members seemed to be impatient; but he could assure them that he was not going to prolong the discussion upon this or upon any other clause. What he merely wished to suggest was that hon. Gentlemen who, in the future, intended to be candidates at elections need not trouble themselves about this Clause 18, or any of the succeeding clauses, because he could not conceive the possibility of any candidate escaping under the clauses which preceded Clause 18. He did not believe, for a moment, that if Election Judges began at Clause 1, in trying Election Petitions, that any candidate in the world, whoever he might be, would ever succeed in reaching Clause 18. He did not intend to repeat the arguments which they had so frequently heard about pitfalls and man-traps, and things of that kind; but he was satisfied that no candidate would ever be able to wriggle through all the meshes of the clause if Election Judges were left the option of interpreting the Act according to their lights. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had refused to give a discretion to the Judges in dealing with these cases. The hon. and learned Gentleman had been most candid. He had admitted, as to the grounds upon which he (the Attorney General) urged the acceptance of this Bill, that the evil of bribery was so great—[Cries of "Question!"] This certainly seemed to him to be the Question. He did not wish to waste the time of the Committee. He very seldom took up its time, and he could say to hon. Gentlemen opposite that they were only wasting time by interrupting him. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had said that he believed himself, under this Bill, innocent candidates might be convicted and punished; but that the evils they wished to put a stop to were so great that it was necessary, for the sake of purity of election, that here and there an innocent person should suffer. It amounted, therefore, to this—picking pockets in a crowd was an illegal practice, and, therefore, those who collected crowds took part in that practice. Gentlemen who addressed meetings collected crowds, and, therefore, were guilty of illegal practices. When an observation to the effect that the train was going too fast was made, the reply was—"Oh! but there is a brakesman at the end." The Schedule was the brakesman which was to put everything right.

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to say just one word in reply to the Attorney General in an observation he had made. He (Mr. Biggar) had not specially referred to the County of Cavan. He had seen much greater extortion elsewhere than he had ever known practised in Cavan. Candidates were put to a great deal of annoyance by some people—no doubt, in many cases, through blundering—endeavouring to extort more than they were entitled to. The hon. Member for the County of Londonderry (Sir Thomas M'Clure) could give instances of wholesale claims of this kind. The Government had declared that their primary object in introducing this Bill was to make elections as pure as possible. Well, he (Mr. Biggar) wished to further that object; and, therefore, he would suggest, in order to lower expenses generally, and to have an election carried on as purely as possible, there should be a power to employ respectable agents. He, for one, should be highly satisfied to see elections purified and election expenses reduced.

MR. HICKS said, that having, in nearly every Division on this Bill, supported Her Majesty's Government, he took this occasion to urge upon the hon. and learned Gentleman the absolute necessity of having some scale of fees for the payment of agents. He was perfectly aware that in some counties and boroughs agents had conducted elections without any remuneration whatever; but, because that had been done in some cases, it did not at all follow that either those persons would do it again, or that any other agents would desire to do it. Because some gentlemen had worked for nothing, it did not follow that when their places had to be filled by others, those successors would be willing to give candidates the benefit of their opinions and hard work on the same terms. When they were, under this Bill, to have a maximum sum for expenses, it appeared to him highly desirable that they should have a clear and distinct scale for the payment of election agents, seeing how important it was, not only in the interest which this Bill was professedly brought forward to serve, but in the interest of candidates. He wished to see their elections conducted as purely as possible. Candidates should be given an opportunity of employing the best election agents that were to be had, and to pay them not what were exorbitant, but what were reasonable sums. He, therefore, trusted that the hon. and learned Gentleman would see his way to meet the reasonable wishes expressed in so many parts of the House in regard to the preparation of a scale of fees.

MR. FINDLATER said, several hon. Gentlemen seemed very much afraid of being overcharged by solicitors; but, so far as his experience went, there were other people beside solicitors who made exorbitant charges. In fact, he did not see how solicitors could overcharge, as their fees were settled by law, and they could not enforce more. When, however, they came to settle a question of this kind, it was highly objectionable that they should have nothing to guide them. He thought that an officer should be appointed to tax the charges, not only of solicitors, but of all the persons employed.

MR. TOMLINSON protested against the idea that it was possible to conduct elections by means of agents who were unpaid for their services. If Members of the Committee only considered for a moment what the duties of election agents were, and what a disturbance the acceptance of such a post entailed in the business of a solicitor's office, they would see at once that they would never be able to employ the best men unless they paid them properly for their services. An election agent had to work night and day, to leave all his ordinary clients unattended to, and to perform various duties, many of them of a most disagreeable character. He had to come in contact with people who might some day or other be possible clients, and run the risk of incurring unpopularity with them by having to decline their services. Nothing would be worse, in a case of this kind, than to drive candidates to the employment of solicitors of inferior standing in the Profession. He did not believe that in all parts of the country they could find a class of men who were ready to undertake all the labours and inconveniences of election agency without receiving due reward for their professional services.

MR. GORST said, he had listened attentively to the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), who, he was aware, had had a great deal of experience in election matters. However, he (Mr. Gorst) could only corroborate what had fallen from the Attorney General. In his experience a great number of gentlemen, both barristers and solicitors, had acted as election agents, conducting important, difficult, and intricate elections, and at the end had declined to receive any remuneration whatever.

MR. STEWART MACLIVER said, he could also corroborate what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham. Some of the most influential solicitors in the West of England had given their services to candidates during elections without payment.

Mr. Findlater

MR. HICKS (who was received with cries of "Divide!") protested against the interruptions in which some hon. Members greeted those who wished to take part in the legitimate discussion of the clauses of the Bill. He believed it was perfectly open to any hon. Member—indeed, it was his privilege—to point out as distinctly, and, under any circumstances, as shortly as he could, the views he entertained upon the question before the Committee; and he thought the interruptions with which hon. Members on the opposite side of the House very often met the statements of hon. Gentlemen were more than likely to prolong the debate than shorten it. He wished to say a word or two in answer to the remark that had fallen from hon. Members opposite, that candidates were fearful of being overcharged by solicitors. He (Mr. Hicks) had not entertained any such idea. The object he had in rising was to point out how desirable it was that clients should have an opportunity of paying their agents a reasonable sum, and not that those agents should be left to perform their difficult duties, and receive in payment simply what remained of the maximum sum at their disposal for the conduct of the election. He thought it was desirable that they should have the remuneration of the election agents placed clearly and distinctly as the first charge on the expenses of the election. He wished to repudiate any idea of casting a reflection on so honourable a body of men as the solicitors who interested themselves in election matters; on the contrary, he was desirous of their receiving full remuneration for their trouble.

MR. NEWZAM NICHOLSON pointed out to the Attorney General that the man who got his election agent for nothing was able to spend a great deal more on other matters than those who had to pay their election agents. It would be advisable that they should have in the Schedule a certain sum to be paid to election agents, and another sum to be paid for the ordinary election expenses.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 19 (Nomination of deputy election agent as sub-agent).

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, that before they came to the Amendments on the Paper, he wished to put a question to the Attorney General about the sub-agents. He viewed with great apprehension the appointment of these agents, as it would be necessary to have a large number of them, one being necessary in each polling place. He would suggest to the Attorney General whether he would not deal with these Gentlemen specifically in the clause, seeing that the conditions in regard to this matter in counties differed very essentially from those in boroughs. The clause, as it stood, did not convey a sufficiently specific idea on the subject to his mind; and as the employment of these agents was open to possible abuse, he thought it was desirable that they should have the matter specifically dealt with.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) pointed out that if the hon. Gentleman would read the clause he would find that it referred to the 1st Schedule, which satisfactorily dealt with this question. Some boroughs would always be regarded in the nature of counties.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he wished to move an Amendment. After all they had done in Clause 16 it was clear that this clause should be arranged to suit it. They had stated in Clause 16 that "illegal payment, employment, or hiring," was an illegal practice; and he would call attention to Sub-section 4 of the present clause, which said that—

The hon. and learned Gentleman had alluded to that as answering an objection he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had taken earlier on. All that would have to be done would be to put in words to extend the provisions of Sub-section 4 of this clause to all appointments made by the agent. His present Amendment was to leave out, in page 8, line 39, to the end of clause after the word "accordingly." These words provided that the candidate should suffer the penalties imposed by the Bill as if an illegal act had been the act or default of the election agent, and not the sub-agent.

Amendment proposed, in page 8, line 39, after the word "accordingly," to leave out to end of Clause.—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had stated, over and over again, that he was anxious to do whatever he could to prevent one man bearing the burden of another man's folly; but he could not accept the present Amendment. The candidate must be liable for certain acts of his election agent—the agent who represented him and was properly appointed. When the Bill was originally framed there was only one election agent allowed; but, as it had been pointed out that in large constituencies no one could perform the whole of the work, this provision had been altered. They might have many cases where the agent was obliged to appoint three or four sub-agents, each of whom would stand in the place of one person in the district to which he was appointed. Of course, it was not necessary to have more than one agent; but probably the work would be better carried out if they had this number. If they struck out these words the candidate might say—"I require more than one agent." Sub-agents might, therefore, be appointed, and as there would then be no penalty attached to improper acts on the part of these sub-agents they might employ, say, as many canvassers as they liked, and yet the seat could be maintained. A complaint that the sub-agent had been breaking the law would not affect the candidate, because it would be held that it was not the principal agent. The sub-agent must be taken for better or worse. The sub-agents would sometimes become instruments of corruption if the candidates were not liable for their misdeeds.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the candidate would surely be responsible, even if these words were struck out, to the extent of illegal practices. His Amendment only affected illegal payments.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought that the general words, "for the purposes of this Act," would cover the obligation imposed by Clause 16.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that, if there was any doubt about the matter, he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. A. PEASE asked for an explanation of the words "done to."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, an election agent was the recipient of certain matters. He admitted the words were very general; but it was difficult to find other more suitable words. The meaning of the words was really that the agent should be passive, and that he should be the recipient of certain things.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ONSLOW proposed to insert at the end of the clause—

"And under this Act no person shall be deemed a sub-agent unless appointed as such by the election agent of the candidate."

He was not quite sure that these were the proper words to insert in order to attain the object he had in view. What he wished to define, in some direct sense, was the question of agency; a candidate, of course, was liable for the election agent whom he appointed; but he (Mr. Onslow) thought it was rather hard that a candidate should be held liable for the acts of persons appointed by the election agent—namely, for the acts of sub-agents. What he desired to do was to limit the liability of the candidate to these particular individuals. He was of opinion that if some such words as he proposed were added to the subsection, it would be a good guide to the Election Judges. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General knew perfectly well that the term "agency" was a very elastic one, and that some Judges had laid it down very strictly indeed, while others had been somewhat more lax in what they had done. Supposing, for instance, a candidate was put up for election who belonged to a Political Association, and to that Association he subscribed—

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) asked the hon. Gentleman to forgive him for one moment. He (the Attorney General) was quite at one with the hon. Gentleman. The words were already in the clause. The first words of Clause 19 were as follows:—

"In the case of the elections specified in that behalf in the 1st Schedule to this Act an election agent of a candidate may appoint the number of deputies therein mentioned (which deputies are in this Act referred to as sub-agents), to act within different polling districts;"

and if the hon. Gentleman would turn to his own Amendment, he would find that this was a provision which he himself wished to make. If the wording of the clause was not sufficient, he should be glad to make it more clear.

MR. ONSLOW asked whether those were the only persons in a borough or in a county who would be considered by the Judges as agents of the candidate?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not think the hon. Gentleman quite valued the importance of his Amendment, for in that Amendment he said—

"No person shall be deemed a sub-agent unless appointed as such by the election agent of the candidate."

A sub-agent was really an election agent. The question was altogether apart from the agent at Common Law.

MR. ONSLOW said, he then understood from the hon. and learned Gentleman that the agent in this case was different from the agent at Common Law?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) admitted that an election sub-agent was certainly different from a sub-agent at Common Law.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that at this point of the Bill he wished to submit to the Attorney General that this clause might, with great advantage, be omitted. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) should like to see the hon. and learned Gentleman take up to-day the attitude he (Lord Randolph Churchill) so much deprecated in him last night. The hon. and learned Gentleman had provided a maximum of expenditure for counties and for boroughs, and he ought to do all in his power to economize that maximum. If they allowed claims to be made, candidates would have to meet them, whether they liked it or not. He (Lord Randolph Churchill) was particularly interested in this clause, because, although he did not represent a county, he would like the Attorney General to put Woodstock in the County Schedule. The professed object of the Bill was to discourage extravagant expenditure at election times; but he feared that if this section were allowed to stand as now framed the candidate would find himself beset with people who wished to be appointed sub-agents. People would come to him and say—"I see you have power to appoint a sub-agent in my district. Will you appoint me? If you do not, you will regret it." It would be of great service to the candidate if he could say—"Yes; a sub-agent in your district would be very convenient, and I should like to appoint a sub-agent there; but it is not allowed." All these provisions were made for the case of honest candidates; but where they had dishonest candidates, they might depend upon it that those sub-agents were loop-holes for illegal payments. He hoped the Attorney General would give good reason for this clause before it was passed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if, in counties, they only allowed one election agent, it would be simply impossible for him to perform all the duties required of him. In many counties there were so many districts that it was essentially necessary that there should be a certain amount of sub-agents. District boroughs might be taken out of this section if it was thought necessary. This was a general section dealing with counties altogether, and he thought that if they did not allow for sub-agents great inconvenience would ensue.

MR. BRINTON sympathized with the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) very strongly on this point, for he felt that candidates would often be asked to allow the performance of perfectly unnecessary services. He (Mr. Brinton) should be glad if the Attorney General would define between the unnecessary retention of sub-agents in boroughs, even if he allowed a certain number of sub-agents in counties.

MR. RYLANDS said, his hon. Friend the Member for Kidderminster (Mr. Brinton) was under a little mistake. The present clause did not apply to boroughs. As he (Mr. Rylands) understood the Attorney General, the appointment of sub-agents was provided for in this clause, in consequence of the pressure put upon the Government by county Members generally. He (Mr. Rylands) had not heard, however, a single county Member say that he wished to have this clause. As he read the clause, a sub-agent might be appointed for each polling district. Would the Attorney General, who might be taken as an authority upon the subject, say whether he had ever found, in his Parliamentary electioneering experience, that men were so willing or anxious to assist a candidate for love of their Party that the candidate, entering upon the career of a contested election, did not find a difficulty in resisting the pressure of persons who desired to become paid sub-agents? He (Mr. Rylands) believed it would be found that sub-agents mostly would not be necessarily solicitors. In many cases the sub-agents appointed would be the most active partizans in the different polling districts, and they would expect to be paid for their services. They might possibly get some volunteers; but, as a rule, in counties partizans wished to render assistance in return for some consideration or other. County Members under this clause would receive applications from each of the polling districts that a sub-agent should be appointed with a fee, it might be an attorney, or it might be a very different class of person who would seek employment under this provision. It appeared to him (Mr. Rylands) that it was not at all necessary to have sub-agents in each polling district. It might be necessary to have two or three in a large constituency; but under the Attorney General's clause pressure would, undoubtedly, be put upon candidates to appoint a very much larger number of sub-agents than were absolutely required; and, in his opinion, if there could be some check placed upon this measure, county Members would find it of great advantage.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) had made suggestions which, if acted upon, would indefinitely delay the progress of the Bill, for he had insisted that those who were in favour of the Bill should speak on all clauses, as well as those who opposed it. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), and he presumed many other county Members, had held their tongues, because they had been satisfied, because they believed it was absolutely necessary for the proper conduct and management of county elections—counties which were larger than Woodstock—that there should be a provision made for the appointment of sub-agents in the different centres of population, and possibly in every polling district. He should be sorry to undertake a contested election, unless he had the power to appoint a sub-agent in every polling district. Without such agents, there would be, in his opinion, great mismanagement, and a great danger of practices which would bring one within the penal provisions of the Bill. He hoped the Attorney General would adhere to the clause.

MR. O'KELLY said, he did not see how, if they were to have sub-agents at all, they could avoid having one in each polling district. He, however, thought it would be very desirable if some provision were inserted in the Bill fixing the remuneration of sub-agents, making the remuneration as low as possible, because every county Member would be exposed to very severe black mail, unless there was some such provision. The Government ought to give some assurance to the Committee that some provision of the kind would be made.

COLONEL NOLAN asked for a declaration of opinion from the hon. and learned Attorney General that the polling agent would not be a sub-agent.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was clear a polling agent would not be a sub-agent.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR remarked, that this question was one chiefly for county Members themselves, and they were responsible for this clause. He did not think that Members who represented borough constituencies had much interest in the clause. It was with that view that he called the Attorney General's attention to the clause before the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was considered. He (Mr. A. O'Connor) was sure that this clause, as it stood, would entail upon candidates very serious responsibilities, and that the subject which the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) had raised was worthy of consideration.

MR. GORST reminded the Committee that the places in which district agents might be appointed included all the Welsh boroughs and Scotch boroughs, except the few which were not district boroughs.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if there was any question as to whether this power of appointing sub-agents should apply to district boroughs it would be easy to provide a different Schedule, so as to include or exclude such boroughs. They could easily say—"For the purposes of this 19th section, such and such Schedule shall not apply."

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, there was one point which he thought might be very conveniently noticed on this clause. It was one to which he called the attention of the Attorney General last year, and it was that there was no definition of the clause to constitute a polling district in a county. It was an important point, for this reason. The number of polling districts in a county were to be regulated by the magistrates, and the number of sub-agents were to be according to the number of the polling places; therefore, the magistrates of a county would really have the power to decide how many sub-agents a candidate might or might not have. He (Lord George Hamilton) thought that some directions should be given to the magistrates, so that when they came to divide a county into polling districts they might know what the wish of the Legislature was—that, in fact, they might give a polling place to so many thousands of electors. As it stood at present, they would find the local authorities in different places arriving at the most conflicting conclusions. In some counties it would happen that there would be more than sufficient sub-agents; while in other counties candidates had not as many sub-agents as they really required. He (Lord George Hamilton) hoped the Attorney General would consider the matter.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the point raised by the noble Lord would be more properly raised on the Ballot Act Continuance and Amendment Bill. This was not quite a question for a Corrupt Practices Bill, though it did indirectly arise on this clause. He (the Attorney General) might point out that a sub-agent could only act within the particular district for which he was appointed; and he thought they might take it for granted that polling districts were only created where a certain number of electors were congregated. They must trust to the magistrates, to some extent, as to the selection of the areas which should have polling stations. He was sure that his right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke) would do all he could to consider the point when the Ballot Bill was brought on for consideration.

MR. MAPPIN asked if it was intended to include the boroughs named in the First Schedule—namely, East Retford, Shoreham, Cricklade, Much Wenlock, and Aylesbury in the clause?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had just addressed the Committee in respect of those typical boroughs, and he had said that if it was the view of the Committee that they should have a separate subsection he would provide for it.

MR. MAPPIN understood that the Members who represented those boroughs did not wish to have a separate section.

MR. BIGGAR said, there was another point to which he would like the Attorney General to turn his attention. His hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Mayne) had an Amendment on the Paper to insert, after the word "day," in line 1, page 9, the words "following the day." The object of his hon. Friend in this Amendment would seem to be that, supposing a contest was not expected in a borough until the eve of the nomination day, it would be inconvenient for a candidate off-hand to give the names of his sub-agents. The suggestion of the hon. Gentleman was that in a case of that sort a candidate should be allowed the succeeding day on which he could give notice to the Returning Officer. It was a heavy job to drive over a whole county, and to make the appointment of sub-agents. He (Mr. Biggar) would like to know from the Attorney General whether it would not be desirable, at a future stage of the Bill, to increase the time beyond the day of nomination during which notice could be given to the Returning Officer of the names of the sub-agents; and he would also like the hon. and learned Gentleman to give a reply to the question asked by the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly)—namely, as to the desirability of a provision fixing the maximum remuneration to be paid to sub-agents and other persons employed under the Bill.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that, in respect of the Amendment which stood in the name of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Mayne), he had, of course, considered it. In the first place, the day of nomination was always a certain number of days after the issuing of the Writ; and if they agreed to this Amendment it was possible that an election agent need not be appointed until the polling was over. As to the fixing of remuneration of agents, it stood to reason that the payment must be in accordance with the amount of work done, and in consideration of the person who did it. He (the Attorney General) hardly thought it would be right to lay down a hard-and-fast line of payment without considering who the agents were, and what the work was they had to do.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 21 (Making of contracts through election agents).

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he did not see the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General present, and as he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had an Amendment on the Paper to this clause, which no one could answer except the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, he had no other course to pursue than to move to report Progress.

MR. R. N. FOWLER, rising to Order, asked if it was in accordance with the usual practice of the House for a right hon. Gentleman to apply to remarks made by another right hon. Gentleman such words as "rubbish, stuff?"

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, perhaps he might be allowed to ask, as a private conversation had been overheard and attention had been called to it, if it was in Order for a right hon. Gentleman to say, in the presence of the Solicitor General, that no one could answer a legal point but the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General?

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that what he had stated was that no one could answer the Amendment he was about to propose except the hon. and learned Gentleman in charge of the Bill. He heard the remarks which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board; and he thought that if the right hon. Gentleman could offer no better argument than was conveyed in such words he had better hold his peace. With regard to this Amendment, which was, to a certain extent, consequential upon one which was not moved last night owing to exceptional circumstances, he had to say that it enabled him to call the Attorney General's attention to a very important matter; and he was now anxious to ascertain whether the hon. and learned Gentleman would not, on Report, consent to introduce words which would carry out the principle which he had ventured to adopt in his Amendment? It would be observed that at the present moment the election agent of a candidate was the only person who could, by himself or by his sub-agent, hire a committee room; the clause, in fact, ran thus—

"The election agent of a candidate by himself or by his sub-agent shall appoint every polling agent, clerk, and messenger employed for payment on behalf of the candidate at an election, and hire every committee room hired on behalf of the candidate."

They knew very well that there was a long discussion yesterday upon the question as to whether or not a committee room could be engaged in a certain place; and he was not going for one moment to revive that discussion, or refer to any of the reasons which were given for pressing the question upon the attention of the Government. As the Attorney General, however, had shown himself very conciliatory in conducting this Bill through Committee, he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) desired to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he would undertake hereafter, if he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) withdrew the Amendment which now stood in his name, to vest power in the Returning Officer to allow committee rooms in public-houses under certain circumstances? That was the sole question he now wished to place before the hon. and learned Gentleman; because, having had a long experience himself in electioneering matters, not only in boroughs, but in counties, it seemed to him desirable, not only in the interest of the candidates, but in the interest of the cheapness of elections, that there might be power vested in the highest authority—namely, the Returning Officer—to say what rooms in some of the prohibited places might, under proper supervision, and under circumstances which, by no reasonable man, would be considered objectionable, might be used as committee rooms? He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) did not intend to carry his Amendment to a Division; indeed, after the Attorney General had given his reply, he should ask leave to withdraw it. He would now, however, formally move the Amendment which stood in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 28, after the word "election," to insert the words "the choice and hiring of committee rooms shall rest with or require the approval of the Returning Officer, the only premises legally disqualified being those specified in Section forty-six." — (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he hoped his right hon. and learned Friend would not think it disrespectful to him if he (the Solicitor General) answered the question. He (Sir Farrer Herschell) and his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had consulted about this clause, and, therefore, he was quite prepared to deal with the Amendment. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) would remember that this question was somewhat dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) last night on the point, for he referred to the possibility of no other rooms, except those in public-houses, being available for committee rooms; and the Government then stated that they would consider whether it was possible to invest power in some responsible person. It was pointed out that the Returning Officer was an objectionable person to leave such a matter to, because he was sometimes a partizan. ["Oh!"] At all events, objection was taken to the Returning Officer dealing with such matters, as he could not always be regarded as an impartial person. The Returning Officer might be suspected of partiality, and that was the reason why they could not accept the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire. He (Sir Farrer Herschell) was afraid that the proper person to entrust with such power had not yet been suggested; at all events, he thought the right hon. Gentleman himself would, on reflection, conclude that the Returning Officer could not have such power placed in his hand.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he hoped the Government would give their best consideration to this subject, because obviously there were many points which might be settled if an impartial person could only be found to deal with them. He (Mr. R. N. Fowler) dared say the Government were right in thinking that the Mayor of the borough was not the proper person; because, as the Solicitor General had just pointed out, a Mayor frequently was a partizan. If an impartial person could only be found it would be of the greatest possible advantage.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he understood the Solicitor General to say that the principle of the Amendment which he had placed upon the Paper was under the consideration of the Government. He had previously understood the Government to say that, although the Returning Officer was not a suitable person in their opinion, if an authority in whom to invest the proposed power was not found, they would consider whether they could not find some authority, or some person, whose functions might not expose him to objection.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, what he had stated was, that if the right hon. Gentleman opposite would endeavour to find such a person, and make the proposal with regard to the matter when they came to a subsequent part of the Bill, the Government would be very pleased to consider it.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that, as far as at present advised, the hon. and learned Gentleman intended to oppose such a proposal.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that when they knew what the proposal was, of course they would consider it. They could not oppose it until they knew what it was.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had understood the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to say he would oppose the application of any room in a public-house or hotel for the purposes of the committee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had said that he would see if he could not find some suitable person in whom the authority could be placed; and he (the Attorney General), on behalf of the Government, had promised to consider the subject when it was re-introduced. He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) would allow him to wait until the proposition was made in a proper form.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MACFARLANE said, that, in the absence of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), he would move the Amendment which stood in his name—namely, in page 9, line 31, after the first “or,” to leave out “in connection with or incidental to,” and insert “in respect of.” [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) nodded assent.] He inferred from the action of the Attorney General that he meant to accept the Amendment; and, therefore, he would not trouble the Committee with any further remarks.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 31, after the first “or,” to leave out “in connection with or incidental to,” and insert “in respect of.”—(Mr. Macfarlane.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he accepted the Amendment; in fact, it was necessary, in consequence of previous Amendments. Indeed, he wished to go further—namely, to strike out the words “in connection with or incidental to,” and insert “in respect of the conduct or management of.”

MR. MACFARLANE asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed,

In page 9, line 31, after the first “or,” to leave out “in connection with or incidental to,” and insert “in respect of the conduct or management of.”—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 22 (Payment of expenses through election agent).

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that this Amendment was consequential upon an Amendment he previously moved. The object of that Amendment really was to see what could be done for those persons who were outside the constituency. He moved that Amendment formally when they were discussing an earlier clause on the 2nd of this month. He would now move his Amendment formally, with the object of ascertaining what proposition the Government had upon the point. The Government had said that upon Clause 22 they would bring up words to meet the view he had taken.

Amendment proposed, in page 9, line 41, after "candidate," insert "or any other person."—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, the Amendment which the right hon. Gentleman moved upon a previous occasion was to meet the practice of sending down to boroughs irresponsible persons for the sole purpose of corrupting the constituencies. He (the Attorney General) entirely agreed with the right hon. Gentleman's views. On the 2nd of July he (the Attorney General) said he would see what could be done to meet the right hon. Gentleman's views to the extent he had placed them before the Committee. After having considered the subject, he had come to the conclusion that it was impossible to find better words to carry the right hon. Gentleman's object into effect than the words of the right hon. Gentleman himself. They might by simple means accomplish a great object; and, although those words were short and simple, he (the Attorney General) really could find no better words to express the meaning intended. They would bring within the net—within which they wished to bring any of those irresponsible persons sent down with the sole object of corrupting constituencies—they would bring such persons within the operation of the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) reverted to the Amendment which, though standing in the name of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), was moved by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane). The same words occurred in page 10, lines 1 and 2. He (the Attorney General) presumed they must follow the same words. He had, therefore, to move to strike out, in lines 1 and 2, "in connection with or incidental to," and insert "in respect of the conduct and management of."

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, lines 1 and 2, to leave out the words "in connection with or incidental to," and insert the words "in respect of the conduct and management of."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MACFARLANE pointed out that the same words occurred in line 8.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 8, to leave out the words "in connection with or incidental to," and insert the words "in respect of the conduct and management of."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) called the attention of the Committee, and especially the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross), to a consequential Amendment which was necessary upon the insertion of the words, "or any other person," because those words would include the Returning Officer. It appeared, therefore, to him (the Attorney General) that they ought in line 11 to say—

"Provided that this section shall not be deemed to apply to any payment made by the Returning Officer or to any."

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 11, after the word "apply," insert "to any payment made by the Returning Officer or."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, there was just one other point he wished to bring under the notice of the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General); but it was an important point. Assuming that an outside Association had certain persons in its employ to whom it paid a salary, say, of £100 or £200 a-year, those were the people who might be sent down to corrupt constituencies. Here was payment made to them on account of the election; because, whatever they might do at an election, though it might be illegal, they would be compensated in the ordinary salary they got as the agents of an Association elsewhere. Although he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was satisfied that the words he had proposed would meet the case of a person who was specially sent down to an election, and specially paid for any service he rendered at the election, he was not at all clear that they would meet the case he now instanced. If the Attorney General desired it, however, he was quite content to leave the matter for further consideration.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not think that the words previously adopted would meet such a case now cited by the right hon. Gentleman; and in his (the Attorney General's) opinion it would be difficult to find words to cover such a case. If, however, a man, no matter from wherever he came from, committed an illegal practice, they must deal with him as they found him. The thing seemed a difficulty of substance more than of drafting. He should be pleased to discuss the matter with the right hon. Gentleman in any way he chose.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he would bring up a new clause on the subject.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he had guarded against a collusive intrusion from outside; but let them take the case, for instance, of the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Attorney General) himself. The hon. and learned Gentleman was an avowed opponent of Women's Suffrage. Supposing he stood for Taunton again, and a candidate stood against him who was a supporter of Women's Suffrage, the maximum amount which his hon. and learned Friend could spend was specified in the Bill. The maximum amount that his opponent could spend was also specified in the Bill; but there was nothing whatever to prevent the Women's Suffrage Committee sending down a person which should hold meetings and should placard the town, advising the people to vote for Brown, Jones, or Robinson, as against the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. Now, under such circumstances as those, it was perfectly certain that the Attorney General would suffer great damage, most improperly and most unfairly, whilst his opponent would have the unlimited resources of the Society for the support of Women's Suffrage, and he would also be allowed to spend the maximum allowed under the Bill. That appeared to him (Mr. W. H. Smith) a course which ought not to be adopted under the Bill; but, so far as he could see, it was perfectly open for anybody to take that course. He ventured to say, on a former occasion, that there would be sent down to constituencies, in times of an election, the representatives of any number of Associations and Societies to promote their own particular objects; and, unless a candidate could accept them all, and swallow them all, he would be in great danger of being opposed by them—opposed by a candidate who would have the support of the Associations and Societies in question. He thought the Attorney General himself ought to find some means of dealing with cases of that kind.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the very pleasing reference he had made to him. If he could deal with the case as the right hon. Gentleman had suggested, he should be glad to do so. In his election, in 1873, all that the right hon. Gentleman had described really occurred. The Women's Suffrage Committee opposed him in every way they could; but he thought that the consequence of their act ought not to fall upon his opponent. ["Oh, oh!"] In his opinion, it would be very hard that all the money the Women's Suffrage Committee spent should be treated as part of the candidate's expenditure. Personally, he (the Attorney General) was treated as a very objectionable person by the ladies composing the Committee; and he had no doubt that they would try to keep him out of Parliament for any constituency whatever. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had, however, not contemplated such a case as that. He had dealt with the case of men who received a stated salary from Associations, and who got no actual money for any particular services rendered at an election. He should like, if he could, to stop all that expenditure going into election warfare, from whatever direction it came ; but he doubted very much whether such an object could be accomplished.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the more the subject was discussed the more necessary it was that the matter should be met. The Amendment which he had put down on the Paper to this clause, and which had been accepted, was to the effect that any person employed by or in receipt of a salary from a political or other Association outside a constituency in which the election took place, should be considered as engaged or employed for payment if he acted under such employment for the purpose of promoting, or procuring, or opposing the election of a particular candidate. He was not prepared to say whether the payment should be considered as payment by the candidate, because it would be difficult to trace it to the candidate ; but it ought to be an illegal practice, no matter by whom the payment was made. They were hampering the hands of a candidate in every way, and prohibiting him expending beyond a certain sum of money. What a candidate had only to do if he wished to evade the section was to write up to some Association and get that Association to work his election. It would thus be seen that they were handicapping an honest candidate to an extent of which they had no conception. It must be remembered that they were not passing a law for good men, but for bad men ; and the moment that Act became law, it would be taken up by some people in the country to see how they could get out of it. The first thing they would do would be to see how a candidate should spend nothing, and how some Association in Birmingham, or London, or Manchester, could go down, spend money, and work the election for them. That was really the thing they had to meet. It was a matter of vital importance to the Bill ; and although he thought the words which the Attorney General had accepted met the case to a certain extent, so far as direct payment went, they would not meet the case of people who were not directly paid. He should, therefore, raise the question by a new clause. He hoped the Attorney General realized the force of the observations he had made, and that when the Committee came to consider the new clauses they would be fully prepared to deal with this matter.

The Attorney General

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he fully saw the importance of the matter. They, however, could not help people who took an interest in national questions raising their voices in any particular constituency. As the right hon. Gentleman was going to bring up the question in the form of a new clause, would it not be well to have only one discussion upon it?

MR. ONSLOW said, this was a serious matter, and the Attorney General had given them no definite promise that he would bring up a clause himself on the subject. He (Mr. Onslow) did not think the question ought to be slighted in this way. There was an Association which many Gentlemen on the Ministerial side of the House thought ought not to be formed. He believed many hon. Gentlemen opposite had nothing to do with the Association, and certainly they on the Opposition side of the House had the greatest repugnance to it—he meant the Birmingham Caucus. Now, the Birmingham Caucus was a rich Association, and it might send down its representatives to any borough at the time of an election and simply flood it with money. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL dissented.] The Solicitor General shook his head ; but not a penny of the money sent down by the Caucus would be included in the expenses of the candidate—it would not be paid by himself or by his agent, but by the Central Association. He (Mr. Onslow) would take another case. He himself would, no doubt, be opposed strongly at the next Election by the Anti-Liquor Association, and that Association was, as everyone knew, exceedingly rich ; there were thousands and thousands of pounds coming into the coffers of that Association, and he believed it would be considered worth while to send to every constituency gentlemen to speak on public platforms against any particular individual who held views different to theirs. No doubt, in support of a candidate who approved of its views, the Association would send down their men and their money ; and, unless there was some safeguard to prevent such a thing being done, there would be an enormous amount of money spent by particular individuals of whom the Associations, Liberal or Conservative, in the constituency knew nothing. A constituency would be flooded with money, and therefore there would be any amount of bribery committed by the Association, and yet there would be no means of preventing it. It seemed ludicrous that such a state of things should be allowed. The Attorney General had said—"I will see if I can bring up another clause." They must press this matter on the Attorney General, because they did not intend to be flooded by Birmingham Caucuses. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had said he would bring forward some clause to that effect. Let them see what this clause was. ["Hear, hear!"] It was all very well for the Attorney General to say "Hear, hear!" but the Committee ought, on this occasion, to insist upon the Attorney General meeting them fairly upon this point. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would give the Committee a more definite promise than he had done that he would bring up a clause.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he was afraid that the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) was not aware of the alteration which had been made in the clause by the acceptance of the Amendment of the right hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross). The clause would now meet all cases, whether connected with the Birmingham Caucus or anything else; but the case which the hon. Gentleman desired to meet was that of salaried officers, for whom no payment was made in respect of an election, and who made no payments themselves, being sent into the constituencies by the Caucus or other Associations. That was a much more limited question, and the last objection was already met by the Amendment which had been accepted.

MR. ONSLOW remarked, that the practice now was to send down a man two or three days before the election, who went Heaven knew where and committed all sorts of illegal practices.

MR. W. H. JAMES said, he thought it was not necessary to prolong the discussion of the clause by raising questions with regard to the Birmingham Caucus. He would, however, take advantage of the discussion to draw the attention of his hon. and learned Friend to another point. There were a great many persons who had a close connection with the Press of the Metropolis, and of the different centres of England. It was quite possible for certain statements to be made by means of the Press which caluminated and misrepresented the acts of a candidate, and such statements would go through the whole of the borough. It was altogether impossible for the candidate to contradict such statements, unless he used placards, or took some course of a similar nature. The candidate would desire that the true state of the facts should be placed before the electors; but it might be reported to him by his agent that he was not able to spend any money in sending out placards or handbills without exceeding the maximum expenditure specified in the Schedule.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that was a question which would not come under this provision at all. The present clause provided only that all payments should be made through the election agent.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS remarked, that what the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) had said was pure nonsense, and the hon. Member could not have been attending to the debates which had taken place. The Committee would remember that when they were discussing the 7th clause he (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had submitted an Amendment which he withdrew at the time, for the express purpose of raising it again on the 22nd clause. An Amendment on the 14th clause was also withdrawn on the same understanding; and now, when they had reached Clause 22, to say that the Committee must not discuss it was a proposition he, for one, would not stand, and he would not permit such a statement as that which the hon. Member for Gateshead had made to go forth without resenting it.

MR. WARTON said, he was of opinion that if the Committee wished to get through this Bill in reasonable time it was not desirable that the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James) should convert himself into a sort of censor, and dictate how many times every hon. Member was to speak. He (Mr. Warton) should certainly express his opinions without any regard to the feeling of the hon. Member for Gateshead, or anybody else. The question now before the Committee was a very important one, and it was closely connected with another important matter to which, in all probability, the Government proposed by-and-bye to give the go bye—namely, the Amendment which appeared on the Paper in the name of the right hon. Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke) to try all these illegal practices on the spot. If they really desired to put a stop to illegal practices on the part of agents, they could only do it by inflicting severe punishment then and there. These two questions were of great importance; and if the Government wished to be practical, and were sincere in their desire to put down bribery and corruption, the only way to do it was to have a tribunal on the spot, which should punish at once all persons who could be proved to have engaged in acts of corruption. He felt deeply the able manner in which the Attorney General had conducted the consideration of the Bill; but he thought that those who aspired to be statesmen should have adequate means of carrying out what they desired to enact. It was a somewhat undignified position for the hon. and learned Gentleman to be compelled to get up day after day and say that there were provisions which he would like to pass, but he was utterly unable to know how to pass them. It was the duty of the hon. and learned Gentleman to find out a way, and the first thing he ought to do was to constitute a tribunal which would have power to prevent this kind of action, and to punish all illegal practices on the spot. In his (Mr. Warton's) opinion, one of the great evils of the present day was the existence of any political Associations at all. There were Associations established in connection with every possible "fad" or fancy; and the object of all the little bands of fanatics which existed throughout the Kingdom, whether women or temperance people, was to obtain for their opinions unfair weight. They tried unjustly to turn the scale, and to make their petty "fads" and fancies rule the election. That was their object, and in endeavouring to carry it out they stuck at nothing. They sent out hired agitation all over the country to misrepresent their opponents; and his own opinion was that any person who was not a candidate, or an elector, or an agent, ought not to be permitted to take part in an election at all. It was these outsiders who came into a constituency and put tyrannical pressure upon the candidate. When he

(Mr. Warton) was a candidate he received all kinds of letters to know whether he would vote for this object or the other, but he thought it due to the respect he owed towards himself not to answer any one of them. He treated all of them with the contempt they deserved, and he regretted that so many hon. Members were weak-minded enough to pay attention to them. He thought that strangers ought not to be allowed to interfere with the progress of any election, and he should like to see these hireling lecturers sent to prison as misdemeanants.

MR. BIGGAR asked if a candidate could be his own agent for election expenses, or if it was absolutely necessary that payment should be made through a third person?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Committee had already inserted an Amendment in Clause 17, which allowed every candidate to be his own agent for the election expenses.

MR. BIGGAR said, that was what he understood; but he wanted to make the matter perfectly sure.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 23 (Period for sending in claims and making payments for election expenses).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was prepared to accept an Amendment in line 21 of this clause—namely, to leave out the words "in connection with or incidental to an election," in order to substitute the words "in respect of the conduct or the management of an election."

Question, "That the words, 'in connection with or incidental to' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived."

Question "That the words 'in respect of the conduct or management of' be inserted after the word 'or,'" put, and agreed to.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that on behalf of his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope) he would move the Amendment which stood on the Paper in his hon. Friend's name, the object of which was to omit from the clause the words "except when less than twenty shillings." It was impossible during the hurry of an election to get a bill or receipt made out for accounts of less than 20s.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 22, to leave out "except when less than twenty shillings."—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Amendment was part of a series of Amendments, and these words would have to go out of the clause if the Attorney General accepted the Amendment as a whole.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he fully understood the object of the Amendment; but he thought the Committee might be embarrassed by accepting it now. He was willing to accept an Amendment to the 1st sub-section, which would have the effect of raising the amount required to be vouched in respect of any expense incurred by an election agent from 20s. to 40s.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that, in that case, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Question proposed, "That the Amendment, by leave, be withdrawn."

MR. BIGGAR asked what position a candidate would be in who received a cheque? Would he have to go to the party who sent the cheque and get a receipt; and if a Post Office order was sent instead of a cheque, how would the candidate be situated?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he did not quite understand the point raised by the hon. Member. The receipt attached to Post Office orders would be the voucher. Anything that showed that the money had been paid would be sufficient, and if a receipt was not forthcoming the Judge would receive evidence that the money had been paid. He did not think that any practical danger was to be apprehended.

MR. BIGGAR said, the difficulty arose in this way. Persons might be employed to make payments, and hon. Members knew very well that all sorts of people put in claims on the pretence that they had made payments. And then, again, it was possible that persons would receive money and give no receipt of any sort in the expectation of extorting more money out of the candidate. He thought these were matters which the Bill ought to remedy.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) moved, in line 22, to leave out the word "twenty," in order to insert the word "forty."

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he had next to propose, in lines 25 and 26, to strike out the words "in connection with or incidental to," in order to insert the words "in respect of the conduct or management of."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that before that Amendment was put, he wished to object to Sub-section 2 altogether. What occurred to him was that this was one of those enactments which might be easily evaded. The sub-section said—

"Every claim against a candidate at an election or his election agent in respect of any expenses incurred on account of or in connection with or incidental to such election which is not sent in to the election agent within the time limited by this Act shall be barred and shall not be paid, and an election agent who pays a claim in contravention of this enactment shall be guilty of an illegal practice."

He did not see much use in putting those words into an Act of Parliament, because the candidate would have to make a declaration at the end which ought to cover all these things. If a man sought to evade the Act, of course he would not be debarred by the declaration. What, then, was the use of putting in a clause of that kind, when it was impossible to detect whether there had been payments made after the proper time or not? Such claims would afterwards be settled in a way that no person could possibly detect. It also struck him that the sub-section might work somewhat unjustly, because there might be cases in which ignorant people would be put to a great disadvantage if the Act said their claims should be barred and should not be paid, or that if they were paid the candidate or election agent, who paid them in contravention of the Act, should be guilty of an illegal practice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he did not quite understand the objection of the noble Lord to the claim being barred and the debt not being paid. The object of the sub-section was to prevent claims from coming in after the election. It was constantly found that applications for services rendered during an election contest were sent in long after the election was over; and it was just as well to enable the candidate or his agent to reply to such claims—"I cannot pay them because they are barred." The noble Lord said that might be an injustice. He (the Attorney General) quite admitted that there might be cases where there would be a bond fide claim, and he had drawn Sub-section 9 of the clause in order to meet such cases. That sub-section was as follows:—

"On cause shown to the satisfaction of the High Court, such Court, on application by the claimant or by the candidate or his election agent, may by order give leave for the payment of the said sum, or the issue of the said execution, and further may by order give leave for the payment by a candidate or his election agent of a disputed claim, or of a claim for any such expenses as aforesaid, although sent in after the time in this section mentioned for sending in claims, or although the same was sent in to the candidate and not to the election agent."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, that a creditor whose account was only 5s. might not think it worth while to send it in within the time specified by the Act.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it would make people more careful to send in their claims within a reasonable time. If they did not choose to do so, then they must put up with the consequences. If the sum was small the loss would be small, and would not be worth fighting for.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON asked if the clause meant something stronger than the present Statute of Limitations? Would a man who felt that a claim was just and due, and considered himself bound to pay it, come within the operation of the clause? He remembered cases in which claims were barred by law; but, notwithstanding, they were paid because they were considered to be just. If a candidate considered he was under a moral obligation to satisfy a claim, was he to be prevented by this clause from paying such claim?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if a candidate was of opinion that he was under a moral obligation to pay a claim, all he had to do under Sub-section 9 was to make an application to the High Court; and on cause being shown to the satisfaction of the High Court, on application by the claimant, or by the candidate, or his election agent, an order might be given for leave to satisfy the claim.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the Committee that there is no Question before the House.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) moved, in lines 25 and 26, to leave out the words "in connection with or incidental to," in order to insert the words "in respect of the conduct or management of."

Amendment agreed to.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he had an Amendment upon the Paper, which he thought would come next. He proposed, in line 29, to leave out the words "be guilty of an illegal practice," in order to insert the words "on summary conviction be liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds." He presumed that that was an Amendment which the Attorney General would accept, because there was an obvious oversight in the clause. It was enacted that—

"Every claim against a candidate at an election or his election agent in respect of any expenses incurred on account of or in connection with or incidental to such election, which is not sent in to the election agent within the time limited by this Act, shall be barred and shall not be paid, and an election agent who pays a claim in contravention of this enactment shall be guilty of an illegal practice."

What would be the result if a candidate had a difference with the election agent, and the two came to loggerheads? All the agent would have to do would be to spend a little more money after the time fixed by the Act, and then the candidate might be unseated. It could not possibly be the intention of the Government that such a penalty should be embodied in an Act of Parliament, and therefore he proposed to leave out the words "be guilty of an illegal practice," and to simply render the agent subject to the penalty which ran all through the Bill—namely, that on summary conviction he should pay a fine not exceeding £100.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 29, leave out from "be," to end of sub-section, and insert "on summary conviction be liable to a fine not exceeding one hundred pounds."—(Lord George Hamilton.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought he had already met the proposal of the noble Lord by providing in Clause 9 what the punishment should be on a conviction for an illegal practice. He thought he had met every suggestion the noble Lord made in regard to the clause. He had also dealt with it in Clauses 26 and 27, which were intended to meet this very case. In Sub-section 5 of Clause 26, it was provided—

"If, without such authorised excuse as in this Act mentioned, a candidate or an election agent fail to comply with the requirements of this section, he shall be guilty of an illegal practice. Provided that such failure on the part of the election agent without the knowledge and consent of the candidate shall not render the candidate liable to any greater incapacity than that to which he is liable for an illegal practice committed by his agent without his knowledge and consent."

He had further provided in Sub-section 6—

"That a false declaration by the election agent, without the knowledge and consent of the candidate, shall not render the candidate liable to any other incapacity than that of his election being void."

Still further, in Clause 27, there was this provision—

"If the candidate applies to the High Court, and shows that the failure to transmit such return and declarations, or any of them, or any part thereof, or any error therein, has arisen by reason of his illness, or of the absence, death, illness, or misconduct of his election agent, or sub-agent, or of any clerk or officer of such agent, or by reason of inadvertence or of any reasonable cause of a like nature, and not by reason of any want of good faith on the part of the applicant, &c."

He thought that these two clauses, taken together, would give sufficient protection to the candidate. If he accepted the Amendment of the noble Lord, the election agent might set the whole of the law at defiance, and might break it with the deliberate intention of breaking it. If they made the election agent a person who was to be selected by the candidate himself, of course he was under the immediate command of the candidate, who was bound to exercise proper discretion in the selection he made; but, having made a selection, he must see that the law was carried out, and must be answerable for the due performance of all his duties by his agent. If the Amendment were adopted the position would be this. If the election agent spent £5,000, instead of £500, there would be a means of evading the law by holding over the payment until after the date fixed in the Act; and by the Amendment they would be simply giving a licence to the election agent to exceed the legitimate expenditure. For this reason he could not accept the Amendment of the noble Lord; but he would put it to the Committee whether it was not a sufficient remedy to provide that if the candidate was able to show that there had been misconduct upon the part of the agent, the penalty should not rest upon him, nor would the penalty attach to him for the acts of a traitor?

MR. GORST understood the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) to object to the last words of the section, which made the agent who paid a claim in contravention of the Act guilty of an illegal practice. He further understood the noble Lord to wish to substitute a fine of £100. [Lord GEORGE HAMILTON said that was so.] He desired to point out to the noble Lord that an Amendment of that nature was scarcely necessary. No doubt, the proposal contained in it was a very proper one; but it had already been provided, by Clause 9, that a person guilty of an illegal practice should be liable to a fine on summary conviction not exceeding £100.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he proposed to strike out the words "an illegal practice."

MR. GORST said, he was perfectly aware of that; but the noble Lord practically left the clause one to provide that the agent paying any claim that was barred should be guilty of an illegal practice; and if he looked back to Clause 9, he would see that everybody who was guilty of an illegal practice was liable to pay a fine of £100. Clause 22 said that if an election agent paid a claim in contravention of the Act he was guilty of an illegal practice, and Clause 9 provided that every person who was guilty of an illegal practice should be liable to a fine not exceeding £100.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS wished to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman that the Amendment proposed to strike out the words "an illegal practice."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL suggested that words might be inserted in the Bill to determine that after the time fixed for the payment of claims the services of the election agent should cease. That would at once keep the matter distinct, because the person who paid the claim would have ceased to be the agent for the election, and if he was no longer the election agent his acts could not affect the candidate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the important point in the Amendment of the noble Lord was that it would leave this loophole open—that an agent guilty of an illegal practice would have nothing to do but to pay a fine of £100.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, the clause, as it stood, placed it in the power of an election agent to present a Petition against the candidate.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the noble Lord would see that it was in the power of every agent to present a Petition.

MR. GIBSON said, that although he was inclined, on the whole, to be satisfied with the explanation of the Attorney General as to the object of the Amendment, he thought the proposal of his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) a reasonable one. What was the Amendment of his noble Friend, which was presented very concisely to the Committee? It applied to the election agent who paid a claim in contravention of the Act—that was outside the time required, but it might be within the limit allowed for the payment of election expenses, and therefore the agent would simply commit a technical error, because he would still be making a payment within the legal limit of the election expenses allowed by the Act—if the agent did that outside the time fixed by this clause, not only would he incur punishment upon himself, but the act he had done might affect the seat, and subject the candidate to serious consequences on account of the illegal act of the agent. Surely that would be a monstrous injustice, and he trusted that the question would be fully discussed, so that the Committee might understand it thoroughly before they passed from it. He would not take the conduct of an election agent, done in a hurry, or in consequence of a slip, or some other inadvertence, nor would he take the case of an election agent who acted through treachery. He would pass by all those points, and apply himself to the case of an election agent who, knowing what the section was, deliberately violated a statutory enactment, but did so in a way which would probably happen in many cases—namely, that although it was wrong undoubtedly to violate an Act of Parliament, still the act of violation brought about no corruption. The election agent would not have paid any corrupt charge, or any charge in excess of the maximum expenditure fixed by the Schedule of the Bill, but he would have been paying a perfectly fair charge, which he knew to be a fair charge, and he would probably know equally well that he was paying it after the time fixed in the Act, and subject his principal to the full penalty of having committed an illegal practice, not by himself, but by his agent. If that consequence could be worked out—and he saw no escape from it—the Attorney General was not in a position to point to chapter and verse, in any of the clauses of the Act, which would enable a tribunal to free the candidate from this monstrous injustice. He (Mr. Gibson) could not imagine any topic more deserving of the close and careful consideration of the Committee. He had carefully examined all the clauses of the Bill, and he had gone through more than those which the Attorney General had referred to, giving power to the tribunal to recognize excuses, and also giving power to the High Court, in Clause 17, as well as to the Election Court, to except certain innocent acts from being an illegal practice. But he saw nothing in Clause 17 which covered in the slightest degree, or gave any power whatever to the Court to deal with, the case they were now considering, and it was a case that might happen frequently—namely, that of an agent who knowingly paid a claim after the proper time. By Sub-section (b) of

Clause 17, it was necessary for the Court to determine—

“That an act or omission arose from inadvertence, or from accidental miscalculation, or from some other reasonable cause of a like nature, and in any case did not arise from any want of good faith.”

He was admitting that in the case they were now dealing with there could be neither inadvertence nor accidental miscalculation. Therefore, that clause could not be referred to as supplying a mode by which the Court could prevent this extreme consequence from falling upon the candidate. The next section referred to by the Attorney General was Section 36, and he (Mr. Gibson) certainly failed to see the relevancy of that clause. No one had a higher respect for his hon. and learned Friend than he had. His hon. and learned Friend had conducted the consideration of this Bill in a spirit of perfect fairness towards the Committee, and he had stated his views with logical precision. But he (Mr. Gibson) had read and re-read Subsection 5 of Clause 26, and he could not see that it had the faintest reference to the point now under discussion. He would read it to the Committee, in order to show that he was not doing an injustice to his hon. and learned Friend. This was the sub-section referred to by the Attorney General as one which enabled the Court to modify the unjust stringency of the clause now sought to be amended by his noble Friend—

Looking further at the clause, he found this marginal note attached to it—“Return and declaration respecting election expenses,” which had nothing whatever to do with the topic now under consideration; and there was a Proviso which entirely prevented the application of the clause to the remedy of the evil referred to—

“Provided that such failure on the part of the election agent, without the knowledge and consent of the candidate, shall not render the candidate liable to any greater incapacity than that to which he is liable for an illegal practice committed by his agent without his knowledge and consent.”

That was the very point the noble Lord was anxious to get rid of. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) dissented.] He saw that the Attorney General did not assent to his inference; and he hoped the noble Lord would look at the section again, because it was overwhelmingly plain to his mind. The noble Lord sought to get rid of the provision that if the principal were made guilty of an illegal practice committed by his agent, such consequences should not follow; and it was no answer to refer the noble Lord to this Proviso, which said that the principal should not be liable to any greater incapacity than that which he was liable to for an illegal practice committed by his agent without his knowledge and consent, and which, in point of fact, gave no redress at all. The only other clause referred to as affording matter for relief was Clause 27; and the marginal note attached to that clause was—“Authorised excuse for non-compliance with provisions as to return and declaration respecting election expenses.”

He had read the clause carefully, and, without desiring to weary the Committee by reading it to them, he would ask them to accept from him the statement that there was not one solitary syllable in the clause which would enable the Court, no matter how well disposed it might be, to relieve the candidate from the penalty attached to the wilful payment of a proper charge if it were paid after the proper time. That was the point to which he wished to confine his arguments at the present moment, although there were other points that would require careful consideration. He had taken one of the strongest cases, and one which would occur most frequently, and his view was this—that if the Attorney General would not accept the Amendment, which he (Mr. Gibson) regarded as of great importance, or if he would not undertake, expressly and in terms, when they came to the next clause granting exceptions, to deal with this point in the way indicated by the Amendment, he should unquestionably divide in favour of the Amendment of his noble Friend, and he should support it in the strongest way he could.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had done that already. He had said all that could be said in favour of the Amendment. The question, however, was one upon which the experience of the right hon. and learned Gentleman was somewhat limited. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, as the Representative of a University, had always sailed upon very smooth water. [Mr. Gibson said, he confessed that.] His right hon. and learned Friend probably did not know that payments sometimes had to be made which had not been provided for. If he (the Attorney General) thought the infliction of the penalty proposed by the noble Lord would meet the case, he would have gladly accepted the Amendment; but the position of the election agent was a peculiar one; and he thought it was not asking too much from him that he should comply with the requirements of the Act. Let the Committee consider what the position of the election agent was. He ought to know what the law was. They told him he had a certain duty to perform, and he could not be led into anything accidentally, or that he could not comprehend. He would do everything with premeditation, because, in this case, he would have to pay a certain sum in a certain given time. The Legislature told him he must not do it after a certain time, but that, if there was a claim which was sent in after the proper time, and the agent thought he ought morally to pay it, then he had only to take the trouble to make an application to the Court for leave to pay it. The noble Lord said that the agent would be of opinion that the Legislature ought not to impose this obligation upon him, and, therefore, he would not comply with it, but would set the intentions of the Legislature at defiance. Then, why was such a breach of the law by the agent to be treated as being of less importance than any of those other things which, if the agent did them during the conduct of an election, would render the seat void?

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL remarked, that the election would be over at the time.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if the election agent did an act of this kind after he had ceased to be an election agent, he would not bring any consequences upon the candidate. The candidate would have the means of putting an end to the agency by an advertisement or otherwise. It was said that the agent would be willing to pay the penalty, and would run the risk of being fined £100, rather than ask the leave of the Court to pay these claims. If that were so, did not the Committee think that he would have some object—that there was something in connection with the payment which he was anxious should not be mentioned in the High Court? The claim might only be for £2 or £3; and would the agent incur a fine of £100 unless he had something in substance to conceal? The payments, in fact, were the sequence of the debt. His own opinion was that they would be opening the door to illegal practices to the fullest extent if they allowed payments of this kind to be made contrary to the law. A payment made in the hurry of the moment, or under accidental circumstances, would not come under this provision, which only dealt with premeditated breaches of the law—cases in which the agent was ready to set the law at defiance rather than do his duty. If there was any further protection he could give to the candidate he would gladly give it; and he had endeavoured to meet any case of inadvertence or mistake by accepting the new clause suggested by his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler), but which he (the Attorney General) intended to bring up. That clause provided that when the Election Court reported that the agent had been guilty of treating, or undue influence, or illegal practices; and the Election Court further reported that the candidate and his election agent had taken all reasonable means to prevent the commission of corrupt and illegal practices; that they had been trivial and unimportant, and limited in character, and were not committed with the knowledge and consent of the candidate, the election should not be void, nor should the candidate be subjected to any incapacity under the Act. His right hon. and learned Friend said that these cases might often occur. They ought not to occur often, because the election agent would know very well that they were against the Act of Parliament. He was afraid that, notwithstanding what his right hon. and learned Friend had said, he could not yield to his views, and he hoped the Committee would fully consider the effect which the adoption of the Amendment would have. It would be most unwise not to enforce this provision. Having passed an Act they ought to see that all its provisions were obeyed by all persons concerned.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he wished to point out that the punishment given under the Amendment of the noble Lord would not be so inadequate as the Attorney General seemed to imagine. What was proposed was that an agent guilty of an offence should be punished by a fine of £100; but if the clause were passed as it stood, the agent might expose himself not to a single fine of £100, but to one for each separate offence. The agent would, therefore, always have before his mind that in violating the law he would be subjecting himself to a heavy penalty.

MR. GORST said, the promise just made by the Attorney General very much altered the matter. He understood that the pledge given was to provide in the Bill some means, in addition to those already provided, for relieving the principal from the acts of his election agent as soon as the election was over. He confessed that when a man had paid all his election expenses and made his declaration, that that ought of itself to be a termination of the election agency. It appeared now that that was to be made quite clear, and that when the election was over and the accounts paid, and all the provisions of the Act complied with, the agency should cease, and if anything was then done by the election agent it would be done at his own peril. If that were made perfectly clear, he thought it would meet all the objections which had been raised; because he thought that as long as the election was going on, and until the accounts were paid and the whole affair was closed, it was only right that a payment of this kind by the election agent should have all the consequences which any other illegal acts by the election agent would have. If a line were drawn beyond which the agency should not exist, that would, in his opinion, be quite sufficient.

MR. RYLANDS said, he was unable to support the Amendment of the noble Lord. He agreed with the Attorney General that if the election agent did not fulfil the requirements of the Statute he ought to be subjected to more severe punishment than a fine of £100. Indeed, he thought the election agent, under such circumstances, should be somewhat severely punished, because he might otherwise, to a great extent, defeat the intentions of the Bill. At the same time, he was inclined to agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that in punishing the agent they should look with jealousy upon the consequences which any specific act of the agent might bring to bear upon the candidate. For instance, he himself had no desire to be punished because his agent had rendered him liable to be prosecuted. The agent ought to know what the law was, and ought to refuse to pay any claims after the date fixed for their payment. He would be glad if the Attorney General could see his way to the modification of the clause, so far as its effect upon the candidate would be, without waiting until the new clause which he intended to bring up at the instance of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler) could be discussed. It was quite evident, on the face of the matter, that the candidate could have little or no control over the agent; and it would be rather hard that he should be held liable, and subjected to very serious consequences, because the agent, by the payment of a sum which would have been perfectly legitimate if paid at the proper time, could expose him to the danger of a Petition. It would frequently happen that Petitions would be presented against the candidate on very trifling grounds; but if the agent broke the law, that would certainly justify the Petitioner in presenting a Petition, and would put the candidate to very serious expense. He therefore thought, in regard to this particular clause, that where a fault might arise without any corrupt motive there ought to be some words inserted to protect the candidate.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS said, he quite agreed with the principle of the clause, and he considered that it would be very necessary to place a limit upon the time when the accounts should be sent in, and that such limit should be rigidly enforced; but he disputed the justice of the treatment of the candidate. He admitted that the conduct of the agent would be essentially wrong if, having made a mistake, he did not take advantage of that provision of the Bill which allowed him to apply to the High Court of Justice to enable him to pay a claim which might not have been sent in at the proper time, but which he considered was a legitimate one, and one that ought to be paid. On the other hand, it would be excessively unjust if, because an agent had been guilty of such laches, the innocent candidate was to be punished in the strong manner provided by the clause and held to be guilty of an illegal practice. He therefore trusted that the Attorney General would do something to protect the candidate from the severity of the clause.

MR. CALLAN said, he hoped the Attorney General would in no way modify the clause. It was about the most efficient measure of justice which could fall upon any candidate, and it would render him very careful about the acts of his election agent. He (Mr. Callan) knew a case in point in his own district where, 12 months after the election, upwards of £500 were paid for expenses incurred in treating by the election agent, and the candidate. If a fine of £100, or even a fine of £1,000, were imposed, it would not have the slightest effect in deterring the agent if he had some wealthy man behind him. If they were to impose a penalty on the election agent, he hoped it would be imprisonment with hard labour. If the Attorney General intended to modify the clause in any respect, he (Mr. Callan) would certainly prefer that the punishment should be enhanced, and he was able to speak from experience. Not only should the candidate be deemed guilty of an illegal practice, but the election agent should receive penal servitude for five years, because it was a corrupt practice deliberately entered into during an election contest. It was an act that could not be unintentionally committed, but it must be deliberately committed with malice prepense, in order to render void the salutary provisions of the clause. If it were found necessary to relieve the candidate, he certainly hoped they would increase the penalty upon the election agent, and, in addition to a fine, imprison him for two years with hard labour. What would the election agent care for a fine of £100 or £500 if he had a wealthy Baronet or a noble Lord at his back? He would only laugh at it. He knew an election agent who had only a simple barrister at his back who had to pay £500 within the borough he (Mr. Callan) had formerly represented for corrupt practices committed three years ago. Therefore, the only way to make a candidate really responsible was to give him or his agent penal servitude.

MR. WARTON said, he thought the Committee should take into consideration the position of the unhappy candidate whose agent had simply paid a lawful claim within the maximum amount of the election expenses, perhaps only a day after the period for payment had expired. There was positively no protection whatever for the candidate in any clause passed or coming. That was a monstrous injustice, and so long as the Bill bristled with such things he should object to and dislike it. He thought it was a matter of complaint that the hon. and learned Attorney General should have read out the second paragraph of Clause 6, for it had really nothing to do with the point now raised.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD said, that, as he understood the Attorney General had suggested the insertion of a clause which would enable a candidate to declare, in some way or other, that his agent had ceased to be his election agent, he thought that would be a sufficient protection to the candidate; but he thought that would, whilst relieving the candidate from responsibility, enable the agent, after the determination of his authority, to make illegal payments on his own responsibility, and trust to the candidate for reimbursement at some future period. A candidate might issue a notice to that effect, and then, by another agreement, come to a secret understanding with the agent. He would suggest that the penalty should be an absolute penalty of £100 in every case, for he believed that would be much more effective than any future clause that could be drawn.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) asked the noble Lord to withdraw his Amendment, and promised, if that were done, to consider whether there could not be some distinction made between a contract made within the maximum, and payments made outside the limit of time for such payments. The question of payments outside the maximum stood upon a different footing.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he would not put the Committee to the trouble of dividing, for the Attorney General had hitherto kept his promises with such good faith that he could fully trust him to do his best to meet this difficulty. He thought the suggestion of the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock (Lord Randolph Churchill) a very valuable one, because if it could be guarded, as the noble Lord had suggested, by terminating connection with an agent at a certain period, the candidate would be protected, not only against this particular illegal practice, but against other illegal practices. But the difficulty which occurred to him, and which he thought the Attorney General would realize, was that there were here three periods of time. The expenses must be returned to the Returning Officer within 40 days; claims must be sent in within 20 days, and payment must be made within 30 days. Therefore, in one case there were 30 days, and in another 20 days; and he did not conceive that in any case a candidate could terminate his connection with an agent under 40 days. That was a point which he had no doubt the Attorney General would carefully consider; and, as he had given an assurance that he would do his best to meet this as well as other difficulties, he would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. GORST said, he hoped the Attorney General would not go far back from the pledge given to the noble Lord the Member for Woodstock. He did not think the observations of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Morgan Lloyd) touched the principle advocated by the noble Lord. No one wanted a candidate to terminate his connection with his agent until the election was practically over—that was until 40 days had expired, or until a declaration of the returns had been made to the House, and all the expenses had been closed up and settled. It appeared to him just and equitable that the Member returned should be allowed to terminate altogether the relations of election agency, for there would then be nothing left for the agent to do. One part of the operation would be to withdraw from the control of the election agent all sums of money; and he did not see why an agent should be wicked and foolish enough, after the connection was terminated, to spend his own money.

Amendment by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 82, after "twenty," to insert "one."
—(Mr. H. H. Fowler.)

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he hoped the Attorney General would agree to put in 28 days, as he thought both 20 and 21 were too short a period for all the accounts to come in.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, this was another of those numerous details which the Committee had to consider; and they had already fixed the limits of time. First, there was the sending of the accounts to the Returning Officer; then the payment, and then the return, within 40 days. During all that time a constituency might be wrongly represented, and it would be a serious matter to displace a Member who had got accustomed to his seat for two months. He objected to any further extension of time.

MR. GORST pointed out that there was great danger in this matter. At present a Petition might be presented against the return of a Member as soon as he was returned; but, under this clause, the time was extremely long. It was rarely the case that a Petition was presented until the Member had sent in his accounts, because Petitioners would naturally wait until that had been done, in order to see the vouchers. In a Court of Law a Petition might be presented earlier, but he did not think anyone would do that; and if the time was made too long, that would enable a Member corruptly returned to sit too long in that House. Such a Member ought to be quickly sent about his business. Again, by giving too long a time they would enable corrupt bargains to be made for squaring a Petition. He thought it was important for the character of the House, that the period within which the return of expenses should be made should be as short as possible. In the Bill it was made 40 days; and in order to make the period short, it would be necessary to make the time for sending in claims short also. Twenty-one days were quite long enough for that purpose. Contracts were only to be made by agents or sub-agents, and there could not be a vast number of people making contracts; and those making contracts would be able to send in their claims in 21 days. He was not advocating the shortening of time; but they should be very careful how they lengthened it.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL said, he had an Amendment to make the time 40 days, in order that claims might be quickly settled and got out of the way as soon as possible in the interests of candidates and election agents. The time proposed by the Bill was too short for settling a large number of small claims which would continue to be sent in. He was strongly in favour of limiting the period, because it gave time for an agent to reduce exaggerated claims to proper proportions; but, in fixing the period, they must consider the consequences, and he feared the proposal of the Bill would lead to accounts being disputed which would otherwise be settled.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he could not agree that the period should be made as short as possible, for everyone who had dealt with these matters knew how difficult it was to get the accounts in. He hoped the Attorney General would consent to 42 days.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he thought a candidate could not have these matters off his mind too soon. He thought one week was ample time. A longer period was all very well in the times when there was enormous expenditure over elections, and candidates spent £30,000 or £40,000; but were the Committee aware that under this Bill not more than £2,000 could be spent even in the largest constituency? Did anybody mean to say that seven days were not ample for settling all claims up to that amount, all having been incurred with one man? If a longer time were allowed, a candidate would not be able to get from his agent the amount he had let him in for. The agent would say there was plenty of time, and so the candidate would not be able to ascertain what he was liable for. Lengthened periods for payment of claims only meant further expense, and led to the parties meeting and squaring matters, and to corrupt bargains. As the Bill stood, 10 days were allowed between the claim and the payment, and then another 10 days for the agent to make his return. All these periods were preposterous, and not based on logic at all. It would be 50 times better for everybody that the claims should be settled in a week, and that could be done without any difficulty.

MR. CALLAN said, he thought the period should be reduced from 21 days to 14 days. Seven days would be preferable to either; but errors might be made in the excitement of an election, and therefore he would suggest 14 days. During nearly 20 years' experience he had acted frequently for others, and had wealthy candidates behind him; but he had changed corrupt elections to pure elections. When he took up his own county (Louth), he found that the elections had generally cost £5,000; but he and Mr. Chichester Fortescue had reduced that to £2,000. The longer the time given for payment, the greater was the inducement to people to make exorbitant charges, and to fabricate claims under various pretences, which it would be to the interest of the candidate not to meet in a very hostile manner. He thought 14 days ample; but the period given to a candidate to investigate claims ought to be more than 10 days, for he might have 100 bills to investigate. He had never paid a bill until he had been down to the place and inquired into it. He should be afraid to pay a claim until he had satisfied himself that there was not the slightest tinge of illegality surrounding the claim; and, in view of the fearful penalties incurred by a candidate for an inadvertent act, he ought to have at least 21 days to investigate the claims. He should not press this but that he had had an extensive experience of these matters, and he knew where the difficulty lay.

MR. RYLANDS said, he quite agreed with the noble Lord opposite (Lord Randolph Churchill), for he was anxious that a candidate should get rid of these matters as quickly as possible. During a long period undesirable occurrences might happen, and there was no reason under this maximum scale why 14 days should not be ample. He believed the general feeling was that 14 days would also be sufficient for payment. If the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would withdraw his Amendment, he would propose 14 days.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had had a great number of communications on this subject from almost every election agent in the country, and the almost unanimous view was that bills should be got in in the shortest possible time, but that considerable time should be given for examining them. North Lancashire was 60 miles long, and a candidate might have to send agents all over the Division. He would suggest 10 days for claims to be made, and an extended time for examination.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if the hon. Member would withdraw the Amendment he would not oppose the insertion of 14 days. That would be shortening the period as much as he thought safe.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 32, to leave out "twenty," and insert "fourteen."—(Mr. Rylands.)

Question, "That 'twenty' stand part of the Clause," put, and negatived.

Question proposed, "That 'fourteen' be there inserted."

MR. MACFARLANE said, he hoped the Amendment would not be agreed to, for he thought seven days would be long enough.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. BIGGAR wished to move an Amendment for providing that claims made were at a reasonable rate. By this sub-section heavy penalties were to be imposed upon a candidate who did not get all his accounts paid within a reasonable time; but he had found in practice that charges were often unreasonable, and it was impossible to bring the people making claims up within a reasonable time. In a subsequent part of the Bill there was a provision that application might be made to extend the time for payment, and this sub-section was more or less in contradiction with that, and it would be liable to a different construction by different Judges, with the result that the candidate might have to pay these heavy penalties. That was what he wished to avoid. Of course, a candidate could make a return of the claims against him; but, at the same time, he ought not to have to run the risk of incurring penalties in cases where he was able to show that a claim was either illegal or in excess of what was reasonable for the services rendered.

Amendment proposed,

In page 10, line 34, after the word "expenses," to insert the words "if legal, and if amount demanded is at a reasonable rate."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) pointed out that no expenses need be paid which were not legal.

MR. BIGGAR urged that it was intolerable that a candidate should be forced into litigation with parties upon claims, when they might have an opportunity of settling the matter by a little negotiation.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he hoped the hon. Member would not divide upon the Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 35, to leave out "in connection with," and insert "or incidental to."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ARTHUR PEEL said, he wished to move to extend the period for examining accounts from 30 to 40 days.

Amendment proposed, in page 10, line 12, to leave out "thirty," and insert "forty."—(Mr. Arthur Peel.)

Question proposed, "That 'thirty' stand part of the Clause."

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, he should prefer to make the period 21 days. He thought there was no reason why many of the claims should not be sent in during the election, and paid at once. The right hon. Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had said he had consulted election agents; but they were the worst authorities that could be consulted. They were the persons from whom candidates wished to protect themselves, and to compel to send in these claims without loss of time. As to large constituencies, he thought the post would overcome any difficulty on that account. He would urge the Attorney General to yield to the pressure from both sides of the House, because he was certain it was to the interest of candidates to make the period as short as possible, and so also to limit the time for Election Petitions being presented.

MR. ECROYD said, he was anxious to see these periods made as short as possible, and he was glad the Attorney General had accepted 14 days for claims to be sent in; but he was quite certain that in such a division as North-East Lancashire, which he had the honour of contesting in 1880, it would be impossible for a candidate to examine all his accounts in seven days.

MR. GORST said, the experience of hon. Members was based on the existing law, under which claims could be made under all varieties of circumstances and expenses incurred, and time was required for examining the accounts; but under this Bill the claims would be of an extremely simple character, because nobody would be able to give a legal order incurring expenses but the agent or sub-agent. Seven days would not be required to enable the agent or sub-agent to make up his mind whether he had given any particular order upon which a claim was made. Under the present law anyone might give orders, and the candidate could not know from whom the orders emanated, and inquiry had to be made; but under this Bill there would be no such requirement. The election agent would know whether he had given an order, and could make up his mind in five minutes whether he disputed the claim or not; and in a county he could inquire of his sub-agents by post or telegraph whether certain orders had been given or not.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could not accept the Amendment. If they allowed each creditor 14 days, surely it was putting too much pressure on the agent to give him a less period. He might have to make several journeys to different districts; and although the expenses would now be less, still there might be over-charges made. That would apply to the large constituencies; and even in a borough the agent might have to travel from place to place. He thought 30 days would be a safer period, and he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN agreed with the noble Lord that the period should be as short as possible.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he thought that after 14 days had elapsed the candidate should pay the accounts as rapidly as possible, so as to send in his return as early as possible. He hoped the Attorney General would accept the compromise of 28 days. He strongly supported the noble Lord.

MR. ONSLOW said, that if the Attorney General accepted 14 days he should vote against the noble Lord; otherwise he should vote with the noble Lord.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would not discuss the difference between 28 and 30 days. He would accept 28 days, and then they could substitute 35 for 40 as the time for accounts to be sent in to the Returning Officer.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, page 10, line 41, to leave out "thirty," and insert "twenty-eight."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 11, line 5, to leave out "A disputed claim may be referred in a summary manner to the High Court or."—(Mr. Gorst.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. GORST moved, in page 11, line 11, to leave out the words "the High," and insert the word "such." The hon. and learned Gentleman said, he should have thought that the Judges of the County Court or any tribunal would have been quite enough to decide as to the payment after 21 days, because there was no dispute as to liability. Let them take the case of an election in Newcastle and the expenses sent in before the 21 days. Suppose there was an amount of 10s. for the hire of a horse, which was not put into the election account because the person charged denied that the horse was supplied, an action could be brought in the County Court and a judgment obtained for the payment, and under that judgment the debt would have to be paid. In the present instance, however, the debt was not to be paid, but the case was to be taken to London, a London agent was to be employed, and they were to go before the High Court and get the leave of a Judge, who knew nothing about the circumstances, before a just claim could be obtained. This might happen in regard to a claim which the candidate would have been glad to have paid long before the expiration of the 21 days if he had thought it a just claim, and in respect of which, in the other alternative, he desired the Court to make an order so that he might have it settled.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 11, to leave out the words "the High," and insert the word "such."—(Mr. Gorst.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, this was a very small matter. The Judge of the County Court was not always accessible, as was the Judge in the High Court. Therefore, it would be desirable to retain the provision in its present form.

MR. GREGORY considered that it would save time and expense if cases of this kind were confined to the jurisdiction of the High Court, for the reason that the Attorney General had pointed out—namely, that the Judge of the County Court was not always accessible. It would be better to have the High Court, or, at any rate, to give right of application to that Court concurrently with a right of application to the County Court, if such right were given.

MR. WARTON said, he did not agree with the hon. Gentleman who had just spoken that it would save time and expense if they had to go to the High Court. It seemed to him that the Committee had been going on far too quickly with these Amendments; and if they had not proceeded with such indecent haste they would have seen that some consequential matters already bound them to give jurisdiction to the County Court. If they would refer to the Bill they would find that Sub-section 9 of the present clause said—

"On cause shown to the satisfaction of the High Court, such Court on application by the claimant or by the candidate or his election agent may by order give leave for the payment of the said sum, or the issue of the said execution, and further may by order give leave for the payment by a candidate or his election agent of a disputed claim, or a claim for any such expense as aforesaid, although sent in after the time in this section mentioned for sending in claims, or although the same was sent in to the candidate and not to the election agent."

It seemed to him that it would be highly improper to leave to other than the High Court the determination of such serious questions as these. He earnestly urged the Attorney General not to give way with reference to the next sub-section, and on the Report repair the errors they had committed by acting with such injudicious haste, particularly exemplified in their leaving in the words in the last sub-section "any competent Court."

MR. GORST said, he would not take up any further time of the Committee. He would be satisfied if the Attorney General, before the Report, would consider whether it was not possible to adopt some simpler process by which a claim sent in within the 21 days for a sum within the maximum, the only reason for the non-payment of which was a dispute between the election agent and the creditor as to whether the full amount was due or not, could be obtained. If the Attorney General would agree to this, he should be very glad to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. BIGGAR said, the next Amendment was in his name. It went in much the same lines as the preceding proposal; and, although he should postpone it, he thought the system of postponing Amendments was not a very satisfactory one. To his mind, these matters should be argued out in Committee, and they should not leave so many matters to be settled at the next stage of the Bill. The postponement of these questions would lead to inevitable discussion at the next stage; and if all these questions were settled on their merits in Committee, the necessity of having subsequent discussions would be obviated. His proposal was to insert after the word "Court," in line 11, the words "if beyond the jurisdiction of the County Court." It seemed to him to be thoroughly intolerable, in regard to a trumpety claim of £5, that, first of all, the plaintiff should apply to the Superior Court and maintain an action in that Court. What were the fees in the High Court, he would ask, supposing a person applied there to the Judge with the usual attendance of attorney and counsel? Unless the Government could give some better explanation than he had heard, so far, he should be obliged to divide upon this Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 11, line 11, after the word "Court," to insert the words "if beyond the jurisdiction of the County Court."—(Mr. Biggar.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. WARTON said, that they had not yet determined the previous question, as to whether the word "such" should be inserted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Amendment in that case had been withdrawn.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he thought the hon. Member (Mr. Biggar) had not properly observed the effect of this Amendment; because, if he had, he would find that it would not carry out the object he had in view; in fact, it would have no effect.

MR. WARTON said, it was rather a strange thing that the principle of this Amendment was the same as the principle of the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), by an hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench, and by himself (Mr. Warton). The Government, so far, had not given the slightest reason why they should not at once agree to the proposition. Of course, he should have an opportunity, on the next stage of the Bill, of raising the question again, and he should take precious good care to do it. It seemed to him outrageous that litigants should be obliged to go to the High Court when they could settle these matters in the County Court. It was only to put money into the pockets of a certain class of attorneys, no doubt respectable enough in their way, that this application to the High Court was insisted upon.

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL said, before the Amendment was withdrawn the Committee should know whether, under the clause as it stood, it was impossible to bring an action before the County Court, that being regarded as an "incompetent" Court.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the Government, in answer to the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), had promised to consider the point.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 24 (Personal expenses of candidate and small expenses of committee room).

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he had an Amendment to propose to this clause.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had an Amendment also, which he believed came before that of the noble Lord.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, his Amendment was on the Notice Paper.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK remarked, that the Chairman had his Amendment in his hand, the effect of which was to leave out from the words "the candidate," in line 25, down to the end of line 29.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 25, to leave out Sub-section 1.—(Mr. Cavendish Bentinck.)

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the Attorney General would know that he disapproved of this Bill altogether, believing that it would do very little good. He certainly thought it would be very advantageous if the hon. and learned Gentleman were to strike out all this ridiculous nonsense about a candidate's personal expenses being paid by him to the extent of not more than £50. This provision was revived from the original Act of 1854, and from the Act of 1868; and he would venture to point out that every Member of experience must see that, for all practical purposes, this provision must be quite nugatory. Candidates were not now equal, as it were, before the law, inasmuch as a vast number of gentlemen practically never paid any personal expenses at all, or, at any rate, if they did, they were of a trifling character. Candidates of this class might be opposed, perhaps, by gentlemen who had to maintain themselves at hotels, and had to incur large expenses in connection with their canvass and their election; in fact, to use the expression of the Attorney General, they were placed in a humiliating position, because they had to lay before the public all that they had been doing during the period of the election. If anybody, certainly hon. Members on the other side ought to support the principle involved in this Amendment, and take care that candidates were not exposed to these indignities. It appeared to him that under the principle of the original Act the penalty was an accumulating one of £5 a-day. They were now narrowing the limits within which a candidate might travel; and it was highly important, therefore, that there should be some definition of what personal expenses were. He saw that a noble Friend of his (Lord George Hamilton) had an Amendment down to this clause; and it seemed to him that if they omitted to deal with the matter they would be making a small absurdity a still greater one. He believed that the best course the Government could adopt would be to accept his proposal.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would state briefly why he wanted the words to remain in the clause. The Committee would understand that it was the present law that a candidate might spend as much as he liked, and might send in an account of his expenses to his election agent. That was his duty. Well, in this clause the law was maintained that he might spend as much as he liked, personal expense not being in the maximum expenditure scheduled. One man's expenses might be different to those of another man. One might be, for instance, a married man possessing a family, and he might desire to take them down to the district in which the election was to take place. His expenses, of course, would be very different to those of a candidate who had only himself to look after. Then, again, another man might be an invalid, and might be put to extra expense in consequence. There was, in fact, no limit upon what might be spent in this way; but it should be borne in mind that they had it in evidence that in one case no less than £600 was spent in personal expenses during a short election. The proposal made in the clause was that the candidate should be allowed to spend £50 with his own hand. He did not think that £600 would ever have been paid for personal expenses if the election agent had been cognizant of the recipients and objects of the expenditure. He trusted that the Committee would allow this sub-section to remain, as it would really be a protection and an assistance to the candidate instead of anything else. With regard to Sub-section 3, which said—

“A statement of the particulars of payments made under this section by the candidate for his personal expenses, or by any person so authorized as above in this section mentioned, shall be sent to the election agent within the time limited by this Act for the sending in of claims, and such payment if made by a person so authorized shall also be vouched for a bill containing the receipt of that person,” he would propose to modify it by striking out, in lines 35 and 36, the words “under this section by the candidate for his personal expenses, or.” This would obviate the necessity of the candidate sending in a statement as to items of his personal expenditure. It would render it unnecessary for him, for instance, to specify the family expenses, charges for maid servants, and so on, which might not be necessary to put before the public. There would be sufficient remedy for every evil in the clause as it would then stand. Whilst he adhered to the clause, he was willing to strike out the particulars of the statement; and this, he trusted, would meet the views of the right hon. and learned Member.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON considered the statement of the Attorney General was a most conciliatory one, although it did not meet the objection of his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) to this clause. What was desired was some definition of what these personal expenses were. A look of despair came over the face of the Attorney General whenever he was asked for a definition; but he (Lord George Hamilton) would point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman that a definition was strongly desirable, considering that in this case things might occur for which a candidate might be sent to prison. No doubt, the expenditure of such a sum as £600 for personal expenses during an election was corrupt, and ought to be stopped. But did the hon. and learned Gentleman mean by the personal expenses the expenses of a candidate who was resident in the district in which the election took place in connection with his household? [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James): No.] Supposing the candidate was non-resident, and stopped at an hotel, would his expenditure on board and lodgings have to be put into the expenses?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that that was required at the present time by statute.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, if that were so, the position of the candidate who was resident, and who could entertain his friends, would be different, for his expenditure would not have to be published to the world. Take the case of the Prime Minister, who, during his Mid Lothian campaign, was entertained by a leading Member of the Liberal Party, who took down to his residence an enormous number of friends, who invited the whole county, who employed special trains, and who engaged the whole of an hotel in Edinburgh. Was that what the Attorney General would call legitimate expenditure? If that was a legitimate expenditure, would not the Prime Minister stand in an unfairly advantageous position as contrasted with a candidate who went down to contest the seat, and who had not a friend to receive him into his house, and no one to pay all his expenses in the matter of hotels, cabs, and so on? Would this person who paid his own expenses have to make them known; if not, nothing would ever be heard about them, as in the case of the expenses of the Prime Minister? The whole thing seemed to him (Lord George Hamilton) perfectly absurd. Wherever they went they must all incur personal expenditure.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had defined personal expenditure. He hoped the noble Lord would excuse him for interrupting; but he wished to point out that the words were defined by the Act of 19 & 20 Vict. Personal expenses were there defined as reasonable travelling expenses, and such travelling expenses and reasonable expenses of his living at hotels for the purpose of his election. That definition had been in operation for 25 years without the slightest difficulty having arisen with regard to it. The noble Lord wished him now to go further in the definition; but he was unable to accede to the request.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, the hon. and learned Gentleman's words were the strongest possible argument against the limit of £50.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sure the noble Lord was labouring under a mistake. A candidate might have unlimited expenditure; but it was only £50 which could go through his own hand, the other personal expenditure having to go through his agent.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON considered that the clause placed a non-resident candidate in a very invidious position. It seemed to him that there were many personal expenses which always attended a candidate, or any gentleman in the position of a candidate, which ought not to be included in the £50. If the Attorney General would define anything like pocket-money, or anything of the kind, he would agree, perhaps, that the sum of £50 ought not to be exceeded. But to ask the Committee to assent to this clause, which meant nothing more or less than the placing of non-resident candidates in a false position as compared with the resident candidate, was to ask too much in the absence of some explanation.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, there was some misconception as to the meaning of this clause, and he thought they ought to understand what it was before they criticized it. He understood that all the personal expenses of a candidate, no matter by whomsoever paid, were in no way included in the maximum. [Mr. WARTON: We know that.] He did not think a good many hon. Gentlemen did know it. It was perfectly clear, therefore, that the candidate might spend what he liked on his own personal expenses totally apart from the maximum. At present, the law provided that the personal expenses should be published. The hon. and learned Attorney General proposed that that publication should continue, but that a new obligation should be added to it—namely, that the sum to be spent on personal expenses should be divided into two sums; that the £50 limit was simply to supply the payments personally made by the candidate himself; and that beyond the £50 was to be paid by the election agent. The noble Lord who had just sat down had said that such a provision put the non-resident candidate to great disadvantages; but he (Mr. Fowler) did not agree with the noble Lord. He (Mr. Fowler), as a resident candidate at the last General Election, paid every sixpence through his election agent. He did that for his own protection, because he believed it to be the best mode of conducting an election—every personal expense, from the issuing of the Writ, he paid through his own election agent. His household bills were in no way involved in the matter; and, indeed, no part of them could, under any conceivable construction, be called personal expenses. The noble Lord asked why the accounts should be published? Simply to prevent gross bribery, such as took place at Sandwich. In that case, when one of the candidates was asked why his personal expenses were so heavy, he told the Commissioners that they were clearly ignorant of the habits of gentlemen, or they would not have expressed surprise that a gentleman should require to spend £600 on personal expenses in a fortnight. He (Mr. Fowler) could not see what objection there was to this clause, modified as the Attorney General proposed. He wished, however, the Attorney General would make the £50 £100.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he intended, at a later stage of the discussion, to move to substitute £150 for the £50. He would not do this now, because it would be irregular. He would put it, however, to the Attorney General whether it was not a fact that every new provision, and every new complexity, introduced in the Bill, was not an evil? Surely the hon. and learned Gentleman himself would not pretend to say that anything was to be gained by this clause. A man might spend as much money as he liked, and he was not bound, even under the Amendment the Attorney General was going to propose, to say how he spent it. All he must do was to spend it through the election agent. Now, was there anything to be gained by putting that new trammel on a candidate? They had to trust a candidate to speak the truth, and if they meant to trust a candidate in such a matter, why not trust him altogether? Why introduce this provision about the election agents? Would it not be much better for the Government to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck), and simplify the Bill by leaving out the section, which could lead to no possible good?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the whole question at issue was, whether beyond £50 a candidate's personal expenses should be paid through the election agent; firstly, to stop dishonest expenditure, such as they had in the case of Sandwich; and, secondly, to protect the honest candidates. Those were the two objects of the clause.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, the Attorney General had said the words were defined by the 19 & 20 Vict. The words "personal expense" were intended by that Act to include reasonable travelling expenses, and the reasonable expenses of living at an hotel. It was, therefore, perfectly plain that the £50 would go in a candidate's hotel expenses. A non-resident candidate could only spend £50 in personal expenses. ["No!"] He could only spend £50 himself, and anything else he had to pay must be paid through his election agent. It was plain that the non-resident candidate was really at a great disadvantage, because a resident candidate, who need not live at an hotel, might spend the £50 in cigars, while the non-resident candidate was paying it in hotel expenses. He thought it would be far wiser to let a candidate return his own expenses, and if his expenses were very high, a Judge would inquire as to how he spend the money.

MR. WHITLEY said, he could not see the advantage of the clause. It appeared to him that although the election agent was to make all the payments for personal expenses beyond the £50, he had no power to refuse a candidate's demands. Why not make a candidate make a statutory declaration as to how much he had spent? They would prevent, in this way, the objectionable proceedings of a man having to go to his own agent to get his own money.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) reminded the Committee that it would be quite invidious for a candidate to tax his own bills; while the agent, as his man of business, would be able to protect him against extortionate demands. He would repeat that he did not think it was a very broad subject for discussion, and that it would be well for the Committee to express its opinion at once.

MR. WARTON once more protested against the impatience of the Attorney General. They had got through to-day a great number of clauses, and they had got rid of many matters which would have to be reconsidered very carefully on Report. It was all very well that the

[Fourteenth Night.]

Bill should be loaded as it was with absurd and unnecessary clauses, and then that the Committee should be asked to hurry them through, on the ground—as the Attorney General said—that they did not involve matters of general principle. The clause now under consideration was most absurd and unnecessary. The Attorney General had told them that he had incorporated in the Bill the definition of personal expenses in the 19 & 20 Vict. After the extraordinary statement the hon. and learned Gentleman had made with regard to the effect of certain clauses, he (Mr. Warton) took the precaution to refer to the Schedule; and, as far as he could make out, he could not find the definition in the 19 & 20 Vict. incorporated in the Bill. It was, therefore, very necessary to listen to the statements made in the Committee; indeed, he had no doubt that one reason for hurrying through the Bill was that statements made might not be investigated. With regard to this absurd clause, he asked to be allowed to say what it was based upon. The only argument advanced in its favour was that no one election candidate spent more than he had a right to spend. A man who had a great deal of money spent his money freely; and that was the sole reason why this clause was proposed. As a matter of fact, in one case £50 might be ample for personal expenses, while in another case it might be much too little. There was one element in the case he would particularly like to bring under the notice of the hon. and learned Attorney General. Supposing a candidate adopted the plan of letting an hotel bill run, and he incurred a liability of more than £50, would he be bound to pay the £50 allowed him to spend, and then go to his election agent and ask for a £5 or £10 note? What was the real meaning of this? When they had these unseen provisions brought into the Bill they ought to have them explained. ["Divide, divide!"] All those hon. Gentlemen who shouted "Divide, divide!" had not one idea in their heads as to the meaning of this clause, and he should continue his opposition to the clause until he got a satisfactory answer from the Government. He wanted to know the real meaning of the clause. Was a candidate at liberty to incur debt for hotel expenses, or was he bound, by this sumptuary clause, to pay for everything day by day and hour by hour, until the £50 became exhausted, and when the £50 became exhausted was he to go to the agent and ask for more? In his opinion, this was nothing more or less than childish legislation.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINOK regarded the matter as one of considerable importance, and thought the law ought to be made clear. The mere fact of £600 being spent by a candidate in Sandwich on personal expenses was nothing to do with the question. They might just as well say that, because one lawyer had turned out a rogue, all other lawyers were rogues. It was certainly his intention to take a Division.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, if the Attorney General would distinctly say that he would increase the sum allowed to the candidates from £50 to £100, it might obviate a Division. He (Mr. Cowen) thought it was obvious that the amount should either be altered, or the clause should be omitted.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if the Committee wished to increase the amount he would have no objection whatever.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 160; Noes 87: Majority 73. — (Div. List, No. 165.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, there was just time to move the Amendment of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 27, to leave out "50," and insert "100," — (Mr. A. J. Balfour,)—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That '50' stand part of the Clause."

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not see the object of the Amendment.

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to report Progress; Committee to sit again To-morrow.

METROPOLITAN BOARD OF WORKS

(MONEY) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. COURTNEY, Bill further to amend the Acts relating to the raising of Money by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and for other purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. COURTNEY and Lord RICHARD GROSVENOR.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 254.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

POOR LAW (ENGLAND AND WALES)— BOARDED-OUT CHILDREN.

QUESTIONS.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, he rose to ask the noble Lord (Lord Carrington) certain Questions, of which he had given him private Notice, with reference to the boarding-out of children under regulations issued by the Local Government Board—namely, first, Whether the Local Government Board were prepared to institute efficient measures of inspection; secondly, whether it would allow Boards of Guardians to depute one of their number to inquire on the spot into particular cases affecting their own Union; and, thirdly, whether it would take some steps for enabling the Committee of Ladies, who took charge of these children voluntarily and without payment, to become acquainted with children beyond the limits of the Unions whom it might be desirable to board out?

LORD CARRINGTON said, in reply to the first Question of the noble Viscount, that the Local Government Board were contemplating an improved mode of inspection, which they hoped would lead to more beneficial results. In reply to the second Question, he was unable to say whether Boards of Guardians would be allowed to depute one of their number to visit special cases; but the matter would be laid before the Local Government Board. The question was, however, one of some difficulty. With regard to the third Question, any particular cases would be considered by the Local Government Board if brought before them. He might add, for the information of their Lordships, that no regulations of the Local Government Board prevented the boarding-out of orphan children within the limits of the Union to which they belonged. By Order of Poor Law Board, November 25, 1870, orphan children could be boarded-out in rural districts under the following conditions:—No child was to be first boarded-out at an earlier age than 2 or later than 10 years. Four shillings weekly was allowed for the actual maintenance of each child. Not more than two children were to be boarded-out at the same place. Every child was to be visited not less often than once in every six weeks by a member of the Boarding-out Committee. The Boarding-out Committee were two or more persons who had voluntarily arranged, under the sanction of the Local Government Board, to find and superintend such homes, any persons desiring profits being disqualified. The homes must be within five miles of the residences of the Committee. An outfit was supplied by the Guardians, and £2 allowed annually for repairs. From the Report sent in, and which would be found at page 39 of the Annual Report of the Local Government Board, 1882, it appeared that the children were healthy, contented, and well cared for. In some instances the regulations were infringed, more suitable homes were provided, and the defects pointed out remedied.

In reply to a further Question from VISCOUNT CRANBROOK,

LORD CARRINGTON said, he would lay upon the Table the Correspondence on the subject.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

(NO. 134.) THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3<sup>d</sup>."
—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, he would suggest that the Bill should not be pressed further. It was in such an unfinished and incomplete state that it was not fit to be passed into law, and their Lordships could not possibly amend it sufficiently at this stage. It would, therefore, be better to drop the Bill for the present. To enable their Lordships to express an opinion he would move, as an Amendment, that the Bill be read a third time that day three months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day three months.")—(The Earl of Longford.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the course taken by the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Longford) was very unusual, as he had given no Notice of his intention to move the rejection of the Bill. He would only say that he did not concur in the criticisms advanced by the noble Earl.

On Question, "That ('now') stand part of the Motion?"

Resolved in the affirmative; Bill read 3<sup>d</sup> accordingly.

Moved, "That the Bill do pass."—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

Clause 2 (Procuring woman under age to be a common prostitute).

LORD BRABOURNE said, he rose to propose the omission of the words which permitted the exclusion of the public from certain trials, an exclusion hitherto unknown in this country. If it was desirable, in the interests of public morality, that there should be this power of exclusion, it ought to be given by a general law extending to cases of rape and other offences which were not dealt with by this Bill, and not by a provision tacked on to a Bill which only touched one part of the Criminal Law. The proposal was defended on three grounds—in the first place, that the publication of the evidence was injurious to public morals; secondly, that a certain class attended who gloated over the details of those trials; and, thirdly, that women and children ought to be excluded. He entirely agreed with those who said that there ought to be power to exclude women and children from those trials; but that power had been constantly exercised, and he regretted that its existence should have been called in question in their Lordships' House. But if it was right to exclude women and children, it by no means followed that there ought to be an exclusion of the public and the representatives of the Press. As to the second argument, that a class of persons attended who gloated over the details, that might be true; but those persons were sufficiently contaminated already, and could not be much further injured; whilst there might be present in Court individuals of a less hardened type who might be deterred from crime by the judicious words of a Judge and the punishment which they saw awarded to crime. As to the argument founded on the general contamination of morals from the publication of evidence of the kind in question, he respectfully submitted that justice had not been done to the way in which these matters were dealt with in the newspapers, which, for the most part, merely stated that the details were unfit for publication. The instances of injudicious treatment were few and far between, and the danger to public morals was much overrated. But while the danger was uncertain and remote, the gain of publicity was direct, positive, tangible, and certain. He would give one instance. Not many years ago a man was summoned for an indecent assault, and was tried by three magistrates at petty sessions, who refused the suggestion that the case should be sent to a jury. The accused, vehemently protesting his innocence, was sentenced to a period of imprisonment. But in the local newspaper there appeared an account of the proceedings, from which two things were shown—first, that the evidence against the man was weak; and, secondly, that the senior magistrate—though an excellent man—had examined the defendant's witnesses with an evident bias, and seemed to have given no weight to their evidence. In consequence entirely of that report, public interest was awakened in the case. In the town where it occurred there was a good deal of public excitement, and the attention of another magistrate was directed to the case. That magistrate felt it his duty to bring the case to the notice of the Home Secretary, and asked for an inquiry, which was held, and resulted in the liberation of the man in the course of a few days. That could not have happened if the facts had not been made known to the public; and there could hardly be a doubt that the magistrates, from the best motives possible, had they had the power, would have sat with closed doors. He would be the last man to say a word against county magistrates. He was a county magistrate himself of more than 30 years' standing; but he was bound to say that during his experience he had met with a number of magistrates who upon all matters connected with women were possessed with a strong bias. It was a bias which sprang from a highly creditable feeling—namely, sympathy with the weak against the strong; but it caused them to approach these questions in a frame of mind eminently non-judicial. The great—the only check upon such a bias, was publicity; and he (Lord Brabourne) begged their Lordships to recollect that they were asked to give this power of exclusion, not only to Judges, but to every magistrate throughout the country. It would be an unfortunate thing for the administration of justice to allow magistrates all over England to exclude the public and reporters in those cases. It was a very common thing to have false charges of such a description brought. He remembered a woman jumping out of a train at Canterbury, and giving a man in charge. The man left the country; but, in the course of a few years, the woman received a sentence of five years' penal servitude, it having been proved that she had regularly practised the system of making these false charges in order to extort money. But, if such cases had been tried in private, very probably this woman would never have been identified and her wickedness discovered. This was the first time that it had been solemnly proposed to the British Parliament to dissociate a Criminal Court from publicity. When the Divorce Bill was under consideration, a proposal that divorce cases should be heard in private was negatived, and at present the only cases which were tried in camera were cases of nullity of marriage. If publicity was desirable in connection with the Divorce Court, which was presided over by a trained Judge specially selected for the purpose, how much more desirable must it be in connection with the cases which would be tried under the present measure, and which would be presided over by magistrates? So much for the Courts; but what should be said as regarded criminals themselves? Did not their Lordships believe that the knowledge that he would be tried for his crime, and his wickedness exposed before the eyes of his fellow men, acted as a deterrent which would no longer exist if this fear of publicity was removed? And let them be under no mistake—this permission to exclude the public would be taken as a direction by the inferior Courts, and these cases would be heard with closed doors all over the country. And what would be the feeling of the public? Would they have the same confidence in Courts which sat in secret as they now had in our open tribunals, and would not the acquittal of persons accused of these crimes—especially if they happened to belong to a better class of society—be regarded with suspicion which the present system prevented? Believing that publicity was the chief, if not the only, safeguard of justice, he begged to move the omission of the words which would enable the administrators of justice to exclude the public from their Courts. He explained, however, that he would not object to the exclusion of women and children.

Amendment moved,

In page 1, line 19, to leave out the words ("Any court, justice or justices, or magistrate, by or before whom any charge, trial, or other proceeding of or in relation to an offence under this section is heard or conducted, may, in their or his discretion, during the hearing of such charge, or during such trial or proceeding, cause the public to be excluded from the place where such charge, trial, or proceeding is heard or conducted.")—(The Lord Brabourne.)

LORD MOUNT-TEMPLE said, that the words to which the noble Lord (Lord Brabourne) objected had been placed in the measure for the purpose of saving young persons from the mental pollution which they might suffer if they were permitted to listen to the cases which would be tried under the Bill. It was sad to see how many men, and women also, sometimes attended a Court from a prurient and exciting curiosity in the debasing details of the evidence. He remembered a case at Winchester which the Judge thought ought not to be listened to by the women who were present. In spite, however, of his advice that they should leave the Court, some very well dressed women seemed to have made up their minds to remain. Observing this, the Judge, acting upon a happy inspiration, said—"Now that all the respectable women have left the Court, the case may proceed;" and thereupon the women who had remained quitted the Court, not wishing to avow that they were lacking in respectability. He also approved the exclusion of the public as proposed in the Bill, because it would be well not to give newspapers an opportunity of publishing the cases, and so spreading impure literature about the country.

LORD FITZGERALD said, he entirely concurred with the views of the noble Lord on the Cross Benches (Lord Brabourne). The point raised was one of considerable practical importance. Up to the present, publicity had been one of the chief characteristics of the administration of justice in this country, and the great strength and safety of that administration rested on its openness. When upon the Bench himself he had always invited publicity and fair criticism upon the conduct of Judge and jury, and upon the course of the trial. There were six cases contemplated by the framers of the Bill, in which Judges would be enabled to sit with closed doors; but he feared that if the clause were not amended it would become the rule for them to do so. He maintained that Judges already had authority to exclude from their Courts persons—women and children, for example—who ought not to be there on certain occasions. Their authority rested, like the Common Law of the country, upon long and continued usage acquiesced in by the public. Many cases under this Bill would be punishable with five years' penal servitude or more, and therefore the inquiries should take place in the face of day and before the public. One of the objects sought to be obtained by the administration of the law was the holding up of public examples; but where would be the public example if justice was administered with closed doors? Further, Judges and juries might commit errors, and the object of having justice administered in open Courts was that errors, when committed, might at once be exposed. He did not recollect a case in which the right of admission to a Court of Law had been abused by the publication in the Press of demoralizing reports. According to his experience, a gross case was always dismissed in one short sentence—namely,

Lord Mount-Temple

"the details of the case were unfit for publication." In his opinion, the interests of the public would be more likely to suffer in consequence of the closure of the Courts than in consequence of the publicity that would be given to cases if the Courts were to remain open. He, therefore, hoped the Amendment would be agreed to.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, he might point out that though the public, in the ordinary sense of the word, would be excluded from the Courts by the Bill, the public would, as a matter of fact, be represented by the jury and the members of the Legal Profession. If the general public were excluded, there would still be in the Court the solicitors concerned and the members of the Bar practising in the different Criminal Courts. From what had come under his notice, he thought that it would be desirable to exclude a number of men with morbid minds who now took pleasure in listening to this class of cases. He was sure there was a great evil attending the admission of such persons, and he trusted that the clause would remain in the Bill. In Scotland, at the present time, preliminary inquiries by the Procurator Fiscal were held in private in all cases, and no harm had been found to result from the practice. With regard to the trials, those persons who would be left in Court would be the best acquainted with legal proceedings, and able to see that no unfairness was done. They would watch the case sufficiently, and would be able to do everything that was necessary in the way of publicity.

LORD ZOUCHÉ OF HARYNGWORTH said, that one of the most important objects of the Bill was to protect women and young girls. He believed that that object would be defeated, and girls—especially those who might have been in a respectable position previously—would generally be deterred from coming forward to give evidence of the treatment to which they had been subjected, if they had to face the ordeal of a public inquiry, and have their names brought before the public. He trusted the provision of the clause would not be omitted.

LORD TRURO said, that the Bill only made it permissive for the Judge or magistrate to exclude the public, and it seemed to him that the maintenance of that power was essential to the efficiency of the Bill. It was true that the number of the public attending these trials was small; the great mischief arose from the propagation of the evidence given at the trial by means of the Press. The Provincial Press especially gave these cases with great fulness, and it was highly desirable that some means for excluding the Press should be devised. He would like to see it made a misdemeanour under the Act to publish reports of such cases.

EARL FORTESCUE said, he thought that the express exclusion of the public by law from these cases might be held to limit the discretion which the Judges and magistrates now freely exercised of excluding women and children from Courts in immoral cases. There were a great many matters coming before Courts of Justice worse than those which would arise under this Bill; and it was desirable that the power of excluding women and children from the hearing of such cases should not be affected. In his opinion, the law should either be left as it was, or special legislation introduced dealing with all cases of an indecent character alike.

Clause 5 (Defilement of girl between twelve and sixteen years of age).

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he would propose to reduce the age for protection mentioned in this clause from 16 to 14 years. The age fixed in 1875, by a compromise between the two Houses, was 13; and, though that might seem an insufficient limit, there was no particular reason for so extreme a measure as that which had been adopted in the present Bill, nothing having happened since that time, except the inquiry instituted by their Lordships' House. The Code Napoleon fixed the age at 13; and, therefore, the law of England was at present identical with that of France. As to the consent of the Attorney General or of the Public Prosecutor being necessary to a prosecution, how could either of them come to a conclusion on the merits of a charge unless they had the opportunity of examining the witnesses on oath.

Amendment moved, in page 2, line 30, leave out ("sixteen") and insert ("fourteen.")—(The Earl of Milltown.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was a little surprised to hear the remark made that nothing had happened since 1875, except an inquiry by a Committee of their Lordships' House, as if that exception was not the most important element in the case. The circumstances that led to it were the mischiefs arising from the corruption of young girls for immoral purposes, both on the Continent and in England. The evil had grown to an extent which had shocked the conscience of the country, and the inquiry was more exhaustive than any that had been previously conducted. As to age, the Committee took a middle course, and recommended that of 16; and he could not but think their Lordships would do wisely to adhere to it. In accordance with suggestions from the Front Opposition Bench, the Government would move a Proviso, under which prosecutions for misdemeanour under this section should not be instituted otherwise than by, or by the authority and direction of, the Director of Public Prosecutions or the Attorney General. It was true that neither the Attorney General nor the Public Prosecutor would try a case; that was not their function; but they would require information which would satisfy them that the case was one of a substantial character. With this safeguard, he believed that frivolous and extortionate cases would not be taken up.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, that, when it was proposed that the age should be raised from 16 to 17, he voted in favour of 16, believing that was a medium as between divergent opinions that it was desirable to adopt. Of course, their Lordships would regard with horror a state of things in which consent would be common at that age, or could be regarded as sufficiently valid to excuse a seducer; but, as girls of that age often appeared physically to be of a higher age, it was felt that men would be exposed to undeserved severity if a higher age were fixed. The Government having provided an ample security against frivolous prosecutions, he thought their Lordships could safely adhere to the clause as it stood.

On Question? Amendment disagreed to.

On Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Proviso was then added at the end of the clause:—

"Provided that a prosecution for a misdemeanour under this section shall not be instituted, undertaken, or carried on, otherwise than by, or by the authority of, the Director of Public Prosecutions or the Attorney General."

Clause 6 (Consent no defence to charge of indecent assault on girl under sixteen).

On Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendment made:—In page 2, line 40, after ("indictment") insert—

("Brought and prosecuted by, or under, the authority of the Director of Public Prosecutions or of the Attorney General.")

Clause 9 (Summary proceedings against brothel-keepers, &c.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he proposed to move the omission of this clause; and he intended, subsequently, to move the omission of Clause 10, which gave power to the owner of such a house to summarily determine the tenancy of a convicted occupier, and of Clause 11, which authorized the Court to require security from an owner on a second conviction for keeping a disorderly house. These clauses had, on two former occasions, been sufficiently alluded to; but on the first occasion there had some misunderstanding, and on the latter—when the clauses were only retained by two votes—the Division did not come on until the arrival of that hour which was so much prayed for by Governments with a weak case. He objected to the clauses—first, because he wished the Bill to succeed; and, secondly, because he thought they were bad in themselves. The Bill was originally intended to prevent the carrying of young girls abroad; but neither in the Instructions to the Committee nor in their Report was there any allusion whatever to clauses of this character. Who was responsible for these clauses? They appeared to him to be of a very dubious parentage indeed. The Home Office had been devolving upon Parliament the responsibility of government, by leaving to Parliament the duty of making a selection out of the Bill which they had submitted. There was a class of people who believed that immorality could be put down by Act of Parliament, and, no doubt, they approved of these clauses; but he wanted to know whether the Government were to be numbered amongst that class as the authors of the clauses? His objection to the clauses was fundamental. This legislation was of a perfectly extraordinary character, and was not applied to any other class of Her Majesty's subjects, nor, as far as he was aware, to a similar class in any civilized community. In conclusion, the noble Earl moved the omission of the clause.

Amendment moved, "To leave out Clause 9."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

LORD BRAMWELL said, he hoped their Lordships would not pass either this clause or Clauses 10 and 11. It was not easy to understand those clauses. In order to understand them it was necessary to consider them together and also in connection with the Interpretation Clause. The latter clause said that the expression "owner" meant, in relation to any premises, the person entitled to receive, either on his own account or as mortgagee or other encumbrancer in possession, the rack rent of such premises. Now, the mortgagee in possession was an unfortunate man, who had not been able to get his rent paid to him; and he failed to see why such a person should be made specially responsible for the morality of the country. Clause 10 stated what was to be done on a summary conviction. [Cries of "Order!"]

EARL STANHOPE said, he rose to Order. The noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) was not speaking on Clause 9. The House had not yet entered into the consideration of either Clause 10 or Clause 11.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, he thought that, where three consecutive clauses were dealt with on the same subject, a speaker might address himself to the general question.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR pointed out that Clause 9 was at present the clause under discussion.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN, in supporting the clause, said, the Bill dealt largely with matters of police, and its provisions had been founded on the evidence of police authorities, and not on that of enthusiasts and people who carried on a crusade in an indiscreet manner. The fact of the superintendence of the Home Office, which exercised authority over the police, was a guarantee that these clauses would be properly and discreetly carried out. It was quite true that their Lordships' Committee was appointed for a special purpose; but he could not see that there was anything extraordinary in taking advantage of the opportunity of introducing the clauses now under discussion. The Glasgow Local Act, containing provisions very similar to those they were now considering, had been in operation for some time, and with very satisfactory results. It had been said that they in Scotland were stricter in their views than the other parts of the country. He only wished their views were stricter; but he was afraid in these matters they were not much better than their neighbours. There was, moreover, a town in England—Leamington—which had made application for an Act containing a similar power. He denied the likelihood of the Bill being used in such a manner as to cause a re-action, and urged that Clauses 9, 10, and 11 should be passed as they stood, in order to strengthen the hands of the authorities in checking immorality.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH wished to know whether the noble Earl was in Order in discussing the clauses generally?

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, that the noble and learned Lord (Lord Bramwell) had been called to Order, and he did not think that his noble Friend opposite was more in Order than the noble and learned Lord.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that his noble Friend (the Earl of Aberdeen) was quite in Order.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply to the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown), said, these clauses, 9, 10 and 11, came from the Home Office, and had not been proposed without full consideration. The reason why they were introduced was, not because the Government thought that by these or any other clause they could put down all immorality, but because they felt that they should reinforce the existing law so as to diminish those places which were the sources and the focuses of a great deal of immorality resulting in a public nuisance. He had received a letter from the Vestry Clerk of St. George's, Hanover Square, dated June 26, asking him to persevere in carrying this 9th clause, and complaining of the unsatisfactory and cumbrous requirements of the present law. The letter stated that there were several streets in the parish in which houses abounded which were let in the most open way for purposes of prostitution, and were a serious nuisance to their neighbours. The Vestry could do nothing unless two ratepayers appeared to complain; and it was difficult to get inhabitants of the parish to take active steps in the matter, because of the annoyance and expense to which such action would expose them. The present clause was perfectly independent of the 10th and 11th clauses; and, as a point of Order, their Lordships would deal with that clause first.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY said, he could not agree with the noble and learned Earl upon the Woolsack that the fact of that Bill having been approved by the Home Office was a sufficient foundation for its appearance in that House. The Home Office might only be asking what was reasonable and just; but it did seem odd that, for a portion of this subject, it was thought necessary to have the deliberations of a Committee of the House, and that for this matter, which touched somewhat closely questions of police and personal liberty, the opinion of the Home Office was thought to be quite enough. On that ground, therefore, although he did not say that the clauses were bad, they came to their Lordships with an insufficient warrant. The clauses dealt with a matter of great delicacy and difficulty, and he would prefer to deal with it on evidence given before a Committee of that House. They were told that the remedy under the Act of George II. was insufficient. But he could not but remember the noble and learned Earl's speech on the second reading, in which the House was told that there had been, in an instance well known to the noble and learned Earl, no difficulty in obtaining the two requisite ratepayers. There was a further consideration which would dispose him to vote against these clauses. Since the Bill had been introduced, he observed that opinion had been strengthening against it, both within and outside the House, and if the Bill had not been supported by the Government, he did not believe it would have reached its present stage. In these circumstances, he was deeply impressed with the consideration that their only chance of carrying that part of the Bill which was the subject of investigation by a Committee of the House was not to overload it with matters which did not belong to that original investigation, and which were not relevant to it. If these clauses were to be the subject of legislation at all, they ought to be embodied in a separate Bill. In his opinion, that was the sound way of dealing with a subject so difficult as this.

On Question, "That Clause 9 stand part of the Bill?"

Amendment agreed to: Clause struck out accordingly.

On Motion of The Earl of CAMPERDOWN, Clause 10 (Power to owner of premises to determine tenancy of occupier convicted of keeping brothel); and Clause 11 (Power to court on second conviction in respect of same premises to make owner give security), severally struck out of the Bill.

Clause 12 (Amendment of 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 54, and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 89, s. 28, as to prostitutes).

LORD FITZGERALD said, he would move to restore the clause to its original shape, by making it one offence to "loiter and importune" passengers, instead of the two offences of "loitering for the purpose of prostitution or importuning" passengers, as the clause stood in the amended Bill. If any young woman were found simply "loitering" she might have her character ruined for life.

Amendment moved, in page 6, line 28, leave out ("for the purpose of prostitution or") and insert ("and.")—(The Lord Fitzgerald.)

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, that if the clause stood as at present making "loitering" a separate offence, it was quite possible that the police might commit serious mistakes; and, in his opinion, two or three respectable women had only to be apprehended by mistake to raise such an outcry against the Act as to make it unworkable, and force the Government to suspend its operation, as they had recently been forced to suspend another Act.

Amendment agreed to; words struck out accordingly, and the word ("and") substituted.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he begged to move an Amendment rendering liable to punishment any man who, in a thoroughfare or public place, habitually or persistently importuned or solicited women or girls for immoral purposes. The chief object of the Amendment, which met all the difficulties stated to exist in his former Amendment on the clause, was that it gave full protection to honest and decent men, and only caught the professional profligates, who were ever loitering about the streets, and at the doors of establishments where women were employed, in order to catch the unwary. The Bill, as it stood, actually legalized male solicitation. He begged the House to observe the position of these women returning home late at night from their work, and quite unprotected. They might be asking their way of some man, or the hour of the night; but the police coming up would arrest the woman, as a matter of course, because, by the law, the man would be committing no statutable offence. For the first time, also, the police would be made the exclusive judges of what was, or was not, solicitation; and, in many instances, the man who was soliciting would escape scot-free; and the poor woman, who was solicited, would be taken up, and brought before a magistrate. He implored their Lordships to contemplate the condition of a young girl, ignorant and timid, thus placed in a Court of Justice, without friends or advisers. Prison or a reformatory school might be the sentence; and then she would be ruined for life.

Amendment moved,

Clause 13 (Certified homes for girls under sixteen convicted of prostitution).

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN said, he must repeat his objections to the proposed provision. In his opinion the clause would not be operative, for no means were provided for supporting the homes to which it referred, nor for their regulation and management. If the clause were allowed to stand, parents, he feared, might incite their children to commit offences in order that they might be relieved of the burden of supporting their offspring. The parents, he observed, would not have to pay anything towards the support of their offending children, when the latter were once in a home. If the Government would not amend so impracticable a clause they could have no real intention of passing the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the Government saw no reason to doubt that a sufficient number of homes would be provided by benevolent persons, who would be willing to spend time and money in benefiting the unfortunate girls who might come under their charge. As the noble Earl (the Earl of Milltown) was under the impression that no provision was made for the regulation of homes, he begged to refer him to the opening lines of the clause, which were—

"One of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State may, subject to such conditions as he may think fit, grant to any person, or to any two or more persons jointly, a certificate authorizing such person or persons to keep a home, for any period not exceeding thirteen months, and may, from time to time, revoke or renew such certificate."

In his opinion the clause would be quite workable.

Clause 14 (Prohibition of exclusion from trial, &c. of persons interested).

LORD BRAMWELL said, he objected to the latter part of this clause, which entitled any girl or woman who might be concerned as complainant, defendant, or otherwise in a trial under the Bill, to have present at the trial any three persons she might name. He did not know how that part of the clause was to come into practical operation, or that there was any necessity for it, as, generally speaking, the girl would have her mother, or some relative or friend, with her. His objection to the other part of the clause was that it rather left a doubt upon a matter upon which there ought to be no doubt at all. No person could for a moment suppose that the general power of exclusion would go to the extent of excluding such persons as the counsel or solicitor, or any person whose presence was required for the purposes of the defence.

Amendment moved, "To leave out Clause 14."—(The Lord Bramwell.)

LORD COLERIDGE said, that words which, to a legal mind, might not seem necessary were often inserted in Acts of Parliament, in order to save all danger of misapprehension or misconstruction. The persons required for the purposes of the defence should, of course, in all cases, be allowed to be present. As to the other part of the clause, he had often seen cases in which a woman standing alone in Court, without any person of her own sex near her, was at a considerable disadvantage. Her right to have some persons to countenance her in the trial might be very useful.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND AND GORDON asked the noble and learned Earl on the Woolsack whether, by the first part of the clause, the Judge would be prevented from desiring a witness to leave the Court?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the clause did not take away any power which belonged to the Judge independent of the Act. He did not imagine anyone would think of excluding any person whose presence would be required for the purpose of the defence.

Amendment disagreed to.

On the Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendment made in the clause:—In page 8, line 3, after ("otherwise") insert ("or.")

On the Motion of The Earl of DALHOUSIE, the following Amendment made:—In page 8, after Clause 16; insert as a new clause:—

(Application of Act to Scotland.)

"In the application of this Act to Scotland—The expression 'misdemeanour' shall mean a crime and offence. The expression 'felony' shall mean a high crime and offence. The expression 'a justice of the peace,' and the expression 'two justices,' shall include sheriff and sheriff substitute. The expression 'the Summary Jurisdiction Acts' shall mean the Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Acts, 1864 and 1881, and any Acts amending the same. The expression 'enter into a recognizance with or without sureties,' shall mean grant a bond of caution. The expression 'owner' shall mean in relation to any premises the person entitled to receive the rent thereof, either on his own account or as a creditor in possession. The provisions of this Act with respect to serving notices shall be in addition to, and not in derogation of, the provisions of the Citation Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1882."

Lord Bramwell

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

RIBBLE NAVIGATION, PRESTON DOCK AND BOROUGH EXTENSION BILL (by Order).

CONSIDERATION OF LORDS AMENDMENTS.

Lords Amendments considered.

Amendments, as far as Clause 68A, agreed to.

Clause 68A read a second time.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS, in moving to amend the clause by adding the words—

“Provided always, That this section shall not apply to, or in any way affect, the foreshore, or any lands gained or reclaimed from the foreshore south-west of Crossens Channel, situate within the said township of North Meols.”

said, the question he desired to raise formed the sequel to a matter which came before the House recently in reference to the sale of the foreshore of Southport to the riparian owners. If the clause inserted by the House of Lords were passed as it stood, it would, as far as Southport was concerned, bring the question to a fatal termination. He did not propose to touch upon the merits of the dispute between the Duchy of Lancaster and the Corporation of Southport for several reasons. First, he held in his hand a letter from the Duchy of Lancaster, in which they said that they had had nothing whatever to do with the introduction of the clause which had been inserted in the Bill by the House of Lords; and, that being so, the Duchy was not prepared to take any part in the matter, either in favour or adversely. But he did not propose to introduce any question as between the Duchy and the Corporation of Southport for another and more important reason—namely, that the whole question as between the two bodies, the riparian owners and the Corporation of Southport, was in the hands of the Chancellor of the Duchy, who had promised, and was carrying out his promise, to use his good offices with a view of bringing the matter to a settlement. Therefore, while the matter was pending between the Corporation of Southport, the riparian owners, and the Duchy, and while it was possible that an arrangement might be arrived at which he hoped would lead to a settlement, he did not think it would be wise to introduce any contentious matter. He would only allude to certain simple facts to show the connection between the Southport foreshore and the Ribble Navigation Bill. As the House was probably aware, the amount of foreshore which was going to be sold to the riparian owners amounted to 9,000 acres. This amount was divided into two portions by a stream of considerable extent called Crossens Channel. That on the North-East of the Channel was the largest part, containing upwards of 5,000 acres, and with that part the Amendment he proposed to insert did not interfere in any way. The important part was that on the South and West of Crossens Channel, which comprised the whole of the foreshore of Southport. In other words, the borough of Southport extended right up to the Crossens Channel, and the whole of the foreshore covered by that space was necessary to the inhabitants of Southport, in order to give them access to the sea. Indeed, the whole of those 4,000 acres, with the exception of about 600, were, at the present moment, included in the borough boundary, and the whole of it, including the 600 acres, was directly in front of the borough. Since the year 1880, the Corporation of Southport had been in communication with the Duchy for the sale of its rights over these 4,000 acres, and the negotiations were carried on up to the month of April last, when negotiations were entered into and a sale partly completed with the landowners. He had no intention of entering into any dispute as to the Duchy. The Duchy considered that the negotiations were at an end, as far as the Corporation of Southport were concerned; but the Corporation did not so consider them at an end. The Duchy considered the sale to have been practically completed; the Corporation submitted that as the Seal of the Duchy had not been affixed the sale was really not completed. But, be that as it might, it would be unwise and unnecessary to introduce any dispute of this kind into the matter now before the House, which was quite upon another point. There had been communications in which the Chancellor of the Duchy had offered his good offices—communications from the Duchy to the Corporation, offering his mediation and arbitration. That offer, on the basis laid down, for various reasons had been declined. He held in his hand a letter from the Duchy, dated the 29th of June—quite recently—asking the Corporation of Southport to reconsider the question of arbitration, and to bring the matter before the Town Council. This letter had not yet been laid before the Southport Town Council; but it would be placed before them on Tuesday next. Then, on the other hand, there was a counter-offer from the Corporation to the landowners. The landowners gave £15,000 for the whole 9,000 acres, and the Corporation offered the whole of the purchase money—£15,000—for the smaller part—the 4,000 acres lying in front of their borough. To that offer there had been no official reply, so that the House would see there was an offer and a counter-offer still pending, and on that ground it would not be wise to drag the Duchy in any way into the discussion. But he would respectfully ask the House to consider what would happen if this clause were passed. It would give an absolutely statutory title to the two landowners in question; and therefore the good offices of the Duchy would be of no avail, because it would be impossible that they could exercise any of the powers they had now, seeing that the foreshore would have gone absolutely into the ownership of the two riparian proprietors. This state of affairs had been brought about by what he would venture to term a side wind. It had been brought about by a clause introduced into the Bill by the House of Lords. This year the Ribble Navigation Company—which was really the Corporation of the borough of Preston—had introduced a Bill which, among other things, was to improve the navigation of the River Ribble. Southport was in the Estuary of the Ribble, and Preston was 14 miles off up the River. Among other things, it was proposed to build training walls and a large embankment in the Estuary, and the effect of these works would be to reclaim the foreshore for a considerable distance from these training walls, seeing that even at present the water was very shallow over a great stretch. In the House of Lords the representatives of Southport were not allowed to oppose the Bill on the ground that they had no locus standi, and he wished particularly to state that their locus standi was refused on this ground—that the works of the Ribble Navigation Company were not likely to affect the borough of Southport or the foreshore of Southport. This clause consequently had been introduced into the Bill without the Corporation having the right to be heard against it, although it would give all the foreshore when reclaimed to the riparian owners. Now, Southport had no objection to the operation of these works so far as the immense tract of foreshore on the North-Eastern side of Crossens Channel went; but they did object to have their own foreshore handed over in the manner contemplated by this clause. If it was the case, as the promoters of the Bill alleged, that Southport would not be affected by these Ribble Navigation Works, and that there would be no accretion or reclamation of their foreshore; if that really were so, then the Amendment would do no harm, and all those who were of that opinion ought to vote for it, because it had been very carefully drawn, and with studied moderation, only for the purpose of saving that part of the foreshore which was in front of Southport. But, unfortunately, nearly all the scientific witnesses and the best engineers declared that the accretions would go beyond Crossens Channel and affect the foreshore in front of Southport; and Sir Frederick Bramwell went so far as to say that it would so reclaim the foreshore in front of Southport, as eventually to make Southport an inland town. Now, that was a very important consideration, seeing that the foreshore varied from one mile to two and a-half miles before it reached the Channel, and then beyond that were six miles of sand at low water. It was, therefore, very important that this should not happen, because Southport would have its whole character destroyed if what Sir Frederick Bramwell and other eminent engineers declared would happen should do so. But that was not all. In the clause inserted in the Lords, the two riparian landowners had not only got a statutory right given to them over all the accretions, which were the result of the works of the Ribble Navigation Company; but they positively had a right given to them to all reclamations by any other means, so that any reclamations which might take place from any cause whatsoever would belong to them. The only object of his Amendment was to save the foreshore of Southport, and to put it in precisely the same position it was in now. It did not confer any rights upon Southport; but it left the matter open, so that Southport might have the advantage of the good offices which the Chancellor of the Duchy was now exercising in the matter. Nor was it antagonistic to the interests of the town of Preston. No interference was asked for with that part of the foreshore on the North side of the Crossens Channel or otherwise outside their own limit, and all that immense tract would remain just as open to the operation of the Preston works as now. If the House would allow him, he thought he could not do better than read a letter just received from the Corporation of Southport on this important point and signed by the Town Clerk. The letter stated—

“A report is being industriously circulated to the effect that the Amendment contemplated to the Lords Amendments in this Bill is directed against the Corporation of Preston. Such a report is entirely contrary to the fact.”

This was the important part of the letter—

“The promoters of this Navigation Bill have never pretended that it was necessary for them to acquire, reclaim, or in any way deal with any foreshore in front or comprised within the limits of our own borough. Had they done so, there is no doubt that we shall have to be allowed a locus standi in the House of Lords. On the contrary, the Lords Committee threw us out on the ground that we were not affected by the work. What we object to is the Corporation of Preston coming into the borough of Southport without notice and handing over to owners whose interests are opposed to those of the inhabitants a foreshore which, in the opinion of the Corporation of Southport, it is desirable should be in their hands, and which is not and cannot be contended is in any way necessary for the purpose of the promoters of the Bill.”

That letter settled the question as to any injury done by the works contemplated by the borough of Preston. No doubt, Preston relied on the reclamation of land to recoup themselves, to a great extent, for the money they laid out; but, seeing that they would have the whole of the land on the North side of the Channel, which constituted by far the major part, and that they further contended that no land would be reclaimed in front of the Southport foreshore, he thought they had no reason to complain. A circular had been sent out by the representatives of the landowners. He was told that the landowners themselves did not wish to appear in the matter, but only through the name and medium of their agents; but, seeing the part they were taking in reference to the borough of Southport, he thought the responsibility should be thrown on Messrs. Hesketh and Scarisbrick for the hard manner in which they were dealing with the borough of Southport. The letter stated the facts; but, for the reason he had given, as affecting the Duchy, he did not propose to touch that part of the communication. The letter went on to say—

“The landowners have been in possession of this foreshore from time immemorial. That has not been disputed by the Duchy itself. It has been disputed by Southport, and disputed more strongly than by anyone else by the Corporation of Preston during the passage of the Bill through the Commons, and there is no doubt of this—that the borough of Southport was willing to buy the rights of the Duchy, subject to any lawsuit the landowners might think proper to bring forward. But if any proof were wanted as to that, it is given in the Report of the Proceedings in the House of Commons.”

[Cries of “Divide!”] He would not keep the House long, but would confine his remarks within the simplest possible compass; and as the Bill affected the well-being, the prosperity, and the very life of a town of 40,000 or 50,000 people, he hardly thought the House would be of opinion that he was trespassing upon their indulgence. The counsel for the Preston Corporation stated in the Committee Room of the House of Commons that the Duchy had sold these rights to them; and there was no doubt that there was an arrangement in the House of Commons by which the rights of the Duchy of Lancaster were to be sold to the Corporation of Preston. That was afterwards altered, and the rights of the Duchy were sold to the riparian owners. There was another point also stated—namely, that the riparian owners were willing to sell the foreshore in front of the Promenade of Southport for a small consideration. Now, that statement was altogether evasive, because what the riparian owners really offered to sell was a small piece—less than 100 acres out of 4,000; and that 100 coupled with such conditions that no Corporation, having the interests of the borough at heart, could possibly agree to. He knew it would be contended by the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) that some time ago the Corporation of Southport admitted the rights of the riparian owners, by paying them for a small piece of land. That took place as long ago as 1876, when the Corporation bought a small piece of land, of 120 acres, from the Duchy for a sum of £340, whereupon the landowners put in a claim of £20,000 for their rights in connection with it, which they ultimately reduced to £7,000. If that argument was to be used, he would ask the House to consider the danger in which the Corporation of Southport was placed. If the landowners, for a small piece of land, 120 acres in extent, with their defective claim and disputed title, asked £20,000, although the Duchy were willing to sell it for £340, what would they not be likely to compel the Corporation of Southport to pay for 4,000 acres, if they had an undisputed title? He would not occupy the House longer; but he would simply point out that this was a national question, as well as a local one. It was a national question, because all the open spaces in the country, and particularly the foreshores—that was the part lying between high and low water mark—ought to be preserved for the people—he would not say without proper consideration for all existing rights—but preserved and placed in the hands of the boroughs for the benefit of the people who lived in front of the foreshores. It was a local question also, because Southport was one of the most growing towns in the North of England. It was the great health resort for a district which comprised 4,000,000 inhabitants, and it had been described as the sanatorium of that part of the country. He was informed that no less than 20 municipal boroughs had passed resolutions—many of them boroughs in Lancashire—praying that Parliament would help Southport in this matter; and, besides these corporate bodies, there had been Petitions from no less than 40 local bodies, making altogether 60 representative bodies which had passed resolutions upon the question in favour of the action of Southport. Besides that, there had been a Memorial sent to the Prime Minister, signed by 62 Members of Parliament on both sides of the House, for the question was not looked upon as being in any respect a Party one. He believed—in fact, he might emphatically state—from what he had heard from hon. Members on both sides, that their sympathies were entirely in favour of the release of Southport from the false position in which it had been placed by the Amendment inserted by the House of Lords. He was sorry the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was not in his place, because he had openly expressed strong sympathy with the Corporation in the position in which it stood. There was one other point he wished to refer to. A paper—which he held in his hand—had been circulated by the Ribble Navigation Commissioners, appealing to the House of Commons, on the ground that the clause had not yet been passed by both Houses of Parliament, and asking them to resist what they called “an insidious attempt” to upset the conclusion arrived at by a Committee of the House of Commons, as well as by a Committee of the House of Lords. Now, that was not a true statement of facts. This clause was introduced in the House of Lords. As the Bill left the House of Commons, it was in a different position altogether, the difference being that, when the measure left the Committee of the Commons, the whole of the foreshore was vested in the borough of Preston, with a right of pre-emption to any landowner who would have to prove his title; and the effect of the Amendment introduced by the Lords was, that two landowners were named by name, and an absolute title given to them. He was sure there would be no harm done to the borough of Preston, or to the Ribble Navigation Company, by the proposal which he made, because the Bill would simply go back to the House of Lords to have the clause amended, and the Corporation of Southport were advised that the Lords had introduced this Amendment under a misapprehension, and upon a statement that the rights of Southport would not be affected by it. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

At the end of the Clause, to add the words “Provided always, That this section shall not apply to or in any way affect the foreshore or any lands gained or reclaimed from the foreshore south-west of Crossens Channel, situate within the said township of North Meols.”—(Mr. Jesse Collings.)

MR. ECROYD said, he was quite sure that no public body in the country felt a stronger interest in the welfare of the great community of Southport, and in everything that would affect the well-being of the place as a health resort, than the Corporation and the inhabitants of the neighbouring town of Preston. It was, therefore, quite needless that he should disclaim on their behalf the slightest disposition to inflict, directly or indirectly, the smallest injury on Southport. The difficulty he found in replying to the observations of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings), who had introduced the Amendment, was that his statements were almost entirely extraneous to the question before the House. In the first place, he proposed to occupy as little of the time of the House as possible by refraining from entering upon matters which were really not relevant to the point at issue. The first great point of the hon. Member's speech, as to whether it was desirable that Southport should acquire those rights in the foreshore which were legally vested in the lords of the manor, was a question on which the decision of the House this afternoon would have no influence whatever. Everybody would, no doubt, be very happy to see Southport in full possession of all rights to the foreshore, which in future might affect it as a place of health resort. But Southport must obtain them by legal methods; in fact, by the only method open to those who wished to obtain rights of more or less value which were vested in other people. The facts of the case at the present moment were that, by whatever process it might have been arrived at, the rights to the foreshore of the Estuary of the Ribble were vested in the lords of the manor. It would have been a very pleasant matter for the Corporation of Southport to find that they were possessed of the whole right to the foreshore; and, in the same way, it was desirable for them, if possible, to become possessors of those rights, and thus become the lords of the manor themselves. But such was not the case. His contention was that nothing contained in the Ribble Navigation Bill, or in the Amendments introduced into it by the House of Lords, did, in the smallest degree, affect the question of the rights of the ownership of the foreshore. As to the question of title, there was no doubt that there had been a dispute as to the ownership of the foreshore; but that dispute had not been between the Corporation of Preston and the Corporation of Southport on the one hand, and the Duchy of Lancaster and the riparian owners on the other, but simply a dispute between the Duchy of Lancaster and the riparian owners; and at no time, and under no circumstances, had the Corporation of Southport been able to assert the smallest claim to those rights. They had been passive spectators of the dispute between the Duchy of Lancaster and the riparian owners, and the dispute had been ended by the sale of all the rights of the Duchy to the riparian owners, making them completely and conclusively the owners of the foreshore. They could not go behind that fact by any change which the Lords could make. In regard to the Amendment which had been introduced by the Lords, that Amendment did not, in the slightest degree, touch the rights of ownership. He should be unreasonable if he were to occupy the time of the House on an occasion of that kind by replying in detail to the speech of the hon. Member for Ipswich, and reading aloud the clauses contained in Acts of times past affecting Preston and Southport; but in all of them, on every occasion, the Corporations of those towns had entirely disclaimed any right to the foreshore. Preston found itself at the present moment excluded from all right to the foreshore, not only by clauses in Acts of Parliament, but by clauses introduced into deeds for the purchase of small plots of land from the lords of the manor. The same thing had been done in the case of Southport for other purposes, and this fact utterly cut away all possibility on the part of that Corporation of establishing any claim whatever to the foreshore. The next point had reference to any possible damage to the interests of Southport by the execution of the works of the Ribble Navigation; and in regard to that matter he might say that the decision arrived at by the House that day would in no respect affect the carrying out the works of the Ribble Navigation. If these terrible consequences to the well-being, prosperity, and actual life of this community of 40,000 persons were to be brought about by the execution of the Ribble Navigation Works, these works would, nevertheless, be executed in precisely the same manner, whether the House accepted or rejected the Amendment, because the Amendment did not affect the works at all, but only dealt with a matter of trivial importance—namely, whether the owners of the manor and foreshore should pay some small pecuniary acknowledgment to the Corporation of Preston in respect of any incidental advantages that would accrue to them in the increased value of their land by the execution of these works. It would neither confirm nor shake the ownership of the foreshore, nor alter the time or manner of carrying out the works of the Ribble Navigation, by anything that was done that day. When he said that he thought he had said enough to show that there was no real ground upon which the Corporation of Southport could ask the House to interfere in the matter in order to go behind the established rights of the lords of the manor as owners of the foreshore, and to enter upon ground in regard to which there had already been a distinct decision by a Committee of the House of Lords, that the Corporation of Southport had no locus standi whatever, because Southport possessed no possible rights. Under these circumstances, he hoped the House would arrive at the conclusion that they ought to agree with the Lords' Amendment, and to reject that of the hon. Member for Ipswich.

MR. LEAKE said, he had listened very carefully to the remarks of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) but he thought they were entirely beside the Amendment before the House. The Corporation of Preston, who were the promoters of this Bill, had got rid of the locus standi of the Corporation of Southport by denying that any land would be reclaimed in front of the borough of Southport, and then by stating that they did not propose to make a rent charge for any land reclaimed in front of that borough on the Corporation of Southport, but on the lords of the manor. They also opposed the locus standi of the Corporation of Southport by offering to make deviations in their own training walls, in order to avoid interfering with the outlet of the sewage of Southport. Now, in the reclamation of the land which was anticipated to arise from the execution of these works, and for which a rent charge was to be made, the outlet of the sewage of Southport must, undoubtedly, be interfered with. The reclamation itself was of an unknown and uncertain character, and it could not be said that the sewage of Southport was in no danger from it. The hon. Member who had just spoken said that Preston had a great interest in Southport; but Preston had a greater interest in itself, and, in all human affairs, the Corporation of Preston would take care of themselves first, and of their neighbour Southport afterwards. What did the Corporation of Southport want? They had no desire to destroy this Bill, or to prevent the improvement of the Ribble Navigation. They did not seek to claim rights over the foreshore. Those rights were truly said to be vested manorially in the lords of the manor, who had legal manorial rights, and the Corporation of Southport did not seek to interfere with those legal manorial rights. But they asked the House to avoid being betrayed into giving rights over the foreshore which did not now exist, by putting a clause into the Preston Act which would give statutory rights to the owners of the manorial rights—rights which were not enjoyed at the present moment, and which were entirely opposed to the interests of Southport. The Corporation of Southport were at this moment in friendly negotiation with the lords of the manor, under the auspices of his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. At present the lords of the manor, very naturally, stood upon their manorial rights; but why should Parliament give them stronger rights on which to stand during the pending negotiations by conferring upon them statutory rights? He humbly submitted that Parliament ought not to do so. It was said that the Corporation of Preston objected to give up the rent charge they would obtain from the land reclaimed by their operations—a certain rent which would be obtained from the land which might be reclaimed from the sea in the neighbourhood of Southport. Now, Southport had no interest in throwing up land between her own town and the sea; whereas Preston had thus an interest in creating as much land as possible between Southport and the sea. In considering the interests of Southport, the fact should not be overlooked that the inhabitants of Southport had converted barren sand hills into one of the most valuable properties in Lancashire; and that fact ought to outweigh the policy of preserving ancient manorial rights, and especially of extending them by a side wind, so as to infringe the growing rights of the inhabitants of Southport. He thought the argument ought not to be pressed that the Corporation of Southport had no interest in this land; but they ought to be, as they had made themselves in regard to these barren sand hills, the absolute dispensers of the future fortunes of the inhabitants of the borough of Southport. On this simple ground, and with no desire to make any assault on the rights of property, he and other hon. Members were there that day anxious to interpose between the inhabitants of Southport and a new claim, which would be, in the highest degree, detrimental to their interests. He willingly supported the Proviso moved by the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Jesse Collings).

MR. TOMLINSON said, he could not help thinking it was a great pity that the time of the House should be taken up in a discussion of this kind, under circumstances which rendered it quite impossible for hon. Members to come to a conclusion on the points which had been brought forward by the hon. Member who moved the Amendment. Before he said a few words in regard to the position of the Ribble Navigation Bill and the town of Preston, he wished to deal with a matter to which the hon. Member who had just spoken had referred. The first point brought forward by the hon. Member was that the Corporation of Southport, when the question of their locus standi was fought in the House of Lords, were deprived of that locus standi, because it was said that no land of theirs would be reclaimed. Now, that was an entire misapprehension. The reason why the Corporation of Southport were not allowed a locus standi in the House of Lords was that they could not show they had any interest in the foreshore of Southport. They were allowed a locus standi in the House of Commons, because, as the Bill stood when it was before that House, the scheme would to some extent have interfered with the outlet of the sewage of Southport. They also claimed to be heard on the ground of having some interest in the foreshore; but that claim was disallowed. The Bill was carried through a Committee of the House of Commons, and, in the end, a clause was introduced defining the rights of the Corporation of Preston, of the lords of the manor, and of the Duchy of Lancaster, in any lands that might be reclaimed by the works to be carried out by the Corporation of Preston. That clause was, however, so framed that the Corporation of Southport were entirely excluded from its operation. If, then, the Corporation of Southport claimed any interest in the foreshore, the proper time to assert that claim was when the Bill was read a third time in the House of Commons. That was their opportunity; but they had not availed themselves of it. The Bill went to the House of Lords, and the only change made there was a slight modification of the mode in which the rights of the Corporation of Preston and the lords of the manor were defined. The Corporation of Southport, therefore, were in as good a position for bringing forward a complaint that their rights had been disregarded by the House of Commons as to ask for a reconsideration of the treatment which their claims had met with in the House of Lords. It had been suggested that land in front of the borough of Southport might be reclaimed by carrying into effect the Ribble Navigation Scheme, and that the town might be injured by the use made of it. The answer to that was that, if it were the case, the people of Southport had the power of protecting themselves, because they had the option of purchasing the whole of the foreshore in front of the town at a nominal price from the lords of the manor, upon the sole condition that no buildings should be placed upon it. He did not think it would be right to weary the House by going into details which could not be understood; and he would, therefore, say no more, except to urge that the House would do well to assert the principle that when Corporations and Companies came before Parliament to obtain sanction for great schemes of public importance, and when they had carried their Bills through in a regular way, and had dealt with the claims of all persons whom the Standing Orders required that they should take notice of, the decision of the two Houses of Parliament to which the Bill had been referred should be upheld. He trusted that the House would support the Standing Orders, which had hitherto worked beneficially in protecting the rights of private individuals, and that they would not accept the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Ipswich.

MR. DILLWYN said, he had no wish to enter into any question between the borough of Preston and the borough of Southport; but he desired to explain, in a few words, why, upon public grounds, he should support the Amendment. He thought that this question of foreshores was of great public interest; indeed, the interest the public had in the foreshores of the country was so great that proposals for dealing with them would be best brought forward, not in Private, but in Public Bills. He held that all the foreshores were public property, and that the commoners had a right of access to them. The manorial owners, and so forth, who held so many of the common rights of the people, should be prohibited from preventing the access of the public to all the foreshores round the coast. He, for one, always strongly objected to any measure that would interfere with the rights and interests of the people in the foreshores; and the House of Commons ought to be especially watchful to prevent the abrogation of the public right to common land. It had been said that in this case there was an indisputable right on the part of the lords of the manor to the ownership of the foreshore; but he had seen a good deal of correspondence on that subject, from which it appeared that there was anything but an indisputable right. Both the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster and the lords of the manor claimed rights to the foreshore, and they seemed to have been disputed rights. It was now, however, proposed to insert this clause in a Private Bill in order to clear away this difficulty, and to give statutory rights to the lords of the manor which they did not now possess. Under these circumstances, and upon public grounds, he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Ipswich.

MR. GORST said, that nothing could possibly be more unfortunate than the account of the Bill which had just been given by the hon. Member for Swansea

(Mr. Dillwyn). The Bill did not give anybody any right to any foreshore at all, and much less did it cut off the right of access of the commoners and the people to the sea shore. There was no provision of the kind contained in the Bill; but the clause which had been put in by the House of Lords was simply a clause giving the Corporation of Preston a claim to certain royalties from the people who owned the foreshore, in consequence of the improvement of their property likely to be effected by the works of the Corporation. It was a simple clause to oblige persons who received the benefit of the works to pay for that benefit in the shape of a royalty. The only effect of the Amendment would be that, on this particular part of the foreshore, the people who happened to own the foreshore would get the benefit of the works undertaken for the improvement of the navigation of the Ribble without paying for it. It would do no good whatever to the locality; it would only do good to the people who happened to own the foreshore on that part of the coast. The riparian owners would have the advantage of the execution of the works of the Preston Corporation without paying for it; and for that reason he should certainly vote against the Amendment.

MR. SLAGG said, the hon. and learned Member who had just spoken seemed to be of opinion that the Bill would give to the riparian owners absolute proprietary rights over this foreshore. That was a very serious matter. They had merely a manorial right at the present time—a right of an exceedingly shadowy character. He differed entirely from the view of his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) that this manorial right was equal to a proprietary right. It could not be a proprietary right of a very sufficient character, inasmuch as it had already been a subject of litigation and dispute between the Duchy of Lancaster and the Corporation of Southport of a very complex nature. The whole foreshore question was open to legal argument; and a claim of proprietorship, based upon a lawsuit, appeared to him to be not of a very stable character. It was perfectly true that an ownership had been acknowledged to this extent—that, on the sale of some of the disputed property, payments had been made by the Corporation of Southport and others; but those payments had been made not as a necessary acknowledgment of proprietary rights, but, as in many other cases, as a sort of black mail for the purpose of avoiding litigation. What would this clause do? It would remove that claim out of the shadowy region of legal dispute into the solid form of a proprietary right. Like the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), he was speaking entirely in the public interests; he had no personal interest in the question whatever, and he might say that his chief locus standi in the matter consisted in this—that his own Corporation of the borough of Manchester had petitioned the House of Commons against the clause on the ground that there were millions of working people in Lancashire who were interested in the question, seeing that Southport was a place of sanitary resort, and the favourite place at the seaside to which they could go and enjoy themselves. It was of the greatest consequence to those persons that the sea should be left open to them; and this clause, if passed, might place it in the power of certain landowners to build property, possibly to the extent of a new town, between the borough of Southport and the sea. He could not conceive a question of graver public importance. He was pleased to hear his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) declare that, whatever course the House took in regard to this clause, it would make no difference whatever to the Corporation of Preston. He should be sorry, for one, to take any action that would militate against the interests of Preston; he was very much interested in the progress, advancement, and everything that tended to improve the position of Preston; but he was satisfied that if the House passed the Bill as it now stood, it would, without benefiting Preston, inflict a serious injury upon the town of Southport.

COLONEL STANLEY said, the House was anxious, naturally, to divide on the question, and he thought the main points had been already so clearly explained both by his hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) and by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), that he did not think it would be necessary to go back upon them or attempt to deal with them.

He only rose now to point out that an expression which the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) had made use of—namely, that certain payments had been levied as a sort of black mail upon the Corporation of Southport in other cases—was one that was not really borne out by the facts of the case. If they looked back to the Acts passed in former years, such as the Southport Improvement Act, which was the Act of 1871, they would find in Section 213 a declaration that nothing contained in the Act was in any manner to injure, prejudice, or in any other way affect the rights of property and so forth in respect of the shore or the bed of the sea, which were reported to belong to, or were exercised and enjoyed by, the Trustees of the Scarisbrick Estate. The Act of 1876 incorporated the same provision, and in 1878, in a conveyance to the Corporation of a portion of the land to the north of the town, there was a provision that nothing therein contained should be held to give to the Corporation or their assigns any right to, or interest in, the soil or bed of the foreshore of the sea. Then it was said that the lords of the manor desired to levy black mail, and to shut out from the people of Southport their enjoyment of the sea, which was the very life of the town. He believed he was justified in saying that the riparian owners had in all respects submitted themselves in the most entire and open way to the arbitration which his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had proposed, and they were perfectly willing to give, at a merely nominal price, the whole extent of the foreshore in front of the town. [Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: No!] That was what he was informed; but, of course, with the usual reservation that such land was not to be built upon. Therefore, as far as the sea was concerned, that question was completely answered. He did not rise so much for the purpose of going into these matters as to express a hope that the debate would not be allowed to conclude without a few words from the Chancellor of the Duchy to say how he viewed the question. Of course, he could understand that his right hon. Friend had a delicate duty to discharge in respect of the matter, seeing that he was holding out the prospect of arbitration with the lords of the manor on the one side and the Corporation of Southport on the other. He hoped that the Chancellor of the Duchy would be able to tell the House that it was his intention to support the Bill as it came down from the House of Lords, and to reject the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Ipswich.

MR. DODSON said, his right hon. and gallant Friend who had just sat down had appealed to him to express to the House his opinion in regard to the Amendment which had been moved to the clause inserted by the House of Lords in the Ribble Navigation Bill. Placed, as he was, in the position of having offered to mediate or bring about an arbitration between the two parties concerned—namely, the riparian owners and the Corporation of Southport, he should not have wished to take any part that might seem to be adverse to one party or the other; but he would candidly express his opinion, as he was called upon to do so; and he thought he could do so in a manner that would not be adverse to one party or the other. Before he went on to state what his views were, he wished to correct an observation which had fallen from the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), and from the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg). The position was simply this. The title to this particular foreshore was in dispute between the Duchy of Lancaster and the riparian proprietors, and the Duchy settled the question by selling their claim to the parties who claimed adversely to them. That, he thought, would be regarded by those who were disposed to take a dispassionate view of the question as a very reasonable way of settling the difficulty. [Cries of "No!"] He ventured to think that it was, and most hon. Gentlemen would be glad to follow such an example, if they could do so, in any case in which they were personally concerned. But, then, his hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) said, in effect—"You are thereby taking the foreshore away from the public, and placing it under private control." That was an absolute and entire mistake. The negotiations between the Duchy and the riparian owners did not affect one jot or tittle of the rights of the public over the foreshore. The law was strictly this—no owner, not even the Crown, whatever his title might be, could deal with the foreshore either to build upon it, enclose upon it, reclaim it, exclude the public from it, or exercise any new right over it, unless he obtained an Act of Parliament for that purpose. No transaction between the Duchy and the riparian proprietors conferred such a right upon the riparian proprietors; and this Ribble Navigation Bill conferred upon them no such power, or, indeed, any power whatever, in regard to this foreshore. The Bill provided for the contingency of reclamation arising from the navigation works which, under its authority, might hereafter be constructed by the Corporation of Preston; and it provided generally that such reclamations should vest in the Corporation of Preston. [Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: No!] As regarded the foreshore generally, it provided that any reclamations should vest in the Corporation of Preston. [Mr. JESSE COLLINGS: No!] He said "Yes!" but subject to certain payments to be made to the adjoining proprietors. In regard to this particular part of the foreshore—namely, that within the Manor of North Meols—which the House was now dealing with, the Bill provided conversely that any reclamations upon it should vest in the riparian proprietors, subject to certain payments to be made by them to the Corporation of Preston. How did that affect Southport, whichever way it was? In neither case would the reclamations on the foreshore be vested in the Corporation of Southport. In the one case it vested in the Corporation of Preston, subject to a payment to the owners; in the other case, it vested in the owners, subject to a payment to the Corporation of Preston. If the Amendment of the hon. Member for Ipswich were carried it would vest the last-named reclamation in the Corporation of Preston, with a right of pre-emption on the part of the riparian owners. He did not see how that could benefit the Corporation of Southport. And now let him say one word as to the clause in regard to the manner in which it affected the public, and its bearing upon the mediation or arbitration which he was endeavouring to bring about. The whole basis and raison d'être of the mediation he had offered, and the arbitration he had proposed, was that the riparian proprietors were the owners of the foreshore, within the limits of the manor; and his mediation or arbitration was offered as to the terms upon which the Corporation of Southport should be allowed to acquire that foreshore, or some part of it, from those who were the owners of it. Such being the case, his mediation or arbitration was not at all affected by the allegation that in consequence of this Bill the title of the owners of this foreshore was a little better or a little worse. The position of the Duchy was this. The riparian owners owned the foreshore, and were legally the rightful owners of it, subject to the rights of the public which had always existed over it; and it was on that basis exclusively that his mediation and arbitration was to take place. That being the case, he did not feel in any way called upon to do otherwise than support the Ribble Navigation Bill, as it had been approved by Parliament. In doing so, he was not of opinion that he would injure the position of the Corporation of Southport, nor would the Amendment of the hon. Member for Ipswich improve it; nor would that Amendment at all influence the basis of the arbitration, which rested on the assumption that the riparian proprietors were the rightful owners of the foreshore.

MR. RAIKES said, he should not have supposed, at a time when they were told that Parliament was so unprecedentedly overtasked in the performance of its ordinary duties, that the House would have been invited to try a very difficult question of private title. He thought that considerable ingenuity had been exercised in finding a peg on which to hang a debate upon the question of the Southport foreshore; and, after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy, the House would perceive that the matter raised by the Amendment was entirely different from the questions which the right hon. Gentleman was endeavouring to mediate upon between the Town Council of Southport and the riparian owners. The question, as put by the right hon. Gentleman, and by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), appeared to be simply this—whether the Amendment introduced in the Bill by the House of Lords, which vested a portion of the reclaimed land in the riparian owners, subject to the rights of the Corporation of Preston to receive certain payments, was to stand, or whether it was to revert, as far as the foreshore was concerned, back to the arrangement made when the Bill was in the House of Commons, by which the reclaimed land was to vest in the Corporation of Preston, subject to certain rights which might accrue to the riparian owners. His hon. Friend the Member for Preston (Mr. Ecroyd) disclaimed any wish to obtain any advantage for the town of Preston at the expense of the riparian owners; and the promoters of the Bill had acted loyally by the agreement entered into when the Bill was before a Committee of the House of Lords; but if the House were to pass the present Amendment, it seemed to him that they would be taking advantage of the fact of an alteration which was scarcely more than one of a verbal character which had been made in the House of Lords with the consent of the Committee of that House, and with that of the only parties who were qualified to appear before that Committee, in order to re-open a question which the Committee of the House of Commons was precluded, owing to the rules of locus standi, from entertaining when the Bill was before them. Now, was that a dignified mode of proceeding? He ventured to think that, if they were to re-try all these questions of great detail, they would be placed in a position of extreme difficulty, for this was a question which could hardly be made intelligible to any Member without a map. The hon. Gentleman who introduced the Motion, although he made a most elaborate speech, did not pretend to give more than the briefest outline of the case; and after the Bill had been carefully considered by Committees of both Houses, were they now to re-open it on the floor of the House of Commons, and to pronounce an opinion upon a matter in regard to which Committees of both Houses had arrived at a careful conclusion upon evidence and data which was accessible to them, but which was not accessible to Members of that House?

MR. CHEETHAM said, he rose to correct a mis-statement which had been made by the junior Member for Preston (Mr. Tomlinson), and which had been repeated by the right hon. and gallant Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley), to the effect that an offer was made by the lords of the manor, at a nominal price, of the whole of the foreshore to the Corporation of Southport. Now, the offer made had reference only to a small portion of the foreshore immediately opposite the Promenade; but the borough of Southport extended in a north-easterly direction considerably beyond that point; and if the offer was to be of any use, it ought to cover the whole of the 4,000 acres in dispute. He spoke on this matter from an intimate personal knowledge of Southport; and his conviction was that the acquisition of this portion of the foreshore was of the most vital consequence to the borough. It was of the utmost importance that the borough should be in a position to develop freely and readily in a seaward direction, and it could alone do that by becoming the proprietor of this foreshore. It was said that there was little difference made in the position of Southport by the operation of this clause; but there was this difference—that the clause inserted in the Commons vested the reclaimed land in the Corporation of Preston, with a right of pre-emption to the owners of the ancient freeholds who could show a title to the foreshore. If Southport, therefore, through the good offices of the Chancellor of the Duchy, acquired that right, it would have obtained a right of pre-emption from the Corporation of Preston. Under the clause inserted in the Bill in the House of Lords that position was altogether reversed. The reclaimed land was vested in the lords of the manor, and to that extent the Bill gave a Parliamentary title, to the prejudice of the town of Southport. He believed that the position of Southport would be very seriously prejudiced if this clause were adopted, and the Corporation of Southport had to deal with the riparian owners instead of the Corporation of Preston.

MR. TOMLINSON rose to explain, as the statement he had made had been disputed.

MR. SPEAKER ruled that the hon. Member, having already addressed the House, was out of Order.

ENNERDALE RAILWAY BILL [Lords.]

(by Order.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. AINSWORTH said, he was sorry to trespass upon the House after so much time had already been taken up in considering the previous Bill; but he was intimately acquainted with the district in which it was proposed to carry this railway; and, being satisfied that no public advantage could be gained by the Bill, he felt called upon to move that it be read a second time upon that day three months. There was a line of railway in the district which was now worked by the London and North-Western Railway Company; and this projected line was to run from that line by the side of Ennerdale Lake for a mile and a-half to the head of the Lake. The locality was very thinly populated; there were only one or two small farms; the population was very limited; and there were no mines or minerals which were worked on the line of the proposed railway. In point of fact, the district was somewhat similar to that for which another Bill was projected this year, but withdrawn—namely, the Buttermere Railway Bill. In many respects the two districts were similar in character; but the Buttermere Line led to a large slate quarry, which was in operation. That Bill was withdrawn, owing to the Petitions presented against it, in consequence of the damage it would do to the scenery. His principal objection to the proposed line was that it was unnecessary, and that it was not introduced in the interests of the inhabitants of the locality. Looking at the Bill itself, he found that it bore upon it, as the names of its promoters, a solicitor in the Strand and two other persons, both of whom resided in the City of London. No local names whatever were appended to the Bill; and he could not find that any individual connected with the county of Cumberland was promoting the measure in any way. It was promoted for some purpose at present unknown to him, and, he believed, entirely unknown to the locality. He thought these grounds afforded a sufficient reason for asking the House to agree to the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."—(Mr. Ainsworth.)

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the proposal made by the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Ainsworth) was one of the most extraordinary he had ever heard made by any Member of the House; and he had certainly heard a great many extraordinary proposals during the time he had been a Member of Parliament. This was a Bill for the construction of a railroad in the county of Cumberland, and it had already passed the House of Lords without opposition. It now came down to the House of Commons, and its only opponent was the hon. Member. The hon. Member had petitioned against the Bill, and the reason he gave to justify his Petition was that it proposed to go through a field which belonged to him—a field of common pasture, worth about 10s. an acre. The hon. Member asserted that the railway was proposed to be constructed for a considerable distance through his property; that it would affect it injuriously by severance, &c., and that the railway intersected one field to the extent of four acres. Upon this flimsy pretext, the hon. Member got up in that House, contrary to all the Rules which had hitherto regulated their procedure upon Private Bills, and moved the rejection of the Bill. After all, if the allegations of the hon. Member in his Petition were fully established, the question was simply one of residential or occupation damage, which, as everyone knew, was a fit and proper question to be decided by a Committee of the House. Therefore, without any further observations, he thought he might confidently call upon hon. Members to reject the Amendment.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that it was hardly necessary to say that he had no interest in this matter, nor did he imagine that his hon. Friend who moved the Amendment was very much interested in it, as a question of private interest. But he thought that the public interest was considerably concerned in the line, and in all railways of this kind. It was a railway, as far as he could make out, which had no particular public object, either in regard to the carriage of goods or passengers; but it would have the result of spoiling one of the most beautiful portions of the Lake scenery. [Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: No!] He begged the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. That would be the case. It would go on the North side of Ennerdale Lake, and would very considerably damage the beauty of the Lake. No doubt, it might be said that this was a question which could be decided by a Committee; but, by an unfortunate arrangement of Public Business, the public were not represented upon Committees of this character, and he did not know whether his hon. Friend the Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Ainsworth), even by the help of the position he occupied as owner of this field, would be entitled to raise this question before the Committee. It was for the House of Commons to say, on the second reading of a Bill of this character, whether they desired that the best and most beautiful portions of English scenery should be spoiled without any public or private reason being assigned. It was upon that ground that the Amendment had been moved. He would not further detain the House; but if his hon. Friend carried his Amendment to a Division he would certainly support him.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 150; Noes 143: Majority 7.—(Div. List, No. 167.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

MOTIONS.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDERS BILLS.—RESOLUTIONS.

Ordered, That the Electric Lighting Provisional Orders Bill, the Electric Lighting Provisional Orders (No. 4) Bill, and the Electric Lighting Provisional Orders (No. 5) Bill, be committed to a Select Committee to consist of Seven Members, Four to be nominated by the House, and Three to be added by the Committee of Selection.

"That, subject to the Rules, Orders, and Practice of the House, all Petitions against the Bills, or Orders, be referred to the Select Committee on the Bills, and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petition, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bills, against such Petitions."—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN said, this Motion had only appeared upon the Paper that day; and, therefore, not knowing that it was to be proposed, it had been impossible for him to place on the Paper the Amendment which he was about to move. When the Bill was read a second time yesterday he asked his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade (Mr. J. Holms) what the intentions of the Board of Trade were in regard to it; and his hon. Friend informed him that it was intended to refer the Bill to a Hybrid Committee, in order that the Petitions against it might be considered, and that the Petitioners might appear before the Committee. With that reply he was perfectly satisfied; but it appeared now, from the unusual words which had been inserted in the Resolution, that the power of the Petitioners to appear before the Committee would be very limited. He feared, although it did not appear to be quite certain, that the words "subject to the Rules, Orders, and Practice of the House," might and would exclude Petitioners in general from being heard before the Committee. Now, he thought that would be an extreme act of injustice. They were, in fact, only upon the threshold of this great question of Electric Lighting; and he might say that the question as it affected the carrying out of Electric Lighting in a practical way had not yet been fully considered and thrashed out by any Committee of that House. He had said that the words were unusual. He had with him a good many cases—almost, he believed, precisely parallel to this—in which the Reference was that all Petitions that might be presented during the Session relating to the matter should be referred to the Committee, and—

"That such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents shall be heard,"

He quoted that passage from a very important case—that of "The East London Water Bill" in 1867. He had other cases at hand; but he would not weary the House by referring to them. There were, however, precedents, going down to the 2nd May last, in which similar References had been made without the insertion of these words "subject to the Rules, Orders, and Practice of the House." He thought it was in the interests of the public that this question should be thoroughly thrashed out; and he feared that if the Reference to the Committee was in the form in which it now stood, full consideration would not be devoted to it before a Committee. He thought it would only be a simple act of justice to the inhabitants of a parish that if the lighting of that parish was going, by a Provisional Order, to be practically assigned to a particular Company for 21 years, the inhabitants of the parish should have the right to be heard, in order to see whether any better bargain could be made in reference to the lighting of the district. It appeared to him that they were proceeding much too fast in this matter. It was entirely a new question, and yet throughout the whole of England the local authorities appeared to be pledging themselves, and pledging the inhabitants of their district, to the adoption of particular schemes, without being informed that better and cheaper schemes might hereafter be practicable. At any rate, they had a case here, in which two very large districts, possessing an enormous population, were concerned—namely, the districts of St. James and of the Strand, and the inhabitants of those districts desired to be heard before this Hybrid Committee. He had understood that a Hybrid Committee was to be appointed specially in order that the inhabitants interested might be heard. He had certainly gathered from his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade that that was the intention of the Government; but the words which had been introduced into the Resolution would, he feared, prevent the inhabitants of the districts affected from being heard. The case would be brought under the Standing Orders, and under the Standing Orders it would not be possible for the inhabitants to be heard. Therefore, on the broad ground of justice to the inhabitants, he hoped that his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade would be inclined to assent to the omission of these words, in order that the whole case might be fully heard by the Committee. He was informed that a most substantial Company was quite ready to contract for the lighting of this district at a rate 40 per cent less than the rate proposed by the Company to whom the district would be assigned by the Bill now before the House. If that were so, surely it would be an act of the grossest injustice to the inhabitants that they should not be heard before the Committee, but that they should be forced into an agreement with a Company which, for the next 21 years, would tax them 40 per cent higher than they could get the same thing done for elsewhere. By the terms of the Act of last year the Board of Trade were authorized to submit to Parliament, for confirmation, any Provisional Order granted in pursuance of the Act, but no such Order was to be of any force unless it was confirmed by Act of Parliament; and while a Bill to confirm such Order was pending in either House of Parliament, any Petition presented against any Order comprised in the Bill might be referred to a Select Committee, and the Petitioners would be allowed to appear and depose as in the case of a Private Bill. Now, it seemed to him that the very object of that clause was to secure that the question should be submitted to the distinct judgment of Parliament, and the matter was before the House now in that position; but if it were impossible to submit the Bill to the judgment of the Committee in the ordinary way, and if the Petitioners most interested in the question were shut out from being heard, then it appeared to him that a great injustice would be done. He might add that he was not pecuniarily interested in the matter in any shape or form; but he simply brought it forward because he believed that it was a great public question, which ought not to be hurried through, but which ought to be carefully and fully considered before a Committee of the House of Commons. He begged to move the omission of the words "subject to the Rules, Orders, and Practice of the House."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the words "subject to the Rules, Orders, and Practice of the House." — (Sir Henry Hussey Vivian.)

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, there could be no doubt that the subject which his hon. Friend had brought before the House was one of considerable importance. He was not present in the House on the occasion on which the Bill passed a second reading; but he understood that on that occasion his hon. Friend the Secretary to the Board of Trade stated distinctly that any question as to the Committee before whom the Bill should go was one for the consideration of the House itself. His hon. Friend gathered that the sentiment of the House was in favour of a Hybrid Committee, and, accordingly, he (Mr. Chamberlain) had put down a Notice referring these Bills to a Hybrid Committee. He understood the object of substituting a Hybrid Committee for an ordinary Committee was that they might have a rather larger Committee, and a Committee selected, perhaps, with a little more consideration. But he did not understand that the House desired that this substitution should have any effect at all upon the locus standi of the Petitioners. His hon. Friend the Member for Glamorganshire (Sir Hussey Vivian) had referred to the clause in the Electric Lighting Act of last Session which applied to all cases of Provisional Orders approved by the Department, and which required the Board of Trade to submit such Provisional Orders to Parliament, and, in case of opposition, provided that they should be referred to a Select Committee. But, of course, the Bills themselves were subject to the Standing Orders of the House, and no one had a right to appear before the Committee contrary to the usual regulations. If the Motion which had been put upon the Paper were carried in its present form, no doubt the effect would be the same in regard to the question of locus standi; and he thought his hon. Friend was right in saying that, in the case of the particular Bill now before the House, two of the parties now opposing would not be allowed to be heard. He would ask the House to consider two things. In the first place, was it desirable to throw these Provisional Orders open to opposition more than was the practice of the House? What had happened in this particular case? The question of electric lighting, being a new subject, had been referred to a Select Committee presided over by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope). That Committee had many sittings; it heard all the parties; it paid careful attention to the whole subject; and it laid down in a Bill, which afterwards passed through Parliament, the conditions and principles on which Provisional Orders should be granted by the Board of Trade. The parties who went to the Board of Trade under the provisions of that Act had all been carefully heard, and in a great number of cases the promoters had been opposed by the local authorities. But certain concessions had been made, and the local authorities and all the other parties had become satisfied, and, as far as this kind of opposition was concerned, this was now really an unopposed Bill. Then he would appeal to the House whether, under these circumstances, on any occasion when there was opposition by any competitor, a Provisional Order was to be sent to a Hybrid Committee, and all the world was to be heard in opposition? If that were done, the object the Legislature had in cheapening legislation and in relieving the House from an annoyance and a serious burden would be entirely frustrated, and such a course, if adopted generally, would be fatal to the general Provisional Order system. He did not think that any part of the proceedings of the House in regard to Private Bills gave greater satisfaction than these Provisional Orders, and he wished the House to consider what the particular case was in which they were asked to make an exception. In this case the Edison Company had applied for an Order to light this district. They were opposed by the local authorities; and here let him say, in passing, that the Electric Lighting Act, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee, decided that the Vestry should be the local authority in the matter, and not the Metropolitan Board of Works. Now, in the district of St. James' the local authorities were heard, and after a prolonged controversy the Board of Trade were able to bring all the parties together; whereupon the Vestry assented to a Provisional Order, and the opposition was withdrawn. Another Company now came forward, and said, "We should like to have this district." In answer to the inquiry—"Why did you not appear at the same time as the Edison Company, and ask for an Order?" They said—"We were not at that time prepared; but since then we have got our apparatus ready, and we are not only ready to light the district, but prepared to offer a maximum price 40 per cent below the maximum price offered by the Edison Company." Now, in the first place, that was entirely an ex parte statement. The House would like to know a great deal more than they knew now before they would be ready to assume either that the Telegraph Construction Company could supply electricity at a rate 40 per cent below that of the Edison Company, or that they had any satisfactory method of providing electricity at all. If they were to admit the claim of this Company, as finding out something new, to come and oppose a Provisional Order already drafted, as soon as the Board of Trade had decided that the Telegraph Construction Company should have the same privileges as the Edison Company, what was to prevent another Company coming forward and asking to go into the whole matter again on the ground that they would be able to do it 5 per cent cheaper than the Telegraph Construction Company? And so it might go on, and they would have one speculative Company after another coming forward to represent their case. He did not pretend to say that the promoters, in this instance, were speculators; but as long as there were speculative Companies, Parliament would have offers to do the thing cheaper. If it could be shown that this ex parte statement was absolutely correct, and that the Company were prepared to insert in their Bill a maximum of 40 per cent lower than that inserted in the present Bill, it would not necessarily be of the slightest advantage to the inhabitants of the district. The price charged would probably be much lower than the maximum allowed, because the Board of Trade considered it necessary, in dealing with a new subject, to allow a considerable margin. They had accordingly allowed a margin in all these Provisional Orders which they had reason to believe would be considerably above the actual price. It did not at all follow that, because the maximum price was higher than the Telegraph Construction Company were willing to do the work for, the Edison Company would not be able to supply electricity at a price 40 or 50 per cent below the maximum. The same thing occurred in regard to Gas Companies. There was not a single Gas Company in the Metropolis which did not supply gas for a sum considerably below the maximum price inserted in their Act to cover all contingencies. There was another important consideration he wished to submit to the House. His hon. Friend the Member for Glamorganshire (Sir Hussey Vivian) argued the matter on the assumption that if the Bill were passed into law there would be practically a monopoly given to the Edison Company for the supply of the district for 21 years, and that if in any year afterwards a better system was discovered, either by the Telegraph Company or by anybody else, these unfortunate inhabitants would be prevented from availing themselves of it, and would thus be damnified by the passing of this Order. Now, that was not the case. It was not intended to give a monopoly to anyone. All that was given was an Order to the promoters of the Bill to take up the streets and lay down their wires. The Company were distinctly informed that this was not a monopoly conceded to them. There was nothing to prevent the Board of Trade to-morrow from granting a similar right to another Company; and though, of course, the Board of Trade would do nothing of the sort as long as the Edison Company fulfilled their obligations, yet, if they failed to fulfil their obligations, or some further discovery showed that their system was inadequate and that the district could be better lighted, then their monopoly would cease, and the Board of Trade would grant another Provisional Order. Therefore, if the Telegraph Company had any locus standi before a Select Committee—if they could show, not that they were willing to accept a less maximum than the maximum fixed in the Bill, but that they were able to sell cheaper than the other Company was selling for, then there would be nothing to prevent them from going to the Board of Trade next year, or next month, if they liked, and asking for a competing Order, and, if their allegation turned out to be true, no doubt the Board of Trade would grant it. He gathered, from what his hon. Friend had said, that the object of his claim was chiefly to obtain a hearing for the inhabitants, and not for the Telegraph Company. But the inhabitants of a district were represented by a local representative authority, and he thought it was the invariable practice to refuse a locus standi to the inhabitants as individuals, unless they had separate and individual interests. That seemed to him to be a perfectly reasonable course. In this case, the Vestry of St. James' had been a party to all the proceedings, and had assented to them, and it was not for individual inhabitants to come forward now, and ask that the whole matter should be gone into again. Such a course would enormously increase the expense to the Company in getting their Order, and also to the Vestry, which would probably be called upon to appear again, and defend the decision they had come to. Upon these grounds he should oppose the Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, at all events, made one thing clear which the Resolution left in doubt. The right hon. Gentleman did deliberately intend, by the form of the Motion he had placed before the House, to exclude from the consideration of the Committee the case of any Petitioners, whether they were inhabitants or rival Companies. Before he went further he wished to dispose of one argument used by the right hon. Gentleman, which, perhaps, might have some weight with the House. The right hon. Gentleman said that by granting this Provisional Order they did not create a monopoly for 21 years, because it would always be in the power of the Board of Trade to grant a second Order to some other Company. That, no doubt, was true; but he did not believe that any responsible Minister of the Board of Trade would venture to give such power to another Company, unless some tremendous revolution in electric lighting could be effected thereby. Unless something of that kind could be brought about the Board of Trade would be very chary in giving the right to another Company to pull up the streets. It would only be to a Company who had at their command some perfectly novel method of lighting that such a liberty would be conceded. Unless, therefore, some such revolution took place there would be a practical monopoly given to the Company in whose favour the Provisional Order was drawn. The right hon. Gentleman said that the statement of the Telegraph Construction Company was an ex parte one. Undoubtedly it was an ex parte statement; and it was because it was an ex parte statement, and therefore impossible to know the value to be attached to it, that he wanted the statement to be thoroughly sifted, and that could only be done before a Select Committee. The Board of Trade said that the local authorities in the parish of St. James' had assented to a Provisional Order, and the inhabitants of the parish were accordingly bound by the Provisional Order which had received the sanction of the local authorities. But it must be borne in mind that the Vestry of St. James' could not have had the whole of the case before them when they arrived at their decision. The Vestry of St. James' were not acquainted with the position of the competing Company, nor would they be aware, when they gave their assent to the Provisional Order, that they were restrained by that fact from considering the proposals of any other Company. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade said the Edison Company would very probably not charge their maximum rate, but would be restrained from charging the maximum by the competition of other Companies. There was, however, no evidence that such would be the case, and there was certainly no evidence that when the work was constructed the Company would by any means do the work at a price so much less than their maximum as 40 per cent. He understood that the other Company offered to provide the same thing for a maximum 40 per cent lower than the Edison Company. Of course, that offer might be wholly illusory; but let the inhabitants of St. James' know if it was so or not, and let them have a proper examination and inquiry into the matter before the Committee. He thought the President of the Board of Trade would commit a great mistake if he tried to draw too rigid a line in this matter of electric lighting. As had been pointed out by his hon. Friend (Sir Hussey Vivian), electric lighting was still in its infancy; and that was not the only peculiarity in the system of electric lighting. When they had one Gas Company competing with another Gas Company they knew that each produced its gas by precisely the same means, and so with Water Companies. They knew that the methods by which Water Companies introduced water into the Metropolis were practically the same; but that was not the case with electric lighting. There they had not only a Company which differed in their personnel, but which essentially differed in their means of producing light, and that ought to make the right hon. Gentleman careful before he gave preference to one method over another. There would be considerable danger, and great harm might be done, if any suspicion were to attach that a preference was given to one Electric Lighting Company over another. It appeared to him to be a monstrous injustice, and a very evil precedent from every point of view, that the Government should, by introducing words for which there was no precedent, try to exclude the people who were only concerned to have their lighting done as cheaply as possible. Before he sat down he would like to ask the President of the Local Government Board, or some other Member of the Government, how it came about that the Government had departed from the precedent which had been set in some very important instances? There was the case of the East London Water Bill, which had been referred to; and he had here the Thames River (Prevention of Floods) Bill, and the Epping Forest Bill, and in all those measures elaborate pains had been taken not to bring the people concerned under the iron rule of the Standing Orders of the House—there had always been care taken throughout that anybody who was genuinely and bond fide interested in the Bill should have a chance of being heard. All he now asked for was that, in this peculiar and delicate case, the precedent should be followed which had been set by the Government in other cases.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade would accept the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Glamorganshire, for he could assure the House that the Vestries of London looked with very considerable alarm upon the prospect of being bound for 21 years, when they might afterwards find that they could make better arrangements for themselves. They looked with great anxiety upon this question, and they wished to have more latitude than it was the intention of the Government to give them. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the whole thing was in its infancy, and he (Sir Alexander Gordon) hoped that he would accept the Amendment.

MR. RAIKES said, he thought the House was very much indebted to the hon. Baronet the Member for Glamorganshire (Sir Hussey Vivian) for giving them this opportunity of discussing the matter. He (Mr. Raikes) did not go quite so far as the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour), who had said there was no precedent for the course taken by the President of the Board of Trade.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I meant that there were precedents on the other side.

MR. RAIKES said, that no doubt there were precedents in favour of the course recommended by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, and there were others on the other side. There was one which he would call attention to as a cognate case; it occurred in the year 1879. In that year there were a great number of these Electric Lighting Bills. They were not in those days Provisional Order Bills, but Private Bills to light by electricity, and a Committee was first appointed in that year to consider this question. As he (Mr. Raikes) was concerned in the appointment of that Committee, he would like to quote the terms of the Order of Reference. The House decided that a Select Committee should be appointed to consider whether it was desirable to authorize Municipal Corporations or other local authorities to adopt any schemes for lighting by electricity, and to consider how far and under what conditions, if at all, Gas and other Public Companies should be authorized to supply light by electricity. The policy then present to the mind of the House was that monopolies should, if possible, be discouraged in dealing with the electric light; and the object of the Committee, which was presided over by the right hon. Member for the University of Edinburgh (Sir Lyon Playfair), and which presented a most interesting Report, was to consider how far it might be found practicable for public bodies to take advantage of those schemes as a means of serving the public without the creation of monopolies. He (Mr. Raikes) might say that he was very much impressed, by circumstances which were continually coming to his knowledge at that time, as to the enormous prices which were obtained by Gas and other Companies from municipal bodies when at last it became necessary to purchase them; and he was, above all things, desirous to protect the public against any such monopolies. In the year that these Electric Lighting Bills were brought into this House the Liverpool Lighting Bill was, he thought, the only one that obtained the Royal Assent; and, in that case, it being the first Electric Lighting Bill promoted by a municipality and public body, and being of a very limited and experimental character, the House decided to refer it to a Hybrid Committee, and so framed the Reference as to admit all Petitioners to appear before that Committee. That was a case in point which might have been overlooked at the Board of Trade, and in that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board might find some justification for accepting this Amendment. Going on a year or two further, it would be found that last year the General Electric Lighting Bill was passed which contained two important and governing clauses. The first was what was called the Licence Clause, which enabled the Board of Trade, with the consent of the local authority, to grant a licence; and the next clause—Clause 4—provided that the Board of Trade might, without the consent of the local authority, frame a Provisional Order to pass through this House. If hon Members would glance at those two clauses, which must be read together, they would see that it was intended to give the greatest possible opportunity for challenging in this House any scheme to which it might be supposed there was local opposition. There was another consideration which he would like to point out. Until very recent times these Provisional Orders had to pass through Committee of the Whole House, and it would have been open to the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. A. Balfour), or to the hon. Baronet the Member for Glamorganshire (Sir Hussey Vivian), to come forward with Amendments in this House dealing with these particular questions, or they might have had that particular section of the Bill referred to a Committee upstairs, who would have considered the point as to terms on which the work should be done. Taking all these various considerations together, he thought they ought to pause, and not pass this Resolution as it stood, when so very strong a case had been made out for its being altered, especially where the interests involved were so large—for the district of London which was affected by the schemes now before the House contained the wealthiest and most important part of the Metropolis. If they wanted to have a test case, in which it would be possible that every consideration should be examined and every right carefully considered, they could not have a better case than this one. He was sorry to detain the House so long, and he would say as little in addition as he possibly could; but he must say that he thought a very grave responsibility would rest upon those who counselled the House upon this occasion to oppose the Amendment of the hon. Baronet the Member for Glamorganshire. The local Vestry, as they had been rightly told by the President of the Board of Trade, would, by giving its assent to the measure, exclude all other Petitioners except the Telegraph Construction Company; but he should be rather inclined to doubt how far that Company was in a position to establish a locus standi before the Hybrid Committee. It was quite possible they might have their Hybrid Committee; but to do what? To do nothing. They would appoint a Hybrid Committee for the purpose of settling the question and taking evidence; but when they set to their work it might be found that the Petitioners could not come before them. He did not know what the Metropolitan Board of Works might do in this matter, or what their locus standi or attitude might be; but, if they did not come forward, there would be absolutely no opportunity of putting any counter case before the Committee. If some Amendment were not made it would be far better to abandon the Motion for a Hybrid Committee altogether; and he would rather send the Bill to the Chairman of Ways and Means in his own private room, and let him discuss the matter there, instead of having this very delusive inquiry by a Committee without the means of arriving at an opinion, although by its constitution it was supposed to be specially qualified to deal with the matter.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, he was one of those who were very much in favour of local government; and when the representatives of the people had their own local government, he thought it was not for the House of Commons to perform that duty. This case was a very peculiar one, not only on account of the nature of the light, but on account of the circumstances under which the Electric Lighting Bill passed this House, not one Member out of 100 understanding its effect when it was rushed through the House at the very end of the Session. They were told that the Electric Companies were extremely moderate in consenting to take a monopoly of only 21 years; but they did not then understand their view of the case, which was that the Companies were entitled to throw broadcast all over the country thousands of notices, and to say to every Municipality—"Stand and deliver! Either you must introduce electric lighting yourselves, or you must allow somebody else to get the privilege; you must not hesitate or wait to see what may happen." The result was that a very large amount of pressure was put upon the local bodies. There were a large number of the municipal bodies who had expressed the opinion that they would rather wait and not be in too great a hurry; but the Board of Trade acted upon their own views of the Act, and wherever they had a permissive power given to them, they used it in a way which amounted, to a certain extent, to compulsion to pass Provisional Orders. They seemed to have determined that the local authorities must either introduce the electric light themselves or allow these speculative Companies to throw hundreds of notices broadcast before them, and to exclude anyone else from doing the work. They had heard the views expressed by the experienced Chairman of Committees under the late Government—he said it was most undesirable that this responsibility should be thrown on the Chairman of Committees; and yesterday they had heard the present Chairman of Committees express views that were almost identical. He gathered that the present Chairman was unwilling to take the whole responsibility on these new and important questions, and might well desire that these Bills should not be referred to him alone, but to a competent Committee, who could deal with the whole subject, and deal with it thoroughly. It seemed to him (Sir George Campbell), therefore, that the Amendment was a reasonable one, and, as it was supported by the ex-Chairman of Committees and not opposed by the Chairman, he should vote for it.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he would appeal to the President of the Board of Trade to assent to the Amendment, as he was convinced that both time and expense to all the parties would be saved by it. He did not wish to express any opinion as to the relative merits of the proposals of the Electric Companies; but it was certain that this would virtually be a monopoly for 21 years. The President of the Board of Trade had said it was by no means certain that the Company obtaining these powers would charge the maximum rates; but it came at an unfortunate period, so far as the Metropolis was concerned, for the Water Companies, who, it was said, would not exercise their powers to the full, were now exercising them, and raising the rates to a very large extent throughout the district. It was very desirable that they should have an impartial tribunal to make the inquiry as to the best arrangement for the whole of the Metropolis. If that inquiry was refused, or obstacles placed in the way, he ventured to think that opposition would have to be revived at a future stage, and difficulties might be incurred which it would not be in the power of the Government to obviate.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN said, he thought they were setting rather a dangerous precedent; but he had no alternative under the circumstances, and would accept the Amendment.

MR. W. FOWLER said, he thought the Government were making a great mistake in giving way on the point.

Question put, and negatived.

Main Question, as amended, put.

Ordered, That all Petitions against the Bills, or Orders, be referred to the Select Committee on the Bills, and that such of the Petitioners as pray to be heard by themselves, their Counsel, or Agents, be heard upon their Petition, if they think fit, and Counsel heard in favour of the Bills, against such Petitions.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum of the Committee.

Ordered, That the Report and Minutes of Evidence of the Select Committee on "The Electric Lighting Bill, 1882," be referred to the Committee."

QUESTIONS.

COMMISSIONERS OF NATIONAL EDUCATION (IRELAND).

MR. MACARTNEY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Education Commissioners for Ireland have taken into connection a school at Golan (in District 13), county Tyrone, although another school is in existence within two hundred yards of it, and although the number of children in its neighbourhood is too small for more than one school; was any objection made by the managers of the neighbouring schools, and on what grounds was such objection, if made, set aside without inquiry; were the objections made laid before the Board at its usual time of meeting; has the Board made a grant for Stranagummer School in the same district, although four of their rules were thereby set aside, namely, that a deed of gift should be made by the owners of the site; that it should not be built in a chapel yard; that the neighbouring managers should be consulted; and that it should be three miles distant from a vested school; if the grant has not been made to Stranagummer School, has it been made to Kilskeery School, the name only being changed, the site being the same, and Kilskeery being a mile and a-half distant; did the Board refuse a similar grant for a vested school at Olooncandra on the ground that it was not three miles distant from another vested school; did a former district inspector report in favour of a grant to Clooncandra School; did the Rev. Mr. Clifford apply to have that portion of District B transferred to another district inspector, and was that transfer made without consulting any other school manager than Mr. Clifford; did the district inspector to whose district the schools were thus transferred make an incorrect report to the Board of the distance of Stranagummer from the nearest vested school, and did he report against the application for Clooncandra; and, if so, will he be retained in the district?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have received a very full Report from the Education Commissioners in reply to these inquiries, and I think that it will be, perhaps, more satisfactory to the hon. Member for Tyrone, and more convenient to the House, if I send him the Report itself, rather than attempt to condense it into a verbal reply or read it in full. If the Report does not satisfy the hon. Member on any point, I will be happy to make further inquiry and to answer any Question in the House.

FISHERY BOARD (SCOTLAND)—
THE REPORT.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will inform the House of the names of the Members who composed the Committee of the Scotch Fishery Board, whose report was recently laid upon the Table of the House; and, if he will give directions that, according to usual custom, the names of Members of similar Committees may in future be prefixed or appended to their reports, in order that the House may judge what amount of confidence can be placed upon opinions expressed therein?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, the explanation was that the Committee consisted of the entire body; but it might be well in future that the names of the Members composing the Committees should be stated in their Reports.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON said, that was all he wanted.

BURIAL ACTS—CONSECRATION OF CEMETERIES—RHOS, DENBIGHSHIRE.

SIR ROBERT CUNLIFFE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it has not been ascertained that the sanction to the consecration of the the cemetery at Rhos, Denbighshire, was obtained as the result of an application by the Rev. Thomas Jones, the vicar of the parish, made without the authority of the Burial Board and contrary to the wishes of the inhabitants, and also based on information which, by reason of its inaccuracy and incompleteness, was calculated to and did mislead the Home Secretary; whether the consecration of such portion of the cemetery by the Bishop of St. Asaph was not the result of an application made by the vicar and churchwardens, also without the authority and knowledge of the board, the Bishop, as well as the Secretary of State, being kept in ignorance of the real facts of the case; whether he will lay upon the Table the Correspondence which has taken place; and, whether, under the circumstances, he does not consider that some steps should be taken to prevent the vicar from exacting fees in or exercising other privileges over the whole of the ground the consecration of which has been obtained by such means?

MR. RAIKES asked if the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be good enough to state to the House the precise injury that the inhabitants of the parish had sustained by the consecration?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, the state of the facts is this, that under the present law as to any ground which is consecrated, the Vicar has a right to have the fees, whether he performs the service or not. If the ground is not consecrated the fees are only paid to the person who performs the ceremony. The person who is responsible for appropriating the ground for consecration is the Secretary of State; and for that purpose he collects, as best he can, the wishes and the wants of the parish or the district as it may be. He has a right to expect that those who give him information on the subject should give him true and complete information. In this case, I am sorry to say, the Vicar did not take that course. He made representations to me which, in the words of the Question, were "inaccurate and incomplete, and were calculated to and did mislead me" as to the wishes and wants of the district. I have expressed, in a letter in the Correspondence which will be produced, my strong disapprobation of that course so taken by him. With reference to the further part of the Question, certainly if accurate information had been supplied to me what was done would not have been done; but the ground having been consecrated, I know no method by which that act can be undone, nor is there any method by which the legal consequences attaching to consecration can fail so to attach. I have no power to prevent the Vicar from exacting fees in the ground now that it has been consecrated.

MR. RAIKES asked, in justice to the Vicar, whether it was not the fact that he still maintained that the information supplied by him to the right hon. and learned Gentleman was both accurate and complete?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: The House will be able to judge of that when it sees the Correspondence.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON inquired whether the Burial Board had not passed a resolution that no portion of the ground should be consecrated; and whether that resolution was not contrary to the law, which required a portion of every cemetery to be consecrated?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I cannot say that such a resolution is contrary to law, because, in my view, the Burial Board have no legal authority with regard to the appropriation of the ground.

CHELSEA HOSPITAL—LORD MORLEY'S COMMITTEE.

MR. PULESTON asked the Secretary of State for War, When he will be able to report to the House the decision on the Report of Lord Morley's Committee on the Royal Military Asylum and the Hospital for Pensioners at Chelsea?

MR. BRAND: Sir, I have laid the Report in question upon the Table of the House to-day. As regards the questions raised in it, further consideration is still required on some of the points.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION COURT—MR. GALLAGHER AND MR. RYAN.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the case that Mr. Gallagher, the sub-editor of the "Freeman's Journal," was some time since appointed the official reporter of the Land Commission Court, and that, owing to his being unable to write shorthand, he has deputed the discharge of his duties to Mr. Ryan; whether Mr. Ryan is not one of the permanent staff of the reporters of the "Freeman's Journal," and engaged in his duties as such when not in attendance on the Court of Appeal of the Land Commission; whether Mr. Ryan, when acting as official reporter at the hearing of appeals before the Land Commissioners Court, sits beside the registrar, and has free access to all the files and papers connected with the several appeal cases; and, whether Mr. Ryan supplied the writer of a letter signed "One of the victimised tenants," which appeared in the "Freeman's Journal" of the 11th of May, with the statistics and statements contained in that letter, and which could not possibly have been in the possession of the writer, unless furnished by an official having access to the files of the Court?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have received a report from the Land Commissioners to the following effect. Mr. Gallagher was not appointed official reporter of the Land Commission Court, but is generally requested by the Land Commissioners to have shorthand notes taken in appeal and other cases. He is a shorthand writer; but, not being able personally to attend the sittings of the Court, he is generally represented by Mr. Ryan, who is a member of the staff of The Freeman's Journal, of which Mr. Gallagher is sub-editor. When taking notes for the Land Commission, Mr. Ryan occupies a place on the same seat with the Registrar of the Court, but he has not free access to the files and papers connected with the cases, nor any special facilities whatever to become acquainted with the Court documents. Mr. Ryan has informed the Land Commissioners that he knows nothing of the writer of the letter signed "A Victimized Tenant" referred to in the Question, and that he did not, directly or indirectly, supply any person with the statements and statistics contained in that letter.

VISCOUNT GALWAY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Ryan, who is discharging the duty of official reporter of the Land Commission Court, was at any time a member of the executive council of the Land League, or otherwise connected therewith; and, whether it is the case that at several banquets in the city of Dublin, when attending in his capacity as reporter for the "Freeman's Journal," Mr. Ryan remained seated when the health of Her Majesty the Queen was being drunk, and refused to drink the same?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, I have made inquiry on this subject, and find that Mr. Ryan was not a member of the Executive Council of the Land League, and that he is not known to have manifested extreme political opinions in any prominent or ostentatious way. The noble Lord, perhaps, will form his own judgment; but I do not think that this Question could be more definitely answered without personal inquiry of Mr. Ryan, and that is a course which I do not think it would be well to take.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS COMMISSION—THE ASHTON CHARITY, DUNSTABLE.

MR. CAUSTON (for Mr. WILLIS) asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he is aware that, in the year 1868, a sum of about £17,000 was realized by the sale of certain lands belonging to the Ashton Charity in Dunstable, which, by the consent of the Trustees of the said Charity and the sanction of the Endowed Schools Commissioners, was to be applied in the erection and endowment of a high class school in Dunstable; whether, up to the present time, no steps have been taken to carry the said purpose into effect; and, whether he can state the reasons for this protracted delay?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I have not been informed of the date when the £17,000 was realized; but, in 1874, proposals were made by the Trustees of Ashton's Charity for the establishment of a grammar school at Dunstable out of their trust property, which included a sum of nearly £17,000 derived from sale of lands. Out of this sum £5,000 had to be set aside for the endowment of existing elementary schools. In the year 1876 the Charity Commissioners published the draft of a scheme for the grammar school; but, owing to certain difficulties which arose, the Commissioners directed a public inquiry to be held at Dunstable into the circumstances of this Charity and of another endowed school in that town. In pursuance of the Report of the Inquiry the Charity Commissioners have made a scheme, which has been approved by Her Majesty, for one of the endowed schools of Dunstable, and a fresh draft scheme has been prepared, and has been submitted for the consideration of the Trustees, for the establishment of the Ashton Grammar School. The whole matter was under the consideration of the Board of Charity Commissioners on the 26th ultimo, and it may be anticipated that the scheme will before long be matured.

MADAGASCAR—HOSTILE OPERATIONS OF FRANCE—BOMBARDMENT OF TAMATAVE.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have received any confirmation of the reported bombardment of Tamatave and other places by a French Naval force; if he can state to the House whether any loss of life or property has been sustained by British subjects; and, what steps have been taken for the protection of British interests?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have received confirmation of the bombardment of Tamatave and of Majunga by French men-of-war. No information has been received with regard to any loss of life by British subjects; but I fear that there has been some loss of property, respecting which we are awaiting further information. Her Majesty's Ships Dryad and Dragon are at Tamatave, and Her Majesty's Ship Briton, which is now at Zanzibar, will be despatched to Madagascar if necessary.

MR. BOURKE: Will these Reports be laid on the Table?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: There will be no objection to lay the Reports on the Table.

EGYPT (LAW AND JUSTICE)—TRIALS OF SULEIMAN SAMI AND SAID BEY KHANDEEL—PROCEDURE.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, since the official reports are now on record showing that, notwithstanding the belief of Lord Dufferin that Suleiman Sami would be allowed to examine witnesses on his trial before the Alexandria Court Martial, it really was the case that no witnesses were examined at that so-called trial, and the demand of the prisoner "that he might be allowed to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution" was categorically refused, the Court Martial having "declined to entertain it," Her Majesty's Government will now insist that no future trials are conducted in such a manner while the Egyptian Government is supported by British arms, but that the course adopted in Khandeel's case of hearing the witnesses will be generally followed?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The intentions of Her Majesty's Government in regard to future trials in Egypt are set forth in the despatches of Lord Dufferin of April 28 and June 14 (Egypt, No. 9, 1883, pp. 4 and 20), and it is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any measures beyond those there described.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked if it were not the case, as distinctly shown in the despatch of Lord Dufferin, dated June 14th, that he was mistaken in regard to the procedure which was to be followed, because Lord Dufferin distinctly stated that in Suleiman Sami's case there would be full liberty to examine and cross-examine all witnesses placed before the Alexandria Court Martial; and whether, as Lord Dufferin was mistaken as to the procedure, it was not necessary there should be fresh instructions?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The hon. Gentleman asks me whether I think Lord Dufferin was right. That is asking my opinion—

MR. SPEAKER (interposing): It is irregular to ask the opinion of the noble Lord.

IRELAND—PAUPER EMIGRANTS TO THE UNITED STATES.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in view of the action of the Emigration Commissioners at New York, orders will be given for the discontinuance of the deportation of paupers from Ireland to the United States; and, out of what fund the expenses of re-transmitting the returned emigrants to their respective workhouses will be defrayed?

MR. TREVELYAN: Directions have been given that the emigration of workhouse inmates by State aid shall be suspended in the only two Unions in Ireland in which there are any such proposed emigrants on the lists. I think it would be premature at present to express any opinion on the second part of the Question.

MR. LEAMY was understood to ask if it were a fact that some of the emigrants who went out in the Anchoria were being sent back, and whether the Government would have anyone to look after them on their arrival in Ireland?

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked whether it would not be possible, seeing that these unfortunate persons had got to America, to supply them with sufficient funds to settle there? It would be very hard for them to be brought back again. He wished also to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he was aware that a number of Swedish and Swiss emigrants had been sent out under similar circumstances, and that when the American Government refused to allow them to land, the Representatives of those countries supplied them with sufficient means? He wished to know if this could not be done in the case of the emigrants referred to in the Question?

MR. TREVELYAN: It is extremely important, Sir, in dealing with this question, not to speak before we have absolute knowledge; but we have taken very great pains to ascertain how many of the emigrants whose names have been given are State-aided emigrants, and we find, so far as we can gather, that they are very few indeed. [Mr. LEAMY: There should not be one.] Likewise, I imagine from the small details we have been able to get it is not a question of whether an emigrant has £1 or £2 or £5 or £10, more or less. My belief is that it is not on that account that they are sent back to this country. They are extremely few in number, and if any possible means could be adopted of meeting the objections of the American Government they, undoubtedly, will be adopted. But I am very much afraid those objections could not be met by a simple contribution of money, however large, from Government funds. When the matter is examined into it will be found, I think, that very few indeed have been sent back.

POST OFFICE—SAVINGS BANK DEPARTMENT—THE CONTROLLER.

MR. O'DONNELL (for Mr. KENNARD) asked the Postmaster General, Whether it is true that a notification has been issued to the employés in the Post Office Savings Banks containing these words:—

"The solicitor being of opinion that Mr. Ramsay's name cannot be used for any official purpose after his decease, all documents must in future be stamped with the signature of the Assistant Controller?"

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, as I stated last week, on the authority of the legal adviser to the Post Office, no possible inconvenience can result to the depositors from the printed forms to which the hon. Member refers having been used. On the attention of the solicitor being directed to the subject, he thought it would be right that the name of the Assistant Controller should be stamped on the forms until a new appointment to the office of Controller was made, and, therefore, the Order mentioned in the Question was issued.

ARMY—CAVALRY HORSES.

COLONEL O'BEIRNE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether any orders have yet been issued to Cavalry Regiments stationed in the United Kingdom to cast horses over 16 years of age, and pronounced unfit for service; whether it is a fact that several Cavalry Regiments are at present ineffective on account of the number of aged and useless horses in the ranks; and, if any, and what, portion of the £40,000 voted under Vote 1, Army Estimates, for the purchase of Cavalry remounts, has been expended in the purchase of aged and worn out horses?

MR. BRAND: Sir, under the Queen's Regulations, horses of 15 years and upwards may be brought forward for casting at the annual inspection. Horses declared unfit for the Service may be cast at any age. It cannot be said that any regiment is ineffective on account of the number of aged and useless horses in it; but there are always in every regiment at home some horses too young and some too old for active service, which, if the regiment took the field, would have to be replaced by transfers from other corps. Aged and worn-out horses are never bought for remounts.

PUBLIC HEALTH—HORSE FLESH.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the case of Benjamin Thompson, who was sentenced at the Bradford Police Court to two months' imprisonment for using putrid horse flesh in the manufacture of potted meat; and, if it would be consistent with the prison regulations that this prisoner should be fed, during his temporary retirement from business, upon his own preserved provisions?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I suppose the hon. Member does not expect a serious answer to this Question.

EGYPT (LAW AND JUSTICE)—TRIAL OF SULEIMAN SAMI.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, on the 8th of June, Her Majesty's Government were aware that Suleiman Sami had been refused permission to cross-examine the witnesses for the prosecution, that his two counsel, a Frenchman and an Italian, had in succession thrown up their briefs, and that Major Macdonald had applied for an adjournment of the trial, which had been refused; whether Her Majesty's Government were acquainted with these circumstances when, on the 13th of June, Lord Granville approved the conduct of Sir E. Malet in refraining from interference, "for which," Lord Granville writes, "there does not seem to have been any necessity;" and, whether Her Majesty's Government will obtain and lay before this House the evidence by which Sir E. Malet writes, on the 9th of June, that it was clearly established that Alexandria was burnt by the orders of Suleiman Sami, and in disobedience to the orders which he received from Arabi?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the Papers presented to Parliament supply the answer to my hon. Friend's Question. As Sir Edward Malet's telegram containing the account of the trial of Suleiman Sami is dated June 14, and Major Macdonald's Report was only received on the 19th of June, they clearly could not have been in the possession of Her Majesty's Government on the 8th of June, or on the 13th of June; but the facts mentioned in those documents have in no measure altered the opinion of Her Majesty's Government. I may observe that the hon. Member would seem to imply in his Question that Major Macdonald applied for an adjournment because of the refusal of the Court to cross-examine the prisoner. If the hon. Member will refer to page 24 of the Blue Book, he will see that this was not the case. There will be no objection to presenting the proceedings of the Commission d'Enquête, when they are received, provided they are not too bulky and the cause of unnecessary expenditure in printing.

PUBLIC BUSINESS (SCOTLAND)—THE HOME DEPARTMENT—OFFICIAL PAPERS.

MR. DALRYMPLE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the fact that the number of papers received at the Home Office was considerably more than doubled between 1852 and 1882, Whether it is true that only an extremely small proportion of these are connected with Scotch business?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I have been requested by my right hon. Friend to answer this Question. The comparison made by him was not between the years 1852 and 1882, but between 1862 and 1882. The number of Papers relating to Scotland more than doubled between 1862 and 1882, though it undoubtedly bore only a small proportion to the total number of Papers received at the Home Office.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—ORANGE LODGES.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that a meeting of the Parsonstown Orange Lodge, with a view to organising an Orange demonstration in that town on the 12th July next, was held on the 11th June ult. on the premises of the local Supervisor of Excise; and, if so, whether it is in accordance with the rules of the Civil Service that its members should so identify themselves with a secret society?

MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE: Sir, I have been asked by my right hon. Friend to reply to this Question. No such meeting as that referred to was held in the Supervisor's house on the 11th of June, or any other day. It appears that the Orange Hall adjoins the Supervisor's house, though it is not connected with it in any way, and this probably explains the error into which the hon. Member has fallen.

INDIA (MADRAS)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—THE SALT REVENUE.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether his attention has been called to the large number of criminal prosecutions, by the Madras Government, of extremely poor persons, on the charge of being in illegal possession of small quantities of salt for domestic use, or the use of cattle, or for use in the curing of fish and other perishable articles of food; whether he has seen that a number of poor persons have been severely punished for the crime of using saltish earth as a partial substitute for salt, and for attempting to obtain salt for their domestic wants by evaporating sea water, and that the excuse that their extreme poverty prevented them from using the Government taxed salt was rejected; and, whether he can inform the House what are the legal penalties and punishments for the illegal use or consumption of salt in India?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Yes, Sir; a large number of prosecutions for offences against the Salt Revenue Law take place in Madras, and the Madras Government has been directed to watch carefully the operations of Act 1 of 1882, which deals with these offences. Salt smuggling has been very prevalent in Madras, and has caused great loss to the Revenue. In 1881, 188 cases were detected, and two tons of smuggled salt were seized in a single district in two days. It was therefore thought necessary to pass the Act 1 of 1882, for the better protection of the salt revenue. The maximum penalty for offences under the Act is imprisonment for three months, or fine of 500 rupees, with confiscation of the smuggled salt; but, under the Departmental rules, first offenders are dismissed with a warning.

MR. O'KELLY asked, as salt was a necessary of life, would the Government take steps to carry out Free Trade in salt?

[No answer was given to this Question.]

INDIA (MADRAS)—RUMOURED OUTBREAK OF CHOLERA.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether he has heard that cholera in a severe form is reported by the editor of the Madras "Hindu" to have broken out in Salem; that the collector remains at a distance in a mountain sanatorium; and that the Native municipality has been dissolved since the late riots; and, if he can state what authorities are responsible for the care of public health in Salem?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, I have not seen the Madras Hindu. The last health Returns received, dated the 23rd of May, do not state that cholera existed at Salem, nor have we been informed that the Municipality has been dissolved. The magistrate, or, if he is absent, his locum tenens, is responsible for the public health.

MR. O'DONNELL having risen to make a statement,

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was entitled only to put a Question arising out of the answer.

POST OFFICE — MAILS FROM THE SEYCHELLES TO THE MAURITIUS.

SIR JOHN HAY asked the Postmaster General, Whether the mails from the Seychelles to the Mauritius were intentionally left behind at the Seychelles last March by the Messageries Maritime steam-vessel subsidized to convey them; and, whether Postal communication between these islands was suspended for one month in consequence?

MR. FAWCETT: In reply to the right hon. and gallant Member, I may state that, except from a letter which he forwarded to me from a gentleman who had recently returned from Australia, I have received no report of the delay to which he refers in his Question.

THE PARKS (METROPOLIS)—FINSBURY PARK.

MR. W. M. TORRENS asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, If similar regulations may not be applied in Finsbury Park for the convenience of visitors on Sundays and holidays to those observed, without difficulty or complaint, in Hyde Park, under direction of the First Commissioner of Works?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: Sir, assuming that the regulations referred to by my hon. Friend are those relating to the band, and to the hire of seats and sale of programmes in the Park, I beg to inform him that a recommendation will be made to the Board to-morrow to refer the whole question to a Committee for consideration.

EAST INDIA—MYSORE GOLD MINING —RETURN OF LANDS HELD BY UN-COVENANTED SERVANTS, &c.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether, with reference to paragraph 8 of the letter of 30th January last, published in the Parliamentary Returns of 2nd March last, the Government of Madras have yet submitted the return of lands held by their uncovenanted servants and by Military Officers in civil employ?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, the Returns referred to have not yet been received.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—SIXPENNY TELEGRAMS.

MR. LEWIS (for Mr. PULESTON) asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the details of the calculation made in connection with the several alternative schemes proposed for the carrying out of the system of sixpenny telegrams?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I may state that the Government will not come to any decision as to the particular scheme for introducing 6d. telegrams before next Session, and there will then be no objection to give, as far as practicable, details of the financial results to be anticipated from each of the three schemes mentioned in the Treasury Minute.

FRANCE AND CHINA.

MR. GORST (for Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT) asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether the Government have any information as to the present relations between China and the French Republic; and, whether they have yet been able to tender their good offices to the French Government in order to prevent war?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have no official information in regard to the present relations between China and the French Republic, and they have taken no action in the sense suggested by the hon. Member.

NAVY—ASSISTANT PAYMASTERS IN THE NAVY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the average of Assistant Paymasters in the Royal Navy before promotion to the rank of Paymaster has increased since 1870 from nine years to fifteen years, and whether the service in the lower rank is not likely to increase still more in years to come; and, whether he will consider the justice of ameliorating the condition of these officers, either by allowing service over eight years' seniority as Assistant Paymasters to count as senior service, or in some other manner?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Sir, the length of service of officers in the rank of assistant paymaster has gradually increased from 10 years in 1870 to 15 years in 1883. During the last 18 months, however, considerably more vacancies in the higher rank have occurred than the average number in previous years, and if this continues it will tend to prevent further increase in the seniority of the junior rank. The state of things pointed out by the hon. Member is due to the entry in past years of a number of officers in excess of the requirements of the Service, an error which we are now carefully avoiding; and we do not regard the temporary retardation of promotion as requiring an alteration of the conditions of service, which, taken as a whole, are satisfactory. The pay of assistant paymasters in the later years of their service was materially improved so recently as 1877.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked whether the conditions were satisfactory to the officers themselves?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I say that, taken as a whole, I do not think there is any reason to complain.

INDIA (EXECUTIVE GOVERNMENT)—

SIR AUCKLAND COLVIN AND MAJOR BARING.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether there is any truth in the report that Sir Auckland Colvin is to be appointed Finance Minister in India, and that Major Baring is to cumulate the offices of Controller and Consul General in Egypt?

MR. GLADSTONE: It is the case, Sir, that Sir Auckland Colvin will succeed Major Baring in the office of Finance Minister in India. As to the latter part of this Question, whether Major Baring is to cumulate the offices of Controller and Consul General in Egypt, I have to say that there is not now in Egypt any such office as that of Controller, and probably the hon. Member means to refer to the office which has been constituted of Financial Adviser. There is no intention of cumulating the office of Financial Adviser with that of Consul General.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Prime Minister whether there was intention to appoint any person in the place of Sir Auckland Colvin as Consul General?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no doubt a recommendation of that character will be made.

PARLIAMENT—HOUSE OF LORDS—THE USHER OF THE BLACK ROD.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in the appointment of the Usher of the Black Rod, the amount of emolument attached to that office will be left subject to the decision of Parliament?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the Usher of the Black Rod was formerly paid from fees on Private Bills, but since 1877 he has been paid by salary. A small portion of his salary—about £170 or £180—is derived from offices of a secondary character which he holds in the Royal Household; but the main salary is £2,000, and that is included in the Vote for the expenses of the House of Lords, and stands, therefore, as far as Parliamentary control is concerned, precisely in the same position as the other items of that Vote.

WESTERN ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC—ANNEXATION OF NEW GUINEA BY QUEENSLAND.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS (for Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT) asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether strong representations in favour of a British Protectorate over New Guinea have been made to Her Majesty's Government by all the Australian Colonies; whether he can confirm the statement in the newspapers of Wednesday, that the Marquess of Normanby, Her Majesty's Governor General, in opening the Victorian Parliament, had stated that collective representations to the Imperial Government were being made in favour of annexation or the establishment of a protectorate; and, whether, in view of the wishes of Her Majesty's loyal Australian Colonies, and of the importance of preventing any Foreign Power from occupying New Guinea and the adjacent islands, Her Majesty's Ministers will advise Her Majesty to establish an Imperial protectorate over those islands?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I can hardly give any information in answer to this Question beyond the statement I made to the House several days ago—namely, that Representations had been made to Lord Derby by the representatives of most or all of the Australian Colonies, excepting Western Australia, in favour of the establishment of a British Protectorate, not only over New Guinea, but over an extended region—in fact, over all the islands of Oceania, almost without exception; and that those representations being of an important character, and being only verbal, the gentlemen by whom they were made have been requested to reduce them to writing. Then, I hope, we shall be able to make them known to the House. That is also an answer to the second part of the Question. With regard to the third portion, the House will be put in possession of the substance of the despatch in which Her Majesty's Government have stated their views on this matter; and I think it will be better to reserve any further question upon that despatch until it is in the hands of the House.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether any communication by telegraph has yet been received from the Australian Governments in consequence of the statements made in this and the other House on Monday?

MR. GLADSTONE: Yes, Sir; we have received a statement by telegraph to the effect that disappointment is felt in the Australian Colonies at the disinclination shown by Her Majesty's Government to confirm the proceedings adopted by the Government of Queensland. What steps may be taken, or what proposals may be made, of course we are not in a position to state at this moment. That is the condition of feeling in most, if not in all, of the Australian Colonies on receipt of the intelligence to which I have referred.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH asked whether the Papers, when published, would include these telegraphic communications, and when they would be in the hands of hon. Members?

MR. GLADSTONE: I think it is desirable that the telegraphic communications should be included with the other Papers. As to the time, it will be at an early date; but I am not able, without communication with the Colonial Office, to say at what date.

AFGHANISTAN — ALLEGED CAPTURE OF CONVOY IN THE KHYBER PASS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS (for Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT) asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is a fact that a convoy of arms and ammunition sent by the Viceroy of India to the Ameer of Afghanistan has been captured, after a sharp fight in the Kyber Pass, by the Afridis; and if so, who composed the escort, and what is the value of the munitions captured?

MR. J. K. CROSS: I am happy to inform the hon. Gentleman that no such capture has occurred in the Khyber Pass. No arms or ammunition for the Ameer have passed the Khyber since the 2nd of February.

PARLIAMENT—PROMULGATION OF THE STATUTES.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the Government, Whether they would postpone the Motion which stood in the name of the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, relative to the promulgation of the Statutes, for a day or two, seeing that the Report of the Committee on that subject had been only just delivered, and was of a character that deserved the attention of the House?

MR. RYLANDS having made a similar request,

MR. GLADSTONE said, he would consult with his right hon. and learned Friend on that matter.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — BALLOT ACT CONTINUANCE AND AMENDMENT BILL.

In answer to a Question from Mr. CAVENDISH BENTINCK,

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the Government desired, if possible, that night to close the adjourned debate on going into Committee on this Bill, and to get into Committee, when Progress would be immediately reported.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE asked whether the right hon. Gentleman proposed to proceed with the Ballot Continuance Bill before the Agricultural Holdings Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE said, he did not. He only wished to close the adjourned debate on going into Committee on the Ballot Bill.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked when the Government intended to proceed with the Representative Peers (Scotland) Bill?

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope the hon. Gentleman will allow the matter to stand over until Monday, when I will mention it along with various other measures.

Mr. Gladstone

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES)

BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir William Harcourt,
Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles Dilke,
Mr. Solicitor General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 4th July.]

[FIFTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Election Expenses.

Clause 24 (Personal expenses of candidate and small expenses of committee room).

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 27, to leave out "50," and insert "100,"—(Mr. Arthur Balfour,)—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That '50' stand part of the Clause."

MR. MONK said, he earnestly hoped that the Committee would not assent to this Amendment, for one of the objects of the Bill was to lessen expenses, and the proposal to substitute £100 for £50 was merely calling upon the candidate to increase the expenditure. Of course, the candidate could spend £50 or £100 if necessary; but after the amount was expended it was necessary that it should be returned by the election agent, so that the precise sum should be generally known. In 19 out of 20 cases, £50 would be amply sufficient for the candidate's personal expenses, and if there was any further expenditure it was only right that it should be made under the authority and name of the election agent. He, therefore, hoped the Committee would not accept the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, this was a very small matter, which had been amply discussed before. Of course, if the candidate was honest, it was of no use telling him that he might expend £50 or £100 in personal expenses.

MR. MACFARLANE said, it was in the interest of the honest candidate that he wished to have the sum fixed—a sum that would be sufficient for the purpose. The proposal of the Bill was absolutely inadequate, and he maintained that even £100 would be insufficient.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the candidate might spend as much as he liked; the only point was in whose hands it should be.

MR. BUCHANAN said, the matter was fully discussed yesterday. The candidate might want to take his wife and daughters with him, and might not want all that expense to be set down in the account. But to set down a large amount for personal expenses seemed to be holding out a temptation to the candidate to spend that amount on what might not really be personal expenses at all.

MR. WARTON said, that the last time this matter was discussed the Attorney General favoured them with a quotation from a previous Act of Parliament, which he declared was incorporated in the present Bill. He (Mr. Warton) ventured to ask where it was so incorporated, because under the several Acts that were incorporated he could not find that one. There might be some inadvertence somewhere; but he confessed he had not been able to find the place where that Act was incorporated. He wished to know whether the personal expenses were to include travelling and hotel expenses only, because there might be other personal expenses besides those. If the definition was narrowed to travelling and hotel expenses it would leave those other expenses out of view.

MR. E. STANHOPE asked whether it would not be worth while to insert a Schedule of personal expenses on the Report?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) explained, in reply to the observations of the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton), that the Statute which he had meant to describe as incorporated was the 17 & 18 Vict., c. 182, which set forth reasonable hotel expenses and reasonable travelling expenses.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, the Attorney General was always telling them that these were very small matters. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) did not agree with him, for he thought they were large matters, having regard to the stringency of the measure, and to the many dangers which surrounded the candidate and made the affair a very serious thing indeed for him. He appealed to the Attorney General to say whether it would not be much better to get rid of all this? The definition of personal expenses which was proposed was altogether insufficient. The definition of "reasonable hotel expenses and reasonable travelling expenses" was most difficult, for, as had been suggested by a well-known authority, the candidate might give a dinner to five persons, and that might be held to be reasonable; but if five were to be considered reasonable, were six, seven, or eight to be considered unreasonable? In other words, where was the line to be drawn? A sum of £50 or £100 could be got rid of by the candidate very easily; and he would ask the Committee, before changing the sum from £50 to £100, to consider whether it would not be better to get rid of the provision altogether? He should like to have some definition as to what were reasonable expenses before changing the figure. Very few Members of the House would ever return their personal expenses.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken was under an entire misapprehension. The amount did not at all affect the candidate's personal expenses—he might spend as much or as little as he chose. He might spend privately £50 or £100; but anything above that would have to be put down among the election agent's expenses.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he quite understood what was the effect of the clause, but wished to have some definition of what were reasonable personal expenses.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That '100' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 35, leave out Sub-section (3.)—(Mr. Salt.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (3) stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the object of the sub-section was to provide that where minor payments were made by persons authorized they should be returned. It was necessary that the payments under Sub-section 2 should be returned; but he was willing to strike out the words

"by the candidate for his personal expenses." That would leave only the return under Sub-section 2; but it was absolutely necessary that that return should be made.

MR. SALT remarked, that he had said nothing about the clause the other day, because he quite understood that they were to leave out the whole of Sub-section 3. His objection to the Sub-section was, that it conflicted with the first part of the clause, which left liberty to make certain payments more or less large, while the sub-section declared that particulars must be returned. That surely was a contradiction, and he understood that they had agreed to strike it out.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the payments might be made; but it was necessary that the particulars of the items should be given.

MR. SALT said, that with regard to the effect which Sub-section 3 had upon Sub-section 1 he and the Attorney General were agreed. It was agreed on both sides that Sub-section 3 should be struck out so far as it affected Sub-section 1, and the only point necessary to be considered was its effect upon Sub-section 2. He had great doubts as to whether that sub-section was necessary at all. He would have raised an objection to Sub-section 2 at the proper time, only he did not wish to take up the time of the Committee. What was its operation? The candidate himself, or his clerk or other persons in charge of the committee room, were authorized to spend £10 on his account. That was what he (Mr. Salt) understood it to mean. If more was spent, then that surplus above £10 must be spent directly by the agent himself. Then Sub-section 3 stepped in and declared that, although the £10 might be expended upon the authority of the agent given to the clerk in charge of the committee room, a bill must be sent in containing all the details. What was the use of that? If a bill was to go in, what was the use of putting in Sub-section 2 at all? It merely made complications.

THE CHAIRMAN: Sub-section 2 is already part of the Bill. It is not in Order to refer to it, except as affecting the hon. Member's argument on the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: It was not put from the Chair.

Mr. Cavendish Bentinck

THE CHAIRMAN: No; but we are now on an Amendment to Sub-section 3.

MR. SALT begged pardon, if he had transgressed, and apologized; but he was obliged to explain Sub-section 2 in order to show his objection to Sub-section 3. He still thought they would be better without it. The agent might say to some clerk—"I give you authority to spend £5 in pens, ink, and stationery"—it could only be a small sum. Why not leave it so, and not complicate the Bill with details which could only lead to confusion, and in the end lead to corruption?

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the confusion arose from what had been put into the clause since the Bill was originally framed. He thought it would be very much better if the sub-section could be left out altogether. They were agreed that these expenses should be limited to petty expenses, and he could not imagine why this statement should go in, as it would only deal with small fixed sums.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he would give way if he did not think the sub-section essential. It was essential to check the power of spending, and all that was asked was that the man who spent the money should make a return to the election agent showing how he had spent it, so as to prevent the possibility of the money being spent wrongfully.

MR. GRANTHAM said, he thought the Attorney General was right, as Sub-section 3 was only a corollary to Sub-section 2.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he thought that much of the difficulty which had arisen was due to the fact that the Government had not taken the trouble to put down upon the Paper the Amendments which they proposed. That was a most unfortunate plan, which raised a great deal of unnecessary argument. If they made the Returning Officers give all the figures of personal expenditure it was intelligible that there should be some check provided; but the Committee had seen grave objections to that, and, therefore, he could see no use in complicating the clause unnecessarily. He thought the Attorney General would do well if he would tell them at once that he would drop the whole of the clause.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, he was utterly at a loss to understand what the complications were. If they were going to entrust the practical carrying on of the expenditure of the election to a petty cashier, and to allow him to expend a certain sum of money, the election agent must have an account of how the money was spent, and the account should be sent in; and if they admitted that bribery had been carried on under the guise of personal expenditure, they must have the amount of personal expenditure returned. But really the difference in the matter of drafting, as to the mode in which they were to frame this 3rd sub-section, was "the difference betwixt tweedledum and tweedledee," and he was not surprised at the Attorney General growing impatient.

Amendment negatived.

Amendment proposed, in page 11, line 35, to omit the words "under this section by the candidate for his personal expenses, or."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, "That those words stand part of the Bill," put, and negatived.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, nothing could be more humiliating for a candidate than to be compelled to set forth the particulars of his personal expenses, either for living at an hotel or entertaining his personal friends. The hon. Member opposite had introduced as an argument in favour of the clause that, under certain circumstances, there might be committed, under the guise of personal expenses, very gross bribery; and he mentioned the case of the Sandwich Election, and what had taken place there as an instance. But a long time had elapsed since then, and it was not unreasonable to suppose that bribery, in the shape of personal expenses, was the exception to the rule. It was necessary to watch very closely what would be the consequences of passing a Bill of this kind. So far as the position of the candidate was concerned, it could not be denied that, under this clause, he might be put to the greatest possible inconvenience if, as might very well happen, he could not state the exact particulars and figures of these personal expenses. Were hon. Gentlemen prepared to say that no personal expenses should be paid by the candidate except hotel expenses? Were they as sensitive about the payment of a cab fare as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who, in his anxiety to keep to the letter of the law at the election, paid a cab fare out of his own pocket, and accounted for it to the Returning Officer? It was desirable that the Committee should know whether the personal expenses were to be limited to the particular items mentioned, or whether other expenses would have to be returned; and they were, moreover, entitled to information on the point, not only for the reasons he had given, but for those advanced by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis). Finally, he regarded the clause as wholly unnecessary, while, at the same time, it would inflict great hardship and injustice upon honest men; and for those reasons he should, to the full extent of his ability, resist it at a future stage.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that a man under the old law was able to practise a good deal of bribery under the head of personal expenses, and, at the same time, to avoid the penalties attaching thereto. It was to remedy that state of things that the clause was necessary in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. LEWIS said, if there was any waste of time on this part of the Bill the responsibility rested on those who liked fiddle-faddle instead of legislation. The 2nd sub-section of the clause, if it had any meaning, meant that a statement of the particulars of every telegram—that was to say, its cost and the name of the person to whom it went—would have to be sent in. ["No, no!"] Some hon. Members opposite dissented from that, but it was nevertheless true; it was the particulars that had to be given, not a summary in the form of, say, "Telegrams £3." This was a part of that system of vexation and harassment which seemed to have delighted the framers of the Bill. He thought it reasonable that £40, or thereabouts, should be put as the limit of expenditure under this sub-section without details being required; he trusted they would not be deliberately compelled to furnish in detail all these little matters. Personally, he felt no anxiety about any such expenses, because he doubted that any Act of Parliament would get him either to keep or furnish an account of the kind. To compel a man to keep an account, perhaps for a month, of all that went out of his pocket, was a sort of tyranny that was hardly to be agreed to. And when they came to the Report it would be found that the settlement of these matters in the way provided by the clause would occupy a considerable time, because his hon. Friends and he had no intention of allowing them to pass without first doing all they could to get rid of them.

MR. WARTON said, that each clause of this wretched Bill brought together the most incongruous subjects. That was more strongly shown in the next clause, where two absolutely distinct subjects were brought together. The absurdity of the provision as to personal expenses contained in the 1st sub-section had been so completely demonstrated by his hon. Friend below him that he should spend no more time in considering it. He thought, however, that, owing to the many little provisions with which the Bill was encumbered, the 2nd sub-section had not received at the hands of the Committee the amount of attention it deserved.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, he regretted that the Government had thought it necessary to introduce so much detail into the Bill. It seemed to him that this clause was superfluous, because it seemed to be nothing else than a repetition of what was to be found in the Schedule. One criticism he made with regard to the Bill was that many of its details were totally unnecessary. If they were to have an enactment against corruption, bribery, and illegal payments, with a maximum expenditure set forth in it, it seemed to him totally unnecessary to go into the way the money was to be spent. The effect of that must be to increase the difficulty of honest men in their endeavours to conduct their elections upon pure principles. Moreover, the introduction of so much detail added largely to the bulk of a measure, which otherwise might have passed in a shorter time, and which would recommend itself to the House more than a measure which really alarmed men by its size. For these reasons he trusted that the Attorney General would, on reconsideration, perceive that many of the small provisions

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not think the Government could be blamed for wanting to reduce the expenses of a candidate; but this clause was perfectly absurd. Why should not the personal expenses of a candidate not be part of the general expenses of the election, and come within the amount set forth in the Schedule? As in the case of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis), it would be impossible for him to give an account of his personal expenses. He had never kept an account of them in his life. He believed the Attorney General had stated that, when a candidate went down to a constituency with his wife and family, the hotel expenses of his wife and family would be part of the personal expenses. That, he thought, was perfectly absurd. He thought the personal expenses should be the candidate's own expenses alone. Some years ago a candidate for an Irish constituency came over from London, and brought some actresses with him; and on the principle laid down by the Attorney General the expenses of those artistes might be considered as personal expenses. The clause in all its details was so absurd that he would recommend the Government to abandon it, because, as the hon. Member for Londonderry had judiciously warned them, if the clause were retained a discussion would be raised at the next stage that would considerably delay the further progress of the Bill.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he was reluctant to join in any Division against the provisions of the Bill when the Attorney General thought they were of use. But he was bound to say that, in his opinion, the present clause was so unreasonable, that it could serve no useful purpose to retain it. Sub-section 2 provided that, if an election agent authorized a person to spend £5 in stationery, a return should be made of the particular items on which the money was spent. He did not exactly suppose the person who spent the money should return the number of telegrams or sheets of paper; but it might mean something quite as unreasonable if an account was required of every shilling spent. Then, again, the 1st sub-section seemed to be absurd. The constituencies were so different, and the duration of the several elections varied so much, that it was unreasonable to apply any hard-and-fast time, because, for instance, the expenses of a candidate travelling about a county would be enormously different from the expenses of a candidate standing for and living at a small place. Reluctant as he was to take objection to what was seriously regarded by the Attorney General as an improvement on the existing law, he certainly could not support the clause.

MR. CALLAN said, he believed it impossible for any candidate, unless of a very economic turn of mind, to escape a Petition under the clause. He supposed if a man gave a shilling to a beggar, it would be part of his personal expenses.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he wished simply to point out that if the discussion of the clause were prolonged, it would be entirely the fault of the Government, who would go into details so childish, as to be altogether unworthy of a place in an Act of Parliament.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, that, while he agreed with the observation of the hon. Member opposite that the clause was unnecessary, and likely to become the cause of annoyance, he thought, as the Government were determined to insist on its retention, there would be no wisdom in prolonging the discussion.

MR. WHITLEY said, that the £100 for personal expenses provided for under the 1st sub-section of the clause would probably be insufficient in the case of a county, and a great deal too much in the case of a small borough election, where £5 or £10 would be enough. He wished to know whether a candidate would have to render an account of the items of expenditure, or simply make a declaration that he had spent the £100?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would not go into the general details of the question; but a candidate would not have to say—"I spent £1 here, and £1 there." He would simply have to return himself as having spent so-and-so on his personal expenses, and in that respect the present law would not be altered.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to point out that the 2nd sub-section was not part of the present law. He was particularly desirous of knowing whether or not the penalty of £5 a-day was still to be preserved. He imagined it would be if the 17 & 18 Vict. remained unrepealed.

MR. CALLAN said, that if they did not ask for the details of the personal expenses, what was the use of limiting those expenses to £100? If a candidate said he spent £100, and gave no details, how could they prove he spent only £100? A candidate might spend £200, and yet return his expenses at £100. He did not suppose that any Member of the House would make an incorrect return; but certainly they would have no means of arriving at the truth, unless the details of the expenses were required from the candidate. The moment they did not insist upon a detailed statement of a candidate's expenses, the whole efficacy of the clause was gone. In its present shape, the effect of the clause would only be irritating and annoying.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 69; Noes 22: Majority 47.—(Div. List, No. 168.)

Clause 25 (Remuneration of election agent and Returning Officer's expenses).

MR. WARTON rose to order. The clause related to two perfectly distinct matters, and, therefore, he thought it would be well if it were divided into two clauses. With that object, he would move that the figure "1" be omitted.

THE CHAIRMAN: Figure "1" really indicates a portion of the clause, and does not form any part of the Bill. I do not think the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) will be in Order in making a Motion of this kind.

MR. WARTON asked if there was no way by which the clause could be divided into two parts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Bridport would necessitate a re-numbering; if the hon. and learned Gentleman wished it, however, he would, at a later stage, undertake to divide the section.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 26 (Return and declaration respecting election expenses).

Mr. Warton

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 15, to leave out "forty" and insert "thirty-five."—(Mr. Macfarlane.)

Question proposed, "That 'forty' stand part of the Clause."

MR. LEWIS said, he was not present yesterday, and he did not desire to go back. He could not help saying, however, that no attention seemed to have been paid to the difficulty of dealing with an impecunious candidate. He did not know whether the Government proposed to make any provision in the case of a bond fide temporary inability to pay his debts on the part of the candidate, or whether the inevitable result must be that if the debts were not paid within 28 days, the debts unpaid must take their rank amongst disputed claims, and never could be paid except with the permission of a Judge of the Supreme Court.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if debts were not paid, they, of course, became disputed claims. If the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lewis) would look at Clause 23, he would find that the time limited by the Act for the payment of expenses should be 30 days after the day on which the candidate returned was declared elected. The 30 days, however, had by the Committee been reduced to 28. If debts were not paid by that time, an action must be brought to recover them.

MR. LEWIS said, he had known many cases in which candidates were for the time being unable to pay their election expenses. They could even conceive cases under that Bill where the expenses would amount to £2,000 or £3,000. Was it suggested that, even under the present Bill, it would not be an exceedingly common occurrence that candidates would not be able to meet their election expenses, and might desire a deferment of payment for a few weeks? The only result of such a proceeding as that would be, that a candidate would be unable to pay one penny unless an action was brought against him. He did not know there was any provision in the present law compelling payment within a limited period. Every Member of the House was not a man of fortune; indeed, there were many Members who had not paid their election expenses for the last election yet. [Laughter.] Hon. Members might laugh, but it was nevertheless a fact. He regretted that he was deprived of the opportunity of being present yesterday, because he should then have called attention to this subject. When he came to ascertain what was done by the Committee, it struck him they had omitted to consider that which was one of the ordinary incidents in political life. They were prescribing that a man should pay his election expenses by a certain day, though pressure might be put upon him temporarily by which the money he had put aside for these expenses would be devoted to other things. It was quite possible that there might be bond fide impecuniosity. Many Members of the House of Commons were in such a position at an election time. There had been no attempt to provide for a bond fide case of that kind, and he thought it was very necessary the Committee should have some understanding on the matter.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sorry the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) was not present yesterday, when they discussed the matter at some length. It was then proposed to lessen the time in which payment of expenses should be made. He was sorry to hear that many Members had entered into contracts which they could not fulfil. Personally, he did not see why these should not be ready money transactions. If a man undertook to pay a sum of money in a month, and then could not do so, it was only right and proper that an action should be brought against him.

MR. BIGGAR said, he raised to some extent the same question yesterday. He did not wish to allege, as the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry had alleged, that there was a scarcity of money on the part of Members of Parliament; but he desired to point out that what really occurred was this. It very often happened that candidates were subject to very unreasonable claims, and a large amount of correspondence was necessitated. A candidate who paid through an agent, and paid in a liberal manner, very often was required to pay considerably more than was fair. The intention of the Bill was good enough; but, at the same time, there was no proper provision to enable candidates to carry out the intentions of the Bill in a judicious and reasonable manner. The point raised by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry was a very important one, and deserved the serious attention of the Government. Yesterday the question was raised whether or not the lawsuits involved in the non-payment of election expenses could not be brought in a County Court. The decision of the Government was, that nothing less than an action in the Supreme Court could settle a claim after 28 days. The Government were certainly in this matter acting in a contradictory manner. In the first place, they limited the expenses to a very small sum, and then they made it impossible in some cases to recover the expenses without going to the Superior Court. He (Mr. Biggar) was not at all certain that all his election expenses in 1880 were paid yet, not because he objected to pay his fair expenses, but simply because he refused to meet fraudulent and unreasonable claims made upon him. There were a certain number of people in every constituency who, at an election time, made up their mind to plunder the candidate; and unless there was some protection in the Bill dealing with such people, the candidate might possibly be very hardly done by. In the majority of cases candidates were innocent persons, while there was a certain section of the community always ready to endeavour to seduce the candidates into some illegal action. Personally, he was of opinion that, instead of meting such formidable punishment out to the candidate, there ought to be very severe punishment inflicted upon anyone who attempted to encourage a candidate to commit an illegal act.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he thought the argument employed by the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) defeated its own object. If a claim was not met before the expiration of 28 days after the return of a candidate had been declared, it would, in all probability, be an extortionate claim. The claimant would have to go to the trouble and expense of going to the Superior Court; and if it was found that he had made an extortionate claim, the case would, in all probability, go against him, and he would be mulcted in costs. He (Mr. Macfarlane) thought the provision was rather in favour of the candidate than otherwise.

MR. LEWIS said, the point he had raised had nothing whatever to do with extortionate claims. He assumed the election bills were perfectly fair, and he had put a case which frequently rose in ordinary life—namely, a case in which a gentleman might find himself in the throes of a severe contest in which he was entitled to spend possibly £2,000. Before the time came for payment it might happen that one of those demands which frequently were made upon people would require him to use all his ready money. What would be the consequence? If there were 50 or 60 bills unpaid, there would necessarily have to be 50 or 60 actions. The Attorney General had said that if a debt was unpaid at the end of 28 days it passed into the category of disputed claims; and if it got there, it could not be paid except by the order of a Judge made in the Supreme Court. There was nothing at all in the Bill to deal with the state of circumstances which he (Mr. Lewis) had instanced. In addition to all the other harassments of the Bill, they placed a person who happened to be a candidate under the liability of having a number of actions brought against him if he was temporarily short of money.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he could not see why a candidate should not have an action brought against him, if he was not capable of paying his debts. As he had previously said, in his opinion it would be very much better if election payments were ready money payments.

MR. LEWIS said, he must contend that he was perfectly consistent in his objection. At the present time there was no such fetter as was now proposed placed upon the candidate. He challenged the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General to dispute that statement. This was not a question as to what contract a candidate might make with his creditor, because the Act would not allow him to make a reasonable contract with a man. An election bill must be sent in within 14 or 20 days; he forgot which—and the time was fixed when a candidate must pay, whether he would or not. That was a monstrously unworkable arrangement, and it was perfectly nonsensical.

MR. BIGGAR said, the chief difficulty seemed to him to be that of forcing people to bring an action—namely, forcing, for instance, a party making fraudulent claims to take proceedings. No opportunity was afforded of a claimant coming to terms with a candidate without going into Court. The hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane) said that if a fraudulent claim was made and was not met, the claimant would be forced to go to law; if the Court found that the claim was fraudulent, a man would not get his costs. But if a decision went in favour of the defendant, it might possibly happen that he would have to pay his own costs. He (Mr. Biggar) could conceive the legal costs under this section being very excessive, and therefore he could not understand the utility of the clause.

MR. GREGORY said, that what the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) pointed out was, that if a candidate disputed to pay a debt, the debt then became a disputed claim, and it could only be paid with the leave of the Court. He (Mr. Gregory) considered that this was a matter worthy of consideration, for it was a matter not affecting the creditor so much as the candidate.

MR. LEWIS said, he would not press his objection further, although it would involve his attacking the whole matter on Report if this impracticable method of dealing with matters of this sort were persisted in.

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'thirty-five' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to call the attention of the Attorney General to the construction of the clause; and he wished to propose, after line 20, to insert Sub-section (c) in place of Sub-section (a)—he wanted Sub-section (c) to stand first. The Bill was a very badly drawn one, and if the Attorney General would look at the clause carefully, he would see that the different items of expenditure were arranged in an order altogether different from that in which they were put in the 2nd Schedule. If they would look at the 2nd Schedule they would find, on page 47—

"Paid to E.F. the returning officer for the said county [or borough] for his charges at the said election."

And then they would find the next item to be—

“Personal expenses of the said C.D. paid by himself.”

Well, in the clause, Part A of Sub-section 1 referred to the payments made by the election agent, which item corresponded with item 3 in the Schedule, Part C of the sub-section corresponding with the first item in the Schedule. He was not quarrelling with the Schedule at all; but it appeared to him to be highly desirable to pay due regard to symmetry in preparing the clauses of that Bill. There should be either a re-arrangement of the clauses, or a re-arrangement of the Bill, he did not care which. He should rather prefer the order of the Schedule.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 20, after the word “candidate,” insert—(c.) A statement of the sums paid to the returning officer for his charges, or, if the amount is in dispute, of the sum claimed and the amount disputed.”—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was afraid he could not encourage the hon. and learned Gentleman by allowing him to divide the clause in this manner. The question was a trivial matter of detail. He could not be answerable for the symmetry of the clause, the substance being that with which he had most concern. He must adhere to the clause as it stood.

MR. WARTON said, he would not insist upon the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of The ATTORNEY GENERAL, Amendment made, in page 12, line 38, by leaving out the words “in connection with or as incidental to,” and inserting the words “in respect to the conduct or management of.”

MR. SALT said, that before the sub-section passed, the Committee should give it very careful consideration, as it was a very strong one. If it had been duly considered by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, he would not say anything more about it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, it was, no doubt, a very important sub-section.

MR. SALT: No doubt; but it is a very strong one.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the matter had been carefully considered.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE said, he had an Amendment on the Paper to insert after the last sub-section—

“(g.) A statement of the amount of the fee paid to the election agent for his own personal services.”

It appeared to him absolutely necessary that these words should be added to the section. He was afraid that if they did not insist upon this, the election agent might get more than he ought to.

Amendment proposed,

In page 12, line 40, after “received,” insert—“(g.) A statement of the amount of the fee paid to the election agent for his own personal expenses.”—(Sir William Hart Dyke.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the evil the right hon. Baronet had in his mind would be met by provisions in the latter part of the Bill.

MR. WARTON said, that, although this matter might be dealt with in some other part of the Bill, it ought to be dealt with here as well. They repeated other matters twice over, and he did not see why, on this point, they should be content merely with a statement in the Schedule. He thought that, at the commencement, it would have been well to have put all these things in the Schedule only; but now, seeing that they had started, they should go on to the end, and he would, therefore, support the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet if he went to a Division.

MR. CALLAN said, that if they looked at the Amendment they would see that it was necessary to insert it here. The right hon. Baronet had given Notice to move, immediately after the present Amendment, the following:—Clause 26, page 13, line 5, after “expenses,” insert—

“The said return shall also include a declaration that the fee paid to the election agent is in remuneration for his own personal services solely, and that no part of it has been applied to any other purpose.”

There was no such declaration or restriction in the Schedule. He hoped the right hon. Baronet would persevere with this Amendment, and also with the consequential Amendment on the next page. It seemed to him that they should have a declaration from the election agent that the fee paid to him was in remuneration for his own personal services solely, and that no part of it had been applied to any other purpose.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Committee could discuss the two Amendments separately. It seemed to him that it would be an invidious thing to make a declaration of the amount paid to the agent; and he would, therefore, urge the right hon. Baronet not to press this proposal.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE intimated that he did not propose to move the next Amendment, which was a consequential one.

MR. CALLAN said, that if the right hon. Baronet would not move the Amendment of which he had given Notice in line 5, he (Mr. Callan) would move it himself. Election agents were not persons of such sensitive character, and of such delicate sensibility, that they would feel it a slur upon them to be called upon to make a declaration that a certain amount of money was for their personal expenses. He did not believe it would be easy to get a perfect election agent under this Bill; and when they had got an agent he did not think there would be any objection on his part to make the declaration.

Amendment proposed,

In page 13, line 5, after "expenses," insert "the said return shall also include a declaration that the fee paid to the election agent is in remuneration for his own personal services solely, and that no part of it has been applied to any other purpose."—(Mr. Callan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the hon. Member would not press this Amendment, as it would be altogether without effect. Supposing £50 were paid to an election agent, after he had put it in his pocket he might spend it how he liked—he could say he had received so much for his own expenses, and although the sum might be returned as a payment to him, nobody might know what he had done with it, as it would be impossible to trace sovereigns and notes.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Callan

MR. LEWIS said, he had an Amendment to propose pro forma, in order to draw attention, in the first instance, to the vast change now, for the first time, made in the law—requiring a candidate to make a declaration which was equivalent to an oath as to the expenditure he had sanctioned. He wished particularly to refer to the words "at the same time," for they required a candidate to remain on the spot for 35 days. After all the accounts were dealt with he had to send in a declaration "at the same time." What he was driving at, and what he should ask the Committee to assent to by his Amendment, was this—that provided the candidate made a declaration prior to taking his seat in the House that should be sufficient. Members might naturally desire to go abroad after an election; but under this clause they would have to remain on the scene for 35 days, simply for the purpose of making a declaration. That was a tax upon an elected candidate; and this was a matter which Members should thoroughly understand. What he wished to suggest was that, in carrying out this serious alteration of the law, they should endeavour to make it fit in with the exigencies of business or habits of life, and not to keep a Member on the scene in that way. At the time of the last General Election he had a business engagement calling him 3,000 miles away; two days after the election he went away, and did not return for two months; but under this clause he would have had to give up that engagement, and also to remain more than a month on the spot. That was an illustration of what might occur to many Members; and that would be a serious inconvenience. The Government could have no object in creating this inconvenience; and he thought that it would be sufficient to require a Member, before taking his seat, to make a declaration that he had not spent more than his agent's accounts, and would not spend any more on the election.

Amendment proposed, in page 13, to omit Sub-section (3).—(Mr. Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (3) stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was willing to agree to the principle of the hon. Member's Amendment, and to make the clause as elastic as possible; and if the Amendment were withdrawn he would make such an alteration in the subsection as would give the candidate a reasonable time to make his declaration. As the hon. Member had said, urgent matters might take a Member away immediately after an election.

MR. LEWIS said, he cordially assented to the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. HINDE PALMER said, he had always considered that the proposed change in the law would be the most effective part of the Bill, because it would bind the candidate and his agent to a statement of the actual amount of the election expenses. That had in times past been plainly evaded. He was afraid that if the statement was only to be made by a formal declaration made to the Returning Officer it would soon become a mere matter of routine, and that due sense of responsibility and weight would not be attached to the declaration which he wished should be made at the Table of the House. He was afraid that in that way the value of the declaration would degenerate; but if it were solemnly made at the Table of the House, that would add to the value of the declaration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. SALT said, he had proposed to reduce £100 in the clause to £5; but as the Attorney General and the Committee favoured the higher penalty he would not now take up time by pressing his Amendment.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS proposed, in page 13, to omit the section—

He did not wish an agent to escape punishment; but, as the section stood, a Member being elected would come at once to the House; exciting topics might arise within the 35 days, and yet the Member was to be forced to apply all his ingenuity and time to take care that the election agent sent in his Return, or, failing that, he should lose his seat. He thought that proposition had only to be stated to confute the whole cause. By the Procedure Clause it was provided that bills must be sent in in 14 days, and settled in 14 days more. It was then simply a question of getting the return sent in within a certain time, and it was pushing things too far to punish the candidate in the way proposed. If a candidate and his agent fell out the agent might keep back the Return, and the candidate might be unseated. In Clause 27 there was a rule for an application to the High Court; but he did not think a candidate ought to be subjected to a groundless Petition simply because an agent had not sent in the return. That was putting too much on the candidate when his mind was occupied with other things, although he thought it was necessary to make the agent send in the return. He would give the Court some power to enforce the provision he proposed.

Amendment proposed,

In page 13, to omit—"If without such authorised excuse as in this Act mentioned, a candidate or an election agent fails to comply with the requirements of this section he shall be guilty of an illegal practice,"—(Sir R. Assheton Cross.)

—instead thereof.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir Henry James) said, he had the strongest wish that the penalty should fall on the right person. He thought he might accept a provision to the effect that if an agent, in defiance of the candidate, would not perform his duty, a penalty should fall upon him. If the right hon. Gentleman would allow the words to stand he would undertake to provide that non-performance or non-compliance on the part of an agent should not be an illegal practice as to the candidate, but that the penalty should fall on the agent. He would endeavour to carry that out on Report.

MR. LEWIS said, he thought that the punishment ought to be strong. In Irish constituencies he found that Members were great sinners in regard to their Returns at the last General Election. In an Ulster county two supporters of the Government and two opponents made no returns; in a Southern borough a Liberal and a Conservative made no return. The hon. Member for Oavan (Mr. Biggar) made no Return, and his Colleague made no Return. In a well-known Munster county one Liberal and one Conservative made no Returns, and in the most distinguished County of Dublin two Liberals and one Conservative made no Returns. An hon. Gentleman opposite had the distinguished advantage of being returned for 10s., for he returned the entire amount of his costs, including the Returning Officer's charge, at 10s. Neither the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan), nor his Colleague, nor his opponent made any Return. A Member of the Government made no Return; but as he was not opposed it might be supposed that he was returned without cost. For wilful neglect a candidate ought to be held responsible.

MR. CALLAN said, he had made no Returns, because such Returns were a complete farce. He did not believe there was any truthfulness in any Return by an election agent for any Member of the House. He did not suggest that any Member would not make an excellent and accurate Return; but these Returns were regarded as shams. He thought the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) had not made quite a correct statement, because he found that a Return had been sent in for the County of Tyrone Election. There were a number of English as well as Irish constituencies for which no Return had been made; and he asked whether the Executive had taken any steps with regard to them? Had the House taken any notice of the misconduct of Members in not making those Returns? Had the Attorney General done so? Of course, in such places as Taunton and Gloucester it would have been dangerous not to make Returns. In his own case the Judge did not censure him for not making a Return; but said that perhaps it was just as well that he had not made one.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, with regard to his own election, he found the Return of the Returning Officer was perfectly accurate. He would also say that those Returns, whether accurate or not, showed a good deal. In 1874 he lost his seat, and the two hon. Gentlemen who unseated him advertised very candidly that they had spent £497 in a few days' contest in messengers and butchers.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that the hon. Member was wandering from the subject before the Committee.

Mr. Lewis

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he believed they were on the subject of the Election Returns. Reference had been made to the Returns of the last General Election; but if the Chairman's ruling was that reference should not be made to any other Election Returns, he would, of course, not press the matter.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, there was an Amendment on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Mayne), which would have accomplished all that the Amendment of the Attorney General suggested, and which, in the hon. Member's absence, he had intended to move. But he understood the Attorney General to say that the candidate was to be liable for the penalties, if he committed the offence without excuse, and that he was not to be liable if it were done by the agent. If the hon. and learned Gentleman brought up a clause on Report embodying that principle, he thought it would be satisfactory.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would undertake to provide that the penalty for the illegal practice referred to in Sub-section 5 should not fall on the candidate except for his own act, and also that there should be no avoidance of the seat on account of a false declaration by an agent without the consent of the candidate. The candidate should only be liable for his own wilful act.

MR. GIBSON said, it would be reasonable for the hon. and learned Attorney General to consider, in drafting the clause, two things which the Bill left very obscure. It would appear on the drafting of Sub-section 5 that if no Return were made by the candidate without the authorized excuse, he might be guilty of an illegal practice without any trial or award of any Court. Was it intended that a man should be deemed guilty ipso facto? For his own part, he thought there should be a decision by a Court of Justice before the great penalties prescribed by the Bill were incurred. These penalties fell not only on the candidate, but on the constituency, and, to a certain extent, affected the House itself; and he said it was not right that the House should be deprived of one of its Members, and the constituency of its Representative, and subjected to all the turmoil of a fresh election, simply because there had been a slip or a piece of bad judgment on the part of the candidate or his agent. Therefore, he trusted that, on reconsideration of the clause, the Attorney General would take care to put in words which would provide that the candidate should be "adjudged guilty" of the offence imputed to him. The second suggestion he had to make was that there should be some power given to the Court of exercising a judicial discretion; the Court, in his opinion, should be empowered either to say that the candidate was guilty of an illegal practice, and that, therefore, his seat should be voided, or else that he should be punished by a fine of £100.

MR. GORST thought his right hon. and learned Friend hardly recollected that the election would be declared void by the decision of the Court, and after a Report made to Mr. Speaker. That being the case, the seat was not voided ipso facto.

MR. GIBSON said, it appeared to him that the effect of the sub-section might be that, if a candidate were guilty of a corrupt practice, his seat would be vacated and void. There was no magic in the words of the clause. The seat might ipso facto be voided; and he considered it very undesirable that the clause should remain unaltered, and in doubt.

MR. GORST said, he did not want to carry on a controversy with the right hon. and learned Gentleman on this subject; still, he thought he would see, on examination of Sub-section 10, that an illegal practice did not ipso facto make void a seat. That only took place after the Report had been made to the Speaker of the House of Commons.

MR. CALLAN said, he had been reading over the list of Members who had not made any Election Returns. As something might attach to Members for not making Returns, he wished to show how the Government treated the matter. One Member in Ireland who made no Return had since been made a Judge. Then, in the case of the Radnor Boroughs, Sir Richard Green Price had made no Return, nor had the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, his noble Friend was not elected in the ordinary way. He issued no addresses; the electors of the Radnor Boroughs returned him spontaneously, and, he would undertake to say, without one farthing of expense.

MR. CALLAN said, there must always be some expense connected with an election. He had merely alluded to these matters because his own case had been singled out. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) had referred to him as not having made a Return, in reply to which he asked what steps the Government had taken in the case of other persons in the same position; and he had shown that they made one Member a Judge, another a Baronet, and the third a Member of the Cabinet.

MR. BIGGAR said, according to the principle acted upon by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for War, nothing would be easier than for a candidate to say he had not paid anything, while he left someone else to meet all the obligations.

MR. CALLAN said, at the Monaghan Election last week the candidate paid nothing, and would not be asked for a penny. Did a candidate, under such circumstances, violate the law in not making a Return?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, his noble Friend took no part in the election. He issued no addresses.

MR. CALLAN said, he was then in the same position as the noble Lord, because he had issued no addresses.

MR. BIGGAR said, any candidate might, in like manner, issue no address and take no part in the election, leaving the working of it to others.

MR. R. T. REID rose to Order. Was the hon. Member in Order in the remarks he was now making?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the observations of the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) appeared to him to be entirely beyond the Question before the Committee.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. GIBSON said, he proposed to move a modification of the clause, so as to make a broad distinction between the person guilty of making the false declaration referred to in Sub-section 6 and the person only indirectly concerned in the act. He wished to amend the sub-section by making the act of the candidate alone a corrupt practice within the meaning of the Act. This point required some examination. He agreed that if a candidate made the declaration falsely he should be guilty of an offence, and that, on conviction on indictment, he should be subject to the punishment for wilful and corrupt perjury. Nor did he question that in the case of a person guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury power should be given to make him void his seat in that House. But surely it was not reasonable to say that the act of the agent who made the false declaration should be a corrupt practice within the meaning of the Act, because the effect of that would be to punish a perfectly innocent person. He should be satisfied if the Attorney General would say that when he considered the drafting of Sub-section 5 he would also consider the drafting of Sub-section 6, so as to make a distinction in the case of an innocent person, and prevent him suffering from the act of an agent guilty of falsehood in making the declaration. If the Attorney General did not see his way to deal with this matter on Report, he would ask the Committee to give power to the Court that tried the individual to consider the facts of the case, and in their discretion to say whether, besides being liable to the punishment for wilful and corrupt perjury, the accused should also be deemed to have committed a corrupt practice under the Act, and that the Court should have power to say that the case was met by the prosecution for wilful and corrupt perjury. He wanted to make the clause elastic by giving the Court power to say that the corrupt act of the agent should not tell against the candidate and the constituency. He would leave to the Court power to make the act a corrupt practice; but he would take away the absolute necessity for doing so. But, as he had before intimated, he would be satisfied not to proceed further with his proposal if the Attorney General would give the undertaking he asked; otherwise he should have to take the opinion of the Committee upon the question.

MR. GORST said, he had understood the Attorney General to say that he would alter the sub-section in precisely the sense the right hon. and learned Gentleman wished.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had already stated, with reference to this section, that the candidate should not suffer for the act of the agent committed without his knowledge or consent. He was willing to say that the corrupt perjury of the agent should not void the seat of the candidate.

On the Motion of Mr. E. STANHOPE, Amendment made, in page 13, line 35, by leaving out all the words from the word "provided," inclusive, to the end of the sub-section.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill. .

Clause 27 (Authorized excuse for non-compliance with provisions as to return and declaration respecting election expenses).

MR. GIBSON said, he had several Amendments on the Paper to this clause relating to the discretion to be given to the Court; and he would be glad to have an intimation from the Attorney General as to the first of these, because it would be a guide to him in determining whether to proceed or not with the rest. He had gone through the section with a great deal of care, and he had some little doubt as to whether, by the words "or any error therein . . . or misconduct of his election agent, &c.," the Attorney General might not have intended to give the relief which he himself sought by the introduction into the third line of the section of the words "or, being transmitted, contains some false statement." The clause ran as follows:—

"Where the return and declarations respecting election expenses of a candidate at an election had not been transmitted as required by this Act," and so on. He (Mr. Gibson) asked to amend that by introducing the words after "transmit," "or, being transmitted, contains some false statement." He was not quite clear whether those words were not intended under the word "error," because it was quite plain that Sub-section (a) contemplated that the Return might contain some statement that was not correct. But whether the word "error" was intended to mean an intentional error, or an error which was not intended, was open to some question. He would like to have this made perfectly clear, because he wanted to deal with one class of cases—namely, cases in which candidates or their agents, while keeping perfectly within the limits of purity—not spending anything more than was provided by the Act—yet make false statements in certain particulars—statements which to their own knowledge were false, but which did not in the slightest degree affect the purity of the election, and did not sin at all in the direction of increased expenditure. What he wanted really to do was, to enable the tribunal, when it considered such a matter, to deal as it thought fit with a statement which was false to a certain extent. If the Attorney General could see his way to accept his (Mr. Gibson's) Amendment, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman would do that which would really prevent serious injustice and great hardships in many cases. He only desired to give the Court power to accept, if it chose, a candidate's excuse or explanation of a false statement. He desired to give the Court power to say that, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, they were satisfied as to the purity of the election, and that they thought the election ought to stand.

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 21, after "transmitted," insert, "or, being transmitted, contains some false statement."—(Mr. Gibson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was quite prepared to accept the Amendment of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson); but he would suggest that the words should be inserted after the word "Act."

MR. GIBSON asked leave to withdraw his Amendment in favour of that of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 22, after the word "Act," insert "or, being transmitted, contains some false statement."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. GIBSON, Amendment made, in page 14, line 25, after "error," by inserting "or any false statement."

Amendment proposed, in page 14, line 25, after "therein," insert "or any payment made after the proper time."—(Mr. Gibson.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) not to press this Amendment, as it contained very different subject-matter from the Amendments already accepted, and as the matter had been already discussed.

MR. GIBSON said, he had just one word of explanation. It was true, as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had said, that the matter had been previously discussed; but, if his memory served him correctly, the Attorney General, when they were discussing the subject on a former occasion, mentioned, as an excuse for the non-acceptance of an Amendment similar to this, the weighty powers and discretion which were given to the Election Court to deal with such matters. He (Mr. Gibson), unquestionably, thought it was very desirable to enable the Election Court to say that the election had been a perfectly pure one, and that the limit of expenditure had not been exceeded. If a payment had simply been made after the proper time, surely no man of common sense would say this was a matter which should prevent the Court making an order. It was quite true, as the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had stated, that this Amendment contained very different subject-matter from the two just accepted; but he, nevertheless, ventured to press it upon the consideration of the hon. and learned Gentleman. He (Mr. Gibson) only intended to prevent a man's election being upset, because a perfectly bond fide payment was made after the statutory time.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, that when the matter was discussed on a former occasion, the Government promised to provide that if payments were made after the time allowed, and they did not infringe the law as to the maximum, the candidate should not be affected thereby.

MR. GIBSON said, he was perfectly satisfied with that statement, and he would, therefore, ask leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

On the Motion of Mr. GIBSON, Amendment made, in page 14, line 34, after

[Fifteenth Night.]

"error," by inserting "or any false statement."

Amendment proposed, in page 15, line 5, after "transmit," insert "or for transmitting."—(Mr. Gibson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman required some more words; he would require after the word "declaration," "or for a false statement in such return and declaration."

Question put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of The ATTORNEY GENERAL, Amendment made, in page 15, line 6, after "declaration," by inserting "or for a false statement in such return and declaration."

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 28 (Publication of summary of return of election expenses).

MR. H. H. FOWLER proposed, in page 15, line 21, after "in," insert "the 'Gazette' and in." The object of the Amendment was that the Return of the election expenses should not only be published in the local newspapers, but also in The Gazette, and he thought that if that were done it would be of great convenience.

Amendment proposed, in page 15, line 21, after "in," insert "the 'Gazette' and in."—(Mr. H. H. Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought that the publication of the Return of the election expenses in one local newspaper and The Gazette might be very well; but to insert it in two local newspapers and The Gazette was rather too much of a good thing.

MR. E. STANHOPE hoped that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would not agree to the Amendment, because it would lead to unnecessary expense. He could understand the publication of the Return in two local newspapers, because it might be desirable to have it published in one Liberal and one Conservative newspaper.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. E. Stanhope) had just anticipated what he was going to say. He (the Attorney General) considered The Gazette an expensive luxury. He had provided for the insertion of the Return in two local newspapers, because he thought it would then meet the eye of all classes of readers. He hoped his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) would not press his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Disqualification of Electors.

Clause 29 (Prohibition of persons guilty of corrupt or illegal practices, &c. from voting) agreed to.

Clause 30 (Prohibition of interested or qualified persons from voting).

MR. LEWIS proposed the omission of Sub-section 1, which ran as follows:—

"Any person who is beneficially interested (otherwise than as member of the company or society) in the proceeds of the letting of a committee room for the purposes of an election, is prohibited from voting at an election."

He could not conceive for a moment why the prohibition to vote should proceed to such an extent. A stationer who provided goods was not disqualified, neither were any other tradesmen who might supply election furniture. Why need they descend to such particulars as these? Let them take the case of a house that was in trust for six or seven people. Were they going to disqualify six or seven people, because £5 or £10 was paid for a room—in which they were interested—to be used as a committee room? Why on earth, if there was to be any disqualification at all under such circumstances, was it not carried through the whole class of tradesmen concerned? The provision was most obnoxious, for it seemed to go on the assumption that there must be some corruption or improper motive in engaging a room for the use of a committee.

Amendment proposed, in page 16, leave out Sub-section (1).—(Mr. Lewis.)

MR. GORST said, that if a candidate desired to corrupt a constituency by hiring rooms, he could hire any number of rooms so long as they were not committee rooms, and the people who let them would not be prohibited from voting. As the section now stood, it would be possible for some some people to be disenfranchised against their will. Supposing a man of strong Conservative proclivities had the management of a Trust on behalf of persons who were known Liberals. If part of the Trust consisted of a room which could be let for a committee room, the Trustee had nothing to do, if he wished to disenfranchise a number of excellent Liberals against their will, but to go to a Conservative candidate and let him the room in question as a committee room. By the letting of the room the people in question would be beneficially interested, and consequently they would be prohibited from voting. Surely, this could never be intended.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he had seriously asked himself where a person was to find a committee room. The committee had already decided that public-houses were not to be used as committee rooms, and coffee-houses and other such places were included in the same prohibition. In a great many districts they would probably only find one room reasonably large enough for a committee room, and it might happen that that room belonged to the most important person in the district. If the man let the room was he to be disqualified from voting? He (Mr. Labouchere) could not see why a man should be disqualified, because he let his room for a fair price, any more than the man should be disqualified who supplied stationery to the candidate or his agent. He agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) that this section ought to be struck out.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would accept the Amendment.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 31 (Hearing a person before he is reported guilty of corrupt or illegal practice, &c.; and incapacity of person reported guilty).

MR. GREGORY said, he had an Amendment to propose to this clause, which was of some importance to the persons who came under its operation. The clause provided that certain persons might be reported guilty of corrupt practices, and that certain penalties should attach to their being so reported. In addition to the disabilities which the Bill provided in such cases, it was no pleasant thing to be reported guilty of corrupt practices. Of course, a person was not liable to imprisonment unless he was convicted by the Court subsequently to being reported; but to a professional man or to a person in a respectable situation of life it might involve very serious consequences, if his name appeared in the report of an Election Judge as having been guilty of corrupt practices, no matter whether he was subsequently prosecuted or not. Now, this clause provided that notice should be given to the person so reported "where practicable." What the words "where practicable" meant he did not know; but he, at all events, considered that the person who was reported as guilty of corrupt practices should have notice given him of the charge brought against him, and therefore he now had to propose to omit the words "where practicable." He noticed that an Amendment upon this subject stood in the name of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). That Amendment was to the effect that notice should be given to such person, "or left at his last known place of abode." That Amendment he (Mr. Gregory) would be very glad to adopt subsequent to the omission of the words "where practicable."

Amendment proposed, in page 16, line 29, leave out "where practicable."—
(Mr. Gregory.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there was just the fear that if a notice was to be left at the last known place of abode of a person reported guilty of corrupt practices, and the person had left that abode, he would escape all the consequences of his acts. He had endeavoured to meet this in Clause 59, page 36, for in that clause it was provided that—

"Such summons, notice, or document, may be served either by delivering the same to such person, or by leaving the same at, or sending the same by post by a registered letter to, his last known place of abode."

These words, he believed, would meet the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). He had, however, no objection to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory).

Question put, and negatived.

MR. GORST supposed that the Amendment of which he had given Notice—namely, that the notice should be left at the man's last known place of abode—was not necessary, and he should not therefore proceed with it.

MR. GREGORY said, he was also of opinion that a man should have an opportunity of making a statement before he was reported of being guilty of corrupt practices. Under the clause a man would be called into Court and asked, "what have you to say to this?" And he had no opportunity of any legal assistance or of calling witnesses. He (Mr. Gregory) thought that was a proper construction to put upon the clause as it was now framed. He thought that a person who was liable to the serious consequences of being reported guilty of corrupt practices—liable to certain civil disabilities which would mean absolute ruin to a professional man—should have the opportunity of making a defence to the charge brought against him. What he (Mr. Gregory) therefore proposed to do was to strike out the words "making a statement to show why he should not be so reported," and insert "being heard by himself, or counsel, or solicitor, and of calling evidence in his defence." If the Attorney General objected to the words "counsel or solicitor," and was willing to sacrifice his branch of the Profession, he (Mr. Gregory) was ready to meet him for the sake of the main point, and to omit the words "counsel or solicitor" altogether. That would leave the Amendment very general—namely, "being heard by himself and of calling evidence in his defence." At present, he had better, perhaps, propose to omit the words "making a statement."

Amendment proposed,

In page 16, line 31, leave out "making a statement to show why he should not be so reported," and insert "being heard by himself, or counsel, or solicitor, and of calling evidence in his defence."—(Mr. Gregory.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was almost inclined to make a bargain with the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) to the effect that if he (the Attorney General) was willing to give up his branch of the Profession, he (Mr. Gregory) would give up his. He (the Attorney General) thought that if they allowed counsel or solicitors to appear in every case, the expenses of Petitions would be such that they could not possibly be borne by any candidate, and that the Election Petition Judges would be employed in trying the Petitions for an inordinately long time. Such an enormous waste of time, both to the Election Judges and to the Petitioners would ensue, that the obvious result would be that Petitions would never be lodged. His hon. Friend would see at once the objection to calling counsel or solicitors, by calling to mind the case of the Macclesfield Petition, in which 4,000 persons were reported guilty of corrupt practices. What would have been the consequence if each of those persons had called counsel on their own behalf? He certainly agreed with the hon. Gentleman that men ought to have a reasonable opportunity of being heard, and therefore he would agree to the persons reported having the right to be heard by themselves, and of calling evidence in their own defence. If that were permitted, justice, he thought, would be done.

MR. GRANTHAM said, at the first blush he was inclined to accept the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. If, however, the Attorney General would look at Subsection 2 of this clause, he would find that the position of a reported person was very much more serious than was generally supposed. By the 2nd subsection—

"Every person who after the commencement of this Act is reported by any election court or election commissioners to have been guilty of any corrupt or illegal practice, shall, whether he obtained a certificate of indemnity or not, be subject to the same incapacity as he would under this Act be subject to if he had at the date of the report been convicted of the offence of which he is reported to have been guilty ; ”

consequently, he was in exactly the same position as if he had been tried and been convicted. No doubt, if in the Macclesfield case each of the 4,000 persons reported guilty of corrupt practices had called counsel great inconvenience would have been caused ; yet it did seem hard that persons should be subjected to exactly the same penalties as if there had been a trial, when they knew that those persons had not had the opportunity of obtaining the assistance of anyone to defend them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Grantham) was labouring under a slight misapprehension.

MR. GORST said, that what they urged upon the Attorney General was what they had recommended at first—namely, that some tribunal should be provided for the speedy summary decision of these cases. They wanted the Election Court now to do two things, and it would be able to do neither well. First, it would have to hear the Election Petition, and that was a kind of collateral thing that would go on all the time, and, besides that, it would have to try all persons guilty of corrupt practices. He hoped it was not too late to ask the Attorney General to reconsider this matter. He believed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) proposed, before the Bill left the Committee, to make some proposal with the view of appointing some tribunal to sit for the purpose of the speedy summary trial of persons offending against the Election Law. If the Government could see their way to the establishment of a tribunal of that kind many of these unsatisfactory clauses would be removed from the Bill, because the moment the Judge found from the evidence under the Petition there was ground to believe that a particular person had been guilty of corrupt practices, all he would have to do would be to get the Public Prosecutor to appear before him and order that the person be tried, and the trial could take place at once without delay, with counsel, witnesses, prosecutor, Judge, and all in attendance. It was very important to introduce a modification to this part of the Bill ; but he trusted that before the Report this matter would be considered, as he was convinced that that which was suggested was the only way out of the difficulty.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the clause contemplated two Courts. If it only included the Election Court, presided over by the Judges of the land, he was satisfied that great care would be taken to see justice done, and men against whom charges were made would have an opportunity of being heard ; but the clause went a great deal further than that, and contained the words “ or Election Commissioners.” He did not think the conduct of the Election Commissioners had given great satisfaction throughout the country—he believed the manner in which Petitions were conducted in 1880 was not such as to reflect credit upon the administration of justice in this country. He did not wish to pursue this matter further ; but certainly must express a hope that his hon. Friend would go to a Division if the clause was to continue that power to the Commissioners. It did not seem to him to be right to give these gentlemen the opportunity of inflicting the heavy punishments contained in the Bill upon a person without giving that person the bare opportunities for his defence that any defendant would have, in however small a case, before the magistrates.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not think that to send down a Summary Court to try these cases, whilst an election was going on, would tend on the whole to the best results. They must look to both sides of the question. He was willing to agree to an Amendment which should secure that substantial justice should be done in these cases ; but, on the other hand, care should be taken that the inquiry should not be prolonged to an indefinite extent. It would be impossible for 4,000 issues to be tried, as would have been necessary in the case of the Macclesfield Election, whilst the Petition was going on. Counsel would have to speak in defence of the person against whom the charge was brought, and he supposed the prosecuting counsel would have to reply in each case ; trials in that way might be prolonged to any extent, and the expense would fall, not upon the right persons, but upon the locality.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he thought that power should be given in cases of this kind to employ solicitors or counsel, if the persons employing them paid for them themselves.

MR. GREGORY said, he was desirous that there should be no mistake about this matter. He would propose that the words "being heard" and "calling evidence" should be retained, and that the words "by himself, or counsel, or solicitor" should be left out. In that way opportunities would be given for calling evidence if it were thought necessary. He did not suppose a person would require it, or ought to require it; still it would be well to give a man the power of obtaining it if he so desired. His reason for moving this Amendment he would briefly state. There were penalties of a novel description contemplated under this Bill in addition to the incapacities to which he had adverted. In Sub-sections 4 and 5 of this clause they found that the Public Prosecutor, where a barrister or solicitor was proved in evidence before the Election Commissioners to have been guilty of, or privy to, any corrupt practice in reference to any election, whether such person had obtained a certificate of indemnity or not, had to bring the matter before the Inn of Court, High Court, or tribunal having power to take cognizance of any misconduct of such person in his Profession; and such Inn of Court, High Court, or tribunal might deal with such person as if the corrupt practice of which he had been guilty were a misconduct in his Profession. Furthermore, the Commissioners would have to report the case to the Director of Public Prosecutions. No doubt, these provisions were with the view to the finding a professional person disqualified from practice; therefore, he was not far wrong in saying that the clause might lead to the ruin of these persons. In the case of barristers, solicitors, Justices of the Peace, and persons of that character, they would be exposed to professional disqualification; and it was on that ground, therefore, that he pressed his Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was afraid that if the words "being heard" were inserted, they might be taken to confer the right to appear by counsel or by a solicitor. That would not be giving up a right; and if a person had a right to be heard, he had a right to call evidence, and have his case conducted by counsel or solicitor. When the hon. Member gave as a reason why the Amendment should be inserted, that the person against whom the charge was brought should be, if he chose, represented by counsel or solicitor, he would point out that the sub-section referred to a person who was a barrister or solicitor, or who belonged to a profession the admission to which was regulated by law; and when it was provided that the person accused should appear personally, looking to the nature of the profession, it was hardly necessary that provision should be made for others to appear for him. A barrister or solicitor could appear before the Election Court and state his own case in such capacity. [Mr. GREGORY: No.] He (the Attorney General) was willing to agree that such a person should have an opportunity of being heard or calling evidence. Would his hon. Friend accept words which would give the person an opportunity of calling evidence and making a statement to show cause why he should not be reported? If such an Amendment were agreed to, he would be able to appear in person, and it would obviate the necessity of allowing him to employ a barrister or solicitor. It would, therefore, be seen that he (the Attorney General) met the hon. Member in all but the matter of allowing a barrister or solicitor to appear. The person charged would have an opportunity of calling evidence, and, no doubt, substantial justice would be done.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would consider some other classes besides barristers and solicitors. These were not the only persons affected by the clause; surely the 4,000 cases which it was said would have had to have been heard in Macclesfield were not all barristers and solicitors? [An hon. MEMBER: None of them.] Exactly. If the Attorney General had his way, what would happen? The hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had stated that he had only confidence in one of the tribunals. Well, if this sort of preliminary inquiry took place before the Judges, they would see that justice was done; but there was no security whatever that, if a trial had to take place before a Court of Commissioners, that Court would do what the Judges would do—namely, see that justice was done. Let them observe how unequal the provision was with regard to the different classes of offenders. No doubt, the barristers and solicitors, for whose good fame his hon. Friend seemed to be so solicitous, would be able to protect their own interests. In the case of some ignorant man, however, who knew nothing about Courts of Law, or trials, or equity, or anything of that kind, if a charge were brought against him, how was he to cross-examine those who brought an accusation against him? Were they not going to allow such a person as that to avail himself of the services of a barrister or solicitor; but would he have to make his own statement, cross-examine his own witnesses, and so on, before the tribunal? Before his hon. Friend (Mr. Gregory) accepted any compromise such as that suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, something of the kind suggested by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) ought to be done. That was to say, they should take care that the tribunal was of such a kind that a poor and ignorant defendant should not suffer from being precluded from availing himself of the assistance of a barrister or a solicitor.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he wished to call attention to one point—namely, that it seemed to him that the present Amendment would not satisfy all that was required. If cases were only to come before the Election Judges there would be no reason to fear anything; but, according to the clause, these cases were to be allowed to come before the Election Commissioners in addition to Election Judges. He must protest against the conduct of the Home Secretary, who seemed to be engaging his Colleague in conversation whilst he (Mr. E. Stanhope) was addressing them and the Committee on the subject of this clause. He (Mr. E. Stanhope) attended to this Bill quite as much as the Home Secretary, and surely he might be permitted to make his suggestion without having the attention of those before whom he was putting it diverted in this way by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. His suggestion was that the Committee could not be perfectly satisfied with the decisions that were likely to be arrived at by the Election Commissioners, and, that that being so, there ought to be some provision in the Bill for an appeal to be allowed in these cases. The Attorney General said there would be thousands of cases to hear at some elections, and had drawn attention to the case of Macclesfield. Well, although there might be a great number of cases where illegal acts were committed, it was perfectly clear that, with the great mass of these cases, there would be no difficulty whatever. In most of these cases the evidence would be plain and incontrovertible, and it would not be necessary to have intricate trials; but, on the other hand, in some exceptional cases, injustice might be done unless there was a careful trial; therefore, it would only be reasonable to give an appeal to some tribunal which would command the confidence of the country.

MR. WHITLEY said, he quite agreed with the hon. Member who had just sat down with regard to the Commissioners. He did not believe they commanded the confidence of the country; and the Committee generally, he was sure, could not help thinking that it was a very serious responsibility indeed which would be incurred by the unfortunate people who would be called up before the Commissioners, as they might be unable to defend themselves properly, and might, through an imperfect defence, subject themselves to most severe penalties. He was sure his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General was the last man in the world to wish such a thing as that. The hon. and learned Gentleman would see that some men could not make a fair statement of their own case. He knew that men of his own Profession would, in all probability, be able to defend themselves very well; but there were an immense number of people, whose conduct might be made the subject of inquiry during or after an election, who would not have the faculty of defending themselves, and it was for them he was now pleading. He could hope that the hon. and learned Gentleman would see his way to confining the power of hearing these cases to the Election Judges. To confer upon the Election Commissioners the power of inflicting the severe penalties in this clause would be a very serious matter, and he did not think it was one of the things which the Committee should allow. He therefore hoped and trusted that the Attorney General would agree to the suggestion of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory), or adopt the modifying suggestion of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler).

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he could assure the hon. Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) that it was not out of any disrespect to him that the Home Secretary, himself (the Solicitor General), and some other Colleagues were conversing together just now. It was clear that sometimes they must discuss points amongst themselves to see what course could be adopted, or what suggestion could be made; otherwise they would never be able to get on. Well, an operation of that kind was going on when the hon. Member had complained of a want of attention of the Attorney General and the Home Secretary. The provision to which reference had been made would not, he thought, be attended with the serious consequences that some hon. Members anticipated. The question was one of incapacity, and not of serious disabilities, and he agreed with the hon. Member for Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) that if his suggestion could be carried out—that was to say, if it were perfectly practicable—it would be a good thing to adopt it. No doubt, in 99 cases out of every 100 there would be little question as to the guilt of the person accused of the offence, and if there could be some kind of appeal provided where persons insisted that they had not committed the offence, all difficulty would be removed. But where the difficulty lay in the present case was in the discovery of a proper tribunal to which those persons could appeal. He believed that to allow counsel in all cases would be likely to lead to great abuse. If that were permitted, they might have cases where persons would endeavour to cause delay and expense—they might so draw out the proceedings as to render them altogether abortive; for instance, they might have someone appointing counsel to make a separate speech upon every case of illegal practices complained of; they could conceive relays of counsel taking up the cases and endeavouring in that way to delay the proceedings. That would be a very serious difficulty; at the same time, if an efficient Court of Appeal could be suggested, the idea of appointing it would be one well worthy of consideration.

MR. RAIKES said, he was encouraged to hope, by what had just been said, that the Government had really opened their minds to the desirability of giving some kind of appeal; at any rate, if they did not give some assurance to that effect, he trusted his hon. Friend (Mr. Gregory) would press his Amendment. The Solicitor General (Sir Farrer Herschell) had justly appreciated the serious consequences which were to follow, under the 2nd sub-section, on the offence indicated in the 1st sub-section. He did not know whether the Committee had grasped the fact that the Government were asking them to establish a new principle in law—namely, that a man was to be deprived, it might be for life, of his political status—of not being able to exercise the franchise in the constituency—and subjected, if he were a professional man, to a great number of disabilities on the mere ipse dixit of, it might be, three briefless barristers. Was the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General serious in asking them to give a power to these gentlemen—the exercise of which would be frequently meritorious in the eyes of a particular Party—of pronouncing a sentence of exclusion from all political rights for the future, without giving the persons so sentenced the privilege that the commonest applicant enjoyed of being able to employ counsel and to call witnesses in his defence? There were Commissioners and Commissioners. No doubt there were some gentlemen who had done their duty extremely well, and had shown the highest capacity; but, on the other hand, there had been some gentlemen who had not equally well shone in the capacity of Election Judges. He saw the difficulty admitted by the Law Officers as to the protracted proceedings that might take place; but that difficulty would be met if the suggestion of the hon. Member for Lincolnshire were adopted—which suggestion, it seemed to him, the Solicitor General was inclined to adopt if the Attorney General would allow him to do so. Some appeal should be allowed from the decision of these Commissioners. Take the decisions of the Election Judges—and he did not want to regard this in the same light as the decisions of Election Commissioners—the question before them was as to the validity of the return, and the finding of a person guilty of a corrupt practice was merely an incident in these proceedings. It was not the main point to which their attention was directed, and though the candidate might be found guilty of corrupt practices, they might also, in the course of their report, find various other persons guilty of corrupt practices. They did that as the result of their inquiry. Well, he should regard with horror such power being given to Election Commissioners without an appeal—he should even regard with grave doubt the justice of giving Election Judges the power of pronouncing political ostracism in these cases when the proceedings they had had to consider had been the election at large, and not the cases of these persons incidentally found guilty of corrupt practices. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would frame some provision to meet the difficulties suggested.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, this discussion, which had been a most interesting one, had not been without profit. He hoped the hon. Gentleman opposite would not insist upon the services of a solicitor or counsel being allowed to a candidate. The hon. Member had distinctly offered to sacrifice them, and he (the Attorney General) hoped he was going to do so, and would point out that if the words "being heard" were retained he would not make the sacrifice. As to the Court of Appeal, the Solicitor General and himself had discussed the question, and his impression was in favour of such an arrangement if it could be provided for. It would, indeed, assist them in the disfranchisement of persons who were reported. If such persons were given a chance of appeal it would be assumed that the report against them was justified; and, therefore, in that direction an appeal would be useful. He should be ready to confer with hon. Members who took an interest in this matter to see if they could not hit upon a Court of Appeal which would be satisfactory—probably they might be able to do so upon the Assize which would next take place. At any rate, he would do his best to meet his hon. Friends; and on that undertaking he hoped they would allow him to proceed with the clause.

MR. GIBSON said, that nothing could be fairer than this statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The matter was of great importance, and particularly to professional persons would be one of very great importance. It was all very well to say the question was one of incapacity, but to his mind it meant absolute ruin to large classes of people. It might lead to absolute ruin in the case of men holding public or judicial offices, or gentlemen professionally employed. In these cases the effect of the clause might be called incapacity if they liked, but it was incapacity that amounted to absolute ruin. If they gave a man, accused of some petty offence in a police court, power to defend himself by solicitor or counsel, surely they should give the same power to a professional man charged with an offence, the establishment of which might lead to his ruin. They might have either of two alternatives in this case, and he should be satisfied with one or the other, though he thought he should prefer the appeal. It was just that a man should have all the professional assistance he could get; but it might be very inconvenient to have a number of people taking advantage of that. Another argument was that it would be unfair to a candidate, who would have to bear all the expense; but that could be met by providing that a portion of the expenses should be borne by the candidate, and the remainder by the locality or the public. If the Attorney General pressed the argument of inconvenience, he was bound to undertake to find a proper appeal; and he should prefer to move that there should be an appeal against the report of Election Commissioners in the manner to be prescribed, and then the Attorney General could apply himself to finding a tribunal for appeal. It might be another Election Court, or it might be some of the Judges on the rota. He did not ask for any hasty decision to-night on the question of what was to be the appeal tribunal; but he thought there should be some such words as these added to the sub-section—

"When any person is reported by the election commissioners to have been guilty of any corrupt or illegal practice, he shall have the right of appeal against such report in the manner hereinafter prescribed."

That would not bind the Attorney General to anything whatever except that he would provide in a subsequent part of the Bill what was to be the prescribed Court of Appeal. He threw this suggestion out for the Attorney General to consider before the sub-section was finally disposed of.

MR. GÖRST wished to say a word in protection of the Government from the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman had suggested that the Government should find a Court of Appeal; but he would remind the Committee that some years ago, when the late Government were in Office, a Committee of the House sat upon the subject of Election Petitions and made a Report strongly advocating a Court of Appeal. He believed that the Conservative Government, of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman was a distinguished Member, found it so absolutely impossible, with the whole Session before them and abundant leisure, to frame a satisfactory Court of Appeal, that they gave the matter up in despair and established a Court of two Judges to try Election Petitions. Although he was always glad to see the Government persecuted and harassed as much as was reasonable and fair, he thought it was rather hard to call upon them in July to invent a Court of Appeal which the late Government was unable to obtain in a Session of many months.

MR. LEWIS said, he thought the memory of the hon. and learned Gentleman was rather deceived upon this matter. As far as he recollected the Report of that Committee was not on the subject of appeal at all, but was a Report in favour of trial by two Judges, and the hon. and learned Member was wholly wrong in his enthusiastic desire to, on all occasions, involve himself in a controversy with the Front Opposition Bench. He himself intended to move either the entire or the partial omission of Sub-section 2, for it was open to the gravest objections. If this matter went to a Division, he should vote with the hon. Member, simply because he thought it was absolutely necessary to do so in the interests of justice; but he was opposed to the section altogether.

MR. GRANTHAM said, the objection made to the Commissioners would apply with still stronger force to Sub-section 6, and he should prefer to strike out the sub-section altogether.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) asked how the hon. Member proposed to move the Amendments?

MR. GREGORY said, he proposed to move "leave to be heard and to call evidence." He did not think it fair to leave a man in any position in life without assistance, and he should not care to be his own advocate. He felt considerable difficulty with reference to this Amendment, for while he was desirous to meet the views of the Committee as far as possible, he had some difficulty in gathering what those views were. Some Members were for a Court of Appeal; but he did not see that any such Court could be instituted which would meet the case, and he was afraid he had no alternative but to stand or fall by the Amendment.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he agreed with the Attorney General as to the extreme difficulty of Commissioners having to go through a series of trials with counsel and solicitors; but it was obvious that the Committee were desirous of meeting the difficulty in one way or the other, and so they had to choose between the practical difficulty of administering the law by the Commissioners, and some Court of Appeal. He did not see any difficulty in arranging for an appeal. The appeal which it was, in the case mentioned, found difficult to make provision for was an appeal from the judgment of the Election Judges on the validity of an election; but he did not see the difficulty of making arrangements for an appeal in the few cases in which there would be an appeal, because, as the Solicitor General had said, in 99 cases out of 100 there was no doubt about the matter, and the person admitted his offence. He hoped the Attorney General would endeavour to frame some kind of appeal to meet the difficulty, and then he should not support the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) suggested that the words "solicitor or counsel" should be omitted, and then the Amendment might read—"heard by himself and of calling evidence in his defence." He hoped that would meet the view of the hon. Member. He would do his best to find some Court of Appeal; and if he failed, then he would sooner give up the sub-section than come into conflict with the Committee.

MR. GREGORY said, he thought the hon. Gentleman had met the case, and he would accept the suggestion.

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

MR. E. STANHOPE proposed to leave out "whether he obtained a certificate of indemnity," and to substitute "unless he obtained a certificate." The object of this Amendment, he explained, was this. A certificate of indemnity would protect the person from ulterior consequences under this clause. Hon. Members did not seem to know what a certificate of indemnity was. Where a man was compelled by the Court to give answers which would incriminate himself, and the Court was satisfied that he had answered truly, it gave him a certificate to protect him from the consequences of his having incriminated himself. At present, a man would be subject to penalties, and to incapacity, whether he obtained a certificate of indemnity or not; but he thought it was hard upon a man that, having been compelled to answer questions, he should be subject to incapacity, and suffer the penalties imposed by the various subsections of this clause.

Amendment proposed,

In page 16, line 36, to leave out "whether he obtained," and insert "unless he obtained."—(Mr. E. Stanhope.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had given way as far as he possibly could; but he could not do so upon this point. At present persons who were guilty of corrupt practices obtained certificates of indemnity on giving evidence, and he could name cases in which men who had declared that there had been no bribery had, when a Commission was issued, admitted bribery and betrayed the persons they had bribed, and yet, obtaining a certificate of indemnity, they walked away free from all punishment. A certificate of indemnity protected a man from criminal proceedings; but surely, because a man went into the witness-box and admitted having bribed, he should not escape all consequences. If he was protected from criminal punishment he ought not still to have the power of voting. A magistrate who had been guilty of bribery was struck off the Commission of the Peace; and all that this clause did was to call the attention of the Law Society to the circumstances, and they would do what they thought proper. He hoped the Committee would not accept the Amendment.

MR. LEWIS said, he thought it was quite right that any persons who had committed bribery should not be allowed to administer justice; but that was a different thing from inflicting incapacity to vote on people who were not magistrates, and he hoped the hon. Member would proceed to a Division.

MR. MELLOR said, he was glad that the Attorney General intended to stand by the clause, because this was a very serious matter. It seemed to him that the object of these inquiries was to ascertain the truth; and he thought it would be a great misfortune if any man should be able to refuse to answer questions on the ground that he would incriminate himself. He hoped the giving of certificates of indemnity would not be carried further than was absolutely necessary. A man who required a certificate before he answered questions in a Court of Justice ought never to be allowed to administer justice, or to remain a member of an honourable Profession; and, so far as he was concerned, he hoped the Government would be firm upon this clause. In his experience he had found that the Commissioners discharged their duties fairly and carefully, and he thought there could be no objection to allowing them to compel a man to answer questions and then give him a certificate of indemnity; but if he got that certificate it ought not to protect him beyond criminal punishment.

MR. E. STANHOPE thought the clause would rather tend to defeat the object of ascertaining the truth, because witnesses would come forward and give evidence if they knew they would get certificates protecting them from any penalty or punishment. He would, however, withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 3, to leave out from "appear" to "appears by evidence," and insert "is reported by."—(Mr. Gorat.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) thought that if this tribunal did report, they ought not go behind that, and therefore he would accept the Amendment.

[Fifteenth Night.]

Question put, and negatived.

Question, "That the words 'is reported by' be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

On the Motion of Mr. GORST, Amendment made, in page 17, line 5, by inserting the words "or privy to."

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, he proposed to move the Amendment next on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt). The reason why he desired to move the omission of the sub-section to which that Amendment referred was because it proposed to add additional punishment to the severe penalties provided by the Bill in the case of members of particular professions. If the clause were allowed to stand in the present form, a barrister would not only be liable as a criminal for the offence committed by him, but the Director of Public Prosecutions was to lay a sort of acte d'accusation against him before the Inn of Court, High Court, or tribunal having power to take cognizance of any misconduct of such person in his Profession, who were empowered to inflict upon him a punishment which amounted to the absolute ruin of his prospects in life. He submitted that at present there was no case whatever made out for these extraordinary penalties, and for putting the functions of the Director of Public Prosecutions in operation in this way, and therefore he begged to move the omission of Sub-section 4.

Amendment proposed, to leave out sub-section 4.—(Mr. Edward Clarke.)

Question proposed,

"That the words 'where a person who is a barrister or a solicitor, or who belongs to any profession the admission to which is regulated by Law' stand part of the Clause."

MR. SALT said, he thought the Bill already contained sufficient penalties against persons who committed offences under the Act without going beyond them, and attacking a man in his profession, to the destruction of his professional prospects.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, his object in framing this clause was to deal with those who had special facilities for committing these offences. Why had the Committee dealt in a special manner with publicans? It was because they had special facilities for committing corrupt practices. And if a publican were to say to him—"Why do you deal specially with the class to which I belong?" He would answer—"Because you have special facilities for committing offences under the Act." And similarly in regard to the present case, if the publican asked if he would apply the same law to his own profession, he could not look him in the face and say "No." He could give an instance of a solicitor who, having managed an election, had corrupted the whole borough, and whose punishment, notwithstanding, was nothing at all. He was found to have marked off 950 voters, whom he took care should be paid; and that man practised his profession at that moment, and no punishment could be inflicted on him. He did not wish to mention any names, but hon. Members would know to whom he referred; there was no case throughout the whole inquiry which took place of such gross misconduct, but the solicitor in question had obtained a certificate of indemnity, and received no punishment whatever. Why should not the tribunals referred to in the sub-section deal with professional men guilty of corrupt practices at elections in the same way as they dealt with every other person over whom they had jurisdiction, who had committed a criminal offence? If a solicitor committed a crime so small as to subject him to a day's imprisonment, he would be struck off the Rolls, and there would be no appeal. But, under the present Amendment, hon. Members would not allow him to be so dealt with if he committed an offence which rendered him liable to nine months' imprisonment. He asked his hon. Friends not to shrink from passing this sub-section, which was intended to reach men who, having been guilty of corrupt practices, if they liked to betray their fellows would, by obtaining a certificate of indemnity, altogether escape punishment. Finally, he pointed out to the Committee that the sub-section only provided that attention should be called to the fact that an offence had been committed. If the heads of the Profession said they would take no notice of it, so let it be—the responsibility would rest with them; while those who made it possible for them to deal with corrupt practice in the same way as they dealt with professional misconduct, would have the consciousness of having done their duty.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he had no doubt the Committee had been much impressed by the speech of the Attorney General, and particularly with that part of it in which he held certain members of his own Profession up to condemnation. The hon. and learned Gentleman was, no doubt, right in dealing in the manner proposed with barristers and solicitors; but why did he bring in members of other professions? Why should a doctor be shown up to the Royal College of Surgeons, or the College of Physicians; or a clergyman, a military man, or a Secretary of State, be shown up to those bodies who took cognizance of their several professions; while a private gentleman remained quite unscathed from the operation of the clause. He was willing that barristers or solicitors should be cognizable by the Law Institution, the Inns of Court, or by any other competent authority; but he was quite unable to conceive why persons belonging to other professions, which the clause did not specify should be brought under these special penalties. It was an absurdity in the case of the other professions he had referred to, to tell the Governing Bodies to take cognizance of offences under this Act. While he agreed that the authorities specified in the clause should have control over the members of the Legal Profession, he thought it would be wise to leave out the words "or who belongs to any profession the admission to which is regulated by Law."

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he had not the least doubt that it was a wrong thing for a barrister or a solicitor to bribe; but because the Attorney General had found out some bad cases, that was no reason why the hon. and learned Gentleman should brand an honourable Profession. But he contended that the sub-section was wholly unnecessary, because, if a barrister or a solicitor were guilty, the heads of their Professions could deal with them without the intervention of the Director of Public Prosecutions. If that were so, and he believed the Solicitor General was not in a position to dispute the proposition, he thought they should proceed to a Division on the Amendment before the Committee which he should feel it his duty to support.

MR. T. C. THOMPSON said, it was difficult to speak against anything in the Bill which was held to be necessary by the Attorney General; but he thought in the present case, under the influence of the hon. and learned Gentleman, they were about to commit a grave error in principle—that was to say, they were going to inflict an exceptional punishment. The rule for centuries had been that there should be the same law for the rich as for the poor; but they were now about to reverse that policy by making a severe and exceptional law for the rich which they did not make for the poor. They were about to punish by a fine of £100 and imprisonment, either with or without hard labour, during the space of a year, certain offences under this Act; whereas they had seen of late the most grievous and horrible offences ever committed in the country punished by a year's imprisonment only. But, besides this—and in a manner quite unknown to the Criminal Law up to this time—it was now proposed that an illegal act committed, perhaps by a young man under the influence of excitement, should be reported to the Inns of Court, or to the High Court, the consequence of which might be that the young man's professional career would be at an end. The House was asked to empower a Court which had not heard the case to initiate proceedings anew after the charge had been heard and disposed of. He believed that provision would be productive of a great amount of harm, that it was cruel, and that it would be better to run the risk of some electoral impurities which must occasionally exist, than to make an enactment of this kind. He thought that, in calmer moments, hon. Members on that side of the House would perceive some wisdom in the words he was using in advising them not to follow the course marked out by the Attorney General on that occasion.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR FARRER HERSCHELL) said, he could assure his hon. Friend who had just spoken that, although he was in the calmest frame of mind, it was his intention to support the sub-section which the Amendment proposed to strike out. His hon. Friend contended that an act of corruption committed by a man in a moment of excitement was excusable, and that the individual who committed it ought not to be liable to the consequences of having his conduct taken cognizance of by the heads of the Profession to which he belonged. But did his hon. Friend mean to suggest that barristers would be such harsh judges of barristers, that they would cut short the career of a number of their Profession without the most grave reason for so doing? Precisely the same argument applied to the case of solicitors. The sub-section did no more than provide that the heads of the Profession should have the conduct of the barrister or solicitor brought before them. The existing law with regard to the conduct of a solicitor was that if he committed a felony, his offence entailed upon him the penalty of being struck off the Rolls, in addition to the punishment inflicted for the crime itself. They consented to that law because solicitors were intrusted with particular privileges which had not been conferred upon others, and because they had opportunities of occasioning mischief which did not fall to men who had not the same powers conferred upon them. It would rest with the tribunals specified in the sub-section to say whether the case of an individual was one which called for no punishment, some punishment, or severe punishment, and he believed his hon. Friend would see that, under those circumstances, no injustice was involved in the proposal.

MR. GIBSON said, he could not think that the canon laid down by the Attorney General was borne out by the sub-section. The objection of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) was that the proposal of the Government was unequal and unjust to men of a particular class. The early clauses of the Bill set forth the social and official disqualifications, as well as the possibility of criminal prosecution which attached to persons guilty of corrupt practices; but it was not until this sub-section was reached that they found a provision to punish persons with absolute ruin and loss of bread. What, he asked, was the reason for singling out the two branches of the Legal Profession for special punishment? The Attorney General said he had picked out those two classes for special treatment, because they had special facilities for the commission of corrupt practices. But, what special facilities had barristers in that direction? He was not aware of their being possessed of a single facility of the kind, and the Attorney General had only been able to illustrate his argument by a reference to two cases of corruption on the part of solicitors. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not given a single instance in point in which barristers were concerned. The Solicitor General said the clause dealt with classes who had not only special facilities for the commission of corrupt acts at elections, but upon whom special privileges had been conferred. Well, he asked what those privileges were?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL): I did not say special privileges in regard to corruption, but that special privileges were conferred upon barristers and solicitors by law.

MR. GIBSON: There were no cases or examples given where members of the Bar had especially come forward and particularly challenged criticism. There might have been cases; but none, however, had been cited. It therefore came to this—why was it necessary to single out for special mention two branches of the Legal Profession, and hold them up to this particular obloquy? Was it fair to single them out in that way, and to say that, in addition to subjecting them to criminal proceedings and to civil incapacities, they should also be subjected to the possibility of being deprived by other Governing Bodies of the opportunity of earning their bread? A point had also been made as to the abuse of the certificate of indemnity. Owing to the course the Attorney General had pursued, a person in future could not rely upon a certificate of indemnity. He (Mr. Gibson) was of opinion that this clause should either not be in the Bill at all, or else it should be drafted in a general way which would grasp all classes of trades and professions. It was not fair to single out the Legal Profession. The Legal Profession they treated invidiously, while they had general words for other professions. Why were they not satisfied with the general words to cover the Legal Profession, if they intended other professions to be equally covered? He, of course, accepted the statement of the Government that they did intend to cover all professions; but he doubted very much whether any person reading the clause for the first time would interpret it as covering all professions. The clause ought not to be in the Bill at all, or it should be a great deal wider and more grasping; it should have a general reference to all professions to which admission was obtained by law; it should have reference to all professions which were controlled by law, by licence, or otherwise. He challenged the sub-section as being exceptional, as containing an unworthy and exceptional stigma; and therefore, in the absence of any statement from the Attorney General or the Solicitor General in support of it, as it was at present submitted to the judgment of the Committee, he had no option but to support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Plymouth.

Mr. MELLOR said, he was sure the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) did not mean to suggest that a barrister who committed a corrupt practice was fit to continue in his Profession. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir Farrer Herschell) had spoken of the privileges intrusted to the Bar, and the privileges intrusted to the solicitors. The hon. and learned Gentleman had, for instance, shown that a barrister had great power intrusted to him in the way of free speech in a Court of Justice, that he had great confidence reposed in him, and that he discharged most important functions, especially in a Criminal Court. He (Mr. Mellor) considered that a man who had to discharge such important duties ought to be extremely particular as to his conduct; and he could not see why if a barrister committed a corrupt practice, his conduct should not be brought to the notice of the Governing Body of his Profession. There was not the slightest danger of this clause being unfairly worked. It was proposed to bring a barrister's conduct before the Benchers of his Inn. The Benchers had never shown themselves to be an unfair tribunal; but, apart from that fact, a barrister who was charged with being guilty of a corrupt practice had got an additional safeguard, because from the Benchers he could appeal to the Judges, and if the Benchers had committed any error, the Judges had ample power to rectify it, and re-instate the gentleman in his old position. The punishment of the solicitors, too, was in the hands of the Judges of the High Court of Justice, and they could deal with it exactly as they pleased. It was a jurisdiction which was exercised before the whole world, and he (Mr. Mellor) had never heard any complaint of the way in which that jurisdiction was administered. He hoped this sub-section would be passed, because he considered it was very important, particularly in the interest of his own Profession, which was so much concerned in elections, that the public should be satisfied that the Legal Profession wished to put a stop to electoral corruption quite as much as any other class of the community.

Mr. LEAMY maintained that a barrister ought not to be punished twice for an offence for which they punished other men once. It was said that a barrister who committed a corrupt practice ought not to be allowed to continue any longer at the Bar. If this was the opinion of hon. Gentlemen, why had not such a practice been put in force before now? The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General (Sir Farrer Herschell) had said that barristers had exceptional privileges—that they had exceptional privileges at the Criminal Court; but the Committee were not dealing with barristers acting in Criminal Courts, they were dealing with barristers and solicitors acting at an election just as other people did. If a barrister was guilty of a corrupt practice, he could be sent to gaol for 12 months, deprived of the franchise, and subjected to other civil disabilities. He (Mr. Leamy) submitted it was invidious to impose a double penalty on these men because they happened to belong to the law. He desired fair and equal justice; and if a man was found guilty of a crime, subject him to a certain punishment, but do not increase it because he happened to be of one particular profession. It might be said that this clause not only referred to solicitors and barristers, but to many other professions, because the words of the clause were—

“Any person who is a barrister or a solicitor, or who belongs to any profession the admission to which is regulated by Law.”

He supposed that the words would include the case of a doctor. He, however, strongly objected to the invidious mention of barristers and solicitors, and on that ground he intended to oppose the clause. ["Divide, divide!"] He did not know why hon. Members should display such impatience. He had only spoken three times upon this Bill, but certainly he intended to-morrow to take other opportunities of interfering in the discussion.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) had stated that this clause proposed to inflict a certain stigma upon the Legal Profession. He (Mr. H. H. Fowler) did not hesitate to say that this stigma should be inflicted. He wished to regard the clause simply as one relating to barristers and solicitors; and having regard to the facts and circumstances of both English and Irish elections, he considered that barristers and solicitors who were guilty of offences specified in this section ought to be exceptionally punished. It was on the distinct ground that this was an exceptional punishment, and a severe punishment, that he, as a member of the Legal Profession, intended to vote for this clause. They knew very well from the revelations of Election Commissioners that where corrupt practices had prevailed, the instruments of these practices had, in many cases, been connected with the Legal Profession. He was sorry to have to say it, but it was no use hiding the truth on this question; and it would be a piece of hypocrisy on the part of the Legal Profession if they objected to put this mark on the members of the Legal Profession who did wrong. An educated barrister, or an educated solicitor, knew perfectly well when he was doing wrong; and he (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was of opinion, having regard to the special trust which the law imposed upon the Legal Profession, that if any member of that Profession conducted himself improperly at an election he deserved the exceptional punishment of being brought before the heads of his own Profession, so that they might deal with him as they thought proper, and decide whether he was fit to continue, either temporarily or permanently, in the discharge of his professional duties. He (Mr. H. H. Fowler) hoped the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) would not consent to any relaxation of this clause.

Mr. Leamy

MR. WARTON said, his first objection to this sub-section was that it was totally unnecessary, and encumbered the Bill. Although there was a great difference in the style of the two Law Officers of the Crown, there was a great similarity in their arguments. Speaking of solicitors, the Attorney General (Sir Henry James) mentioned two cases of solicitors who misconducted themselves, and the Solicitor General (Sir Farrer Herschell) dwelt upon the peculiar privileges of legal gentlemen. Now, if solicitors were as bad as it was endeavoured to paint them, why should all the Professions, the admission to which was regulated by law, be grouped together? What was the real object of this section? It was to preserve that cruel severity which prevailed all through the Bill. Would doctors, and dentists, and veterinary surgeons, come under the operation of this clause? Or was it the object of the Attorney General to provide that many men should be debarred? This was a perfectly scandalous clause, and it seemed to him that there was no ground whatever for its appearance in the Bill. He could not conceive for a moment why all professional men should be subjected to this cruel punishment, because on two occasions solicitors had misconducted themselves. He objected to the clause on the ground of common humanity.

MR. GRANTHAM said, he thought there was great misconception in reference to the origin of this clause. They must all admit there had been a few solicitors who had subjected themselves to the observations of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General; and the object of the clause was to enable the Courts to deal with the cases of solicitors who misconducted themselves in the manner described by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General. It must be remembered, however, that the two solicitors whose cases the Attorney General had cited were acting as quasi-solicitors. If this clause had merely been formed for the purpose of enabling the Court to deal with men who, acting as quasi-solicitors, had acted in an improper way, he did not think anyone would have raised the slightest objection. He objected personally to the roundabout way in which it was proposed to arrive at the result desired. Why should it be the duty of the Public Prosecutor to bring these matters before the Court? If they turned to Clause 36, they would find it was the duty of the Director of Public Prosecutions to attend there himself, or by his assistant, at all election trials; and in another clause they found that where the trial was before Election Commissioners, the Election Commissioners were, first of all, to communicate with the Public Prosecutor as to whether misconduct had been proved against those gentlemen, and then the Director of Public Prosecutions was to communicate with the tribunal. All that would be necessary, in his (Mr. Grantham's) opinion, instead of inserting this long sub-section, would be to give the tribunal power to take cognizance of misconduct, notwithstanding the fact that a certificate of indemnity might have been given. He hoped the Attorney General would deal with the matter in a more satisfactory way than was now proposed. He had great objection to the clause because by it it was proposed to deal with barristers and solicitors who were not acting at all in their professional capacity.

MR. CALLAN said, that no one who heard the remarkable speech of the Attorney General would be in any doubt as to the insufficiency of the punishment which at present could be imposed upon members of the Legal Profession who misconducted themselves. He considered the punishment provided was not severe enough.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE desired to say a few words to the Committee before they went to a Division; and he meant to take a Division as a protest against this outrageous clause. The speech the Attorney General made was chiefly based on a single instance, with regard to which he was justly indignant; and he showed the Committee how, in one case where a professional man had been the instrument of very much bribery, he remained without any punishment at all. The Committee had provided that a certificate of indemnity should leave a person open to all the disqualifications and incapacities, and should only protect him from actual criminal prosecution. He could not help thinking that the Attorney General and the Solicitor General had misled those who had not read the clause. They had said that the facts of the case were to be brought to the knowledge of the Profession. Now, the last words of the sub-section were these—

"It shall be the duty of the Director of Public Prosecutions to bring the matter before the Inn of Court, High Court, or tribunal having power to take cognizance of any misconduct of such person in his profession; and such Inn of Court, High Court, or tribunal may deal with such person in like manner as if such corrupt practice were misconduct by such person in his profession."

It was not misconduct by such person in his profession, and therefore they were passing an Act of Parliament to give the Benchers of an Inn of Court power to deal with a member of that Inn for misconduct outside of his profession. This was a monstrous proposition, and he made that assertion as a Bencher of one of the Inns of Court. There was no excuse for casting that stigma upon the Profession, and he hoped to find some of the hon. Gentlemen opposite join him in protesting against this most unjustifiable proposition.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he approached the consideration of this clause with a mind perfectly free from bias, because he did not happen to be included in any of the Professions which were subject to the pains and penalties set forth in this clause. He, however, opposed the clause as one of the most illogical, unjudicial, and preposterous interferences with natural justice and equity that could possibly be imagined. The clause was extremely vague, and slovenly drawn in its wording—

"Where a person who is a barrister or a solicitor, or who belongs to any profession the admission to which is regulated by Law," is to suffer so-and-so. What on earth was the meaning of the phrase "belongs to any profession the admission to which is regulated by Law?" They ought certainly to have from the Government a Schedule of the Professions the admission to which was regulated by law. Last year a proposition was brought in the House, after which, he believed, the authors were still hankering—a proposition for making a provision that schoolmasters, for instance, should be dependent upon a system of registration. If this proposition were carried, schoolmasters, under this vague clause, would be liable to all the pains and penalties provided by the Bill. As a matter of fact, the clause actually set a premium upon professions that were unregulated by any tribunal, and it would be a positive advantage to belong to such professions. Was there any special reason in the past history of the Legal Profession for the introduction of penalties of this description? If there was any special reason, and if the Legal Profession had been adorned by too many members who were unworthy to belong to it; if the traditions of the Profession in election matters were corrupt and disgraceful—and that was the innuendo contained in the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Taunton (Sir Henry James), and accepted by the ex-Member for the virtuous borough of Oxford—he considered it an extraordinary thing that they should calmly propose for the future to bring accused members of the Legal Profession before a tribunal of hardened sinners. They were told that down to the present day the Legal Profession was stained through and through with corruption; and, forsooth, it was before the senior members of this stained Profession—successful candidates, though no longer Members of Parliament—who had gained their seats by all kinds of corrupt practices and had escaped detection—it was before the tribunal of Benchers, composed of men who had gone through all the gross experiences that were to be forbidden for the future, that the erring members of the Profession were to go in the future to be tried! Just imagine what a scandal that would be. Suppose some member of the Legal Profession in the future was accused by the Public Prosecutor of having committed some corrupt practice, and his name was mentioned to the Benchers, and supposing it became known that amongst those who inflicted punishment upon him were lawyers who had been notorious and scandalous offenders in the past; in such a case the punishment would be an infinitely greater injury to public justice and respect for the law than any amount of continued indulgence towards offenders belonging to the Legal Profession. And when they were asked in this way to hand over a large class of Her Majesty's subjects to this tribunal of Benchers of the Inns of Court and so forth, they were entitled to ask what guarantee had they that this tribunal, of which, down to the present they had had no official cognizance, of which they had had no legal knowledge, would act with justice and propriety? They were entitled to ask what was there in the constitution of this tribunal which was to be set up for the future, to lead that House to grant this unlimited power with regard to a portion of Her Majesty's subjects who happened to belong to the Legal Profession? Were they not aware that some of the most scandalous offences against public morality were committed by persons in that Profession, such as taking fees and doing no work for them; and were they not aware that conduct of that kind was winked at by the infallible tribunal of Benchers that were to be armed with the powers of this Act? He contended that they knew nothing in the history of the Inns of Court which should lead them implicitly to trust to them in this matter. He contended that when, under this clause, a man was brought under an Inn of Court, it would depend very much upon his social relation to his Judges—that was to say, upon the amount of his private acquaintance and friendship with them, and the amount of influence he could bring to bear upon them—whether or not he should be made subject to the heavy punishments of the Bill. As was generally the case with exceptionally coercive legislation, this would be calculated to create a prejudice that would defeat the object with which it was proposed. Let the Committee imagine the position of two persons implicated in Election Petitions before the Election Judges; one a member of the general public, and the other—if hon. Gentlemen opposite would adjourn to the Smoking Room or some more congenial place than the House he might be able to finish his observations.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to address his observations to the Chair.

MR. O'DONNELL said, it was through the Chairman, then, that he would make that observation. He had been prevented from addressing the Chair by a continued buzz of conversation; and it was in order to prevent that that he had made the remark. What he had been saying was this—what would be the position of two persons against whom charges were brought in regard to an election contest, one of them being an ordinary member of the public, and the other a gentleman who would be subject to these exceptional penalties because of his connection with the Legal Profession? Would it not be a fruitful theme for appeals to the Court that one man more than another was subject to exceptional treatment? For the very reason that a man was liable to exceptional treatment a strong appeal for clemency would be made. If a lawyer and a non-lawyer were accused, in the very interests of equity the Judges dealing with these two cases would be led to give the man who was liable to a double penalty every possible benefit of every loophole, and every chance of escape; and in that way the very provisions introduced into this Bill for the purpose of doubling the penalty against the lawyer would always lead to their being treated with exceptional leniency, because, from the fact that if they were found guilty they would be treated with exceptional severity. That was a course of policy which could be illustrated to any extent in general history. He thought the best Her Majesty's Government could do would be—[Interruption.] He had called the attention of the Chairman—or, at any rate, had endeavoured to call the attention of the Chairman—to a buzz of conversation on the opposite side; and he was sorry to say that it had not been rebuked, and that it was even now continuing without rebuke on the Chairman's part. This deliberate disturbance—which, to his mind, was contrary to the Rules and Orders of the House—rendered it impossible for him to make himself heard; therefore he was obliged to sit down; but, in doing so, he would move that the Chairman report Progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. O'Donnell.)

MR. CALLAN said, he would ask the hon. Member not to persevere with his Motion, but would direct the attention of the Chairman and the Committee to the fact that when the hon. Member who had just sat down had addressed himself to those who were interrupting him, he was met with a rebuke at the hands of the Chairman. The hon. Member continued his speech; but the interruptions became so loud as to drown his voice and prevent the reporters in the Gallery from hearing him. But, notwithstanding that this noise continued, he (Sir Arthur Otway), acting as Chairman, did not rebuke the misconduct—or, rather, the not creditable conduct—of the Radicals sitting below the Gangway on the opposite side of the House.

The Committee proceeded to a Division.

The Chairman stated he thought the Noes had it; and, his decision being challenged, he directed the Ayes to stand up in their places, and Nine Members only having stood up, the Chairman declared the Noes had it.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he believed he had only spoken two or three times during the progress of this Bill—[Cries of "Divide!"—]—but the conduct of hon. Members opposite convinced him that they disapproved of his reticence; and he therefore trusted that they would not have reason to complain of his want of appreciation of his public duty for the future. This clause was not sufficiently definite, and it was only due to the members of that Profession, the admission to which was regulated by law, that it should be made so. What was the provision according to the view of the Government? He had heard it stated that a barrister was nothing more than a trades unionist. Well, he wanted to know, under the clause, whether it would be the duty of the Director of Public Prosecutions to bring the conduct, during an election, of every member of a trade society under the notice of the council of that society, and to give them power to impose special penalties upon him, irrespective of the penalties laid down by the law of the land? He should like very much to know what, in the eye of the law, or, rather, in the eye of the Attorney General, was the difference between a corporation of solicitors or a society of barristers, and a corporation or society of stone masons and slaters? Unless the Attorney General introduced words defining what he meant by a Profession, he wanted to know what there was more legal in the Profession of solicitor than in the Profession of stone mason or slater? It was all very well for the Government to affect an air of extreme purity, and draw up a number of clauses in the most ambiguous form; but, before they passed the Bill, they ought to arrive at some distinct understanding as to what was meant by these provisions. Before they passed laws exposing members of Professions to definite penalties they should know what was meant by "Profession." To his mind, the words of the clause expressly included ordinary trades unions, because these words were—

"Or tribunal may deal with such person in like manner as if such corrupt practice were misconduct by such person in his Profession."

There were hundreds of Professions throughout the Kingdom governed by tribunals regularly in the habit of imposing penalties for what was considered to be unprofessional conduct; and he wished to know—was every trades union throughout the Kingdom which happened to have a council to be able to impose penalties on its members for improper practices at elections, in addition to the penalties which were imposed by the law of the land?

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 117; Noes 67: Majority 50.—(Div. List, No. 169.)

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he really thought they might now ask the hon. and learned Attorney General to agree to report Progress. It was now nearly a quarter-past 1, Members had been in the House during the whole of the day, and they had to be in attendance again at 2 o'clock to-morrow. He, therefore, thought it most reasonable to propose that they should now report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Sir Walter B. Barttelot.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, there were only two formal Amendments to this clause, both of which he was ready to accept; and he, therefore, thought the Committee might be allowed to conclude the section before reporting Progress. He would not ask them to go further than this clause, which had been under discussion now for nearly three hours. He trusted the hon. and gallant Baronet would not press his proposal.

MR. LALOR begged to remind the hon. and learned Gentleman of a very important Bill which the Government had decided upon bringing forward that night—namely, the Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill. That was a measure upon which a long discussion was very likely to arise; therefore he thought it would be well for them to at once report Progress.

MR. CALLAN said, he thought that if they acceded to the Attorney General's request, and passed these two Amendments, they should allow hon. Members to go home. They would be utterly unfit to go on with the discussion of the Bill which the Government had expressed themselves determined to proceed with that night. He would suggest that the hon. and gallant Baronet should withdraw his Motion, and that they should go on with the Bill, provided that the Irish Poor Relief Bill was not continued at this late hour. Irish Members were the same as English Members. ["No, no!"] Well, for his part, he should be very sorry to be like any of the Radicals opposite; but what he meant was that Irish Members, like English Representatives, required rest. He should certainly give every support in his power to the Motion of the hon. and gallant Baronet, unless the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant (Mr. Trevelyan) would assure them that now that the House was thoroughly exhausted, at a quarter-past 1 o'clock, he would not go on with the Irish Bill.

MR. TREVELYAN said, it was impossible to leave the Committee in the dark as to what were the intentions of the Government, for Members might say there had been a breach of faith. On Monday evening the Government forbore to press this most essential, but, at the same time, extremely minute Bill, on the understanding that it was to be proceeded with to-night. He would not insist on the word "understanding," however, because he was not certain that an assurance was given by hon. Members on the matter; but it must have been distinctly understood that the Government would press the Bill to-night. It would be impossible to carry on the Business of the House, and to make any progress with the large number of Irish Bills before the House, unless a stage were taken nearly every night on a Bill.

MR. O'DONNELL said, there was no understanding, and the assurance was on the part of the Government, who asked the House to discuss at this time of night a Bill of the utmost importance. If it was to be a Draconian rule that the Government must make progress with every Bill, he would suggest that some other Government Bill should be proceeded with.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he had referred to Irish Bills.

MR. O'DONNELL thought Ireland must be very much obliged; but he did not think that at this hour of the night Irish Members were much disposed to enter into the large question raised by this Bill, and into all the new matter which was to be opened up by the pending international questions between the United States and England under the Bill. He should offer every opposition to such an important Bill being taken at such an untimely moment.

MR. BIGGAR said, the Chief Secretary seemed very much disposed to follow in the footsteps of his Predecessor; and, if so, he would prophesy that the end of his career would be of a similar nature. The right hon. Gentleman had broken the distinct promise he had given with regard to this Bill, and now he said there had been an understanding. There was no understanding that this Bill was to be discussed at such an untimely hour. The Leader of the Irish Party was absent, and there were other Irish Members absent who would wish to discuss this question, and who were more competent to do so than the Members who were present.

MR. O'BRIEN said, that, speaking merely for himself, he was willing to go into the Bill, if there was any chance of getting something substantial for the Irish poor out of the Bill; but the hour was late to begin what he was afraid would take a long time.

MR. WARTON pointed out that, although there were at present only two verbal Amendments to this sub-section, he had to move another Amendment of importance. He hoped the Attorney General would consent to report Progress.

Question put, and negatived.

On the Motion of Mr. H. H. FOWLER, Amendment made, in page 17, line 17, by leaving out from "appears" to "before," and by inserting "is reported by."

On the Motion of Mr. GORST, Amendment made, in page 17, line 18, by leaving out "or privy to."

MR. WARTON moved to omit the sub-section. It was bad enough, he said, that professional gentlemen should be brought by the Public Prosecutor to the notice of the High Court, or this undescribed tribunal; but it was far worse to prevent people ascertaining from professional men what they were to do. He protested most strongly against this, in the interests of the Profession, and also in other interests. It was casting a stigma and a slur on the Courts to require them to go through the farce of assuming that a man had been guilty of misconduct who had not been guilty. As to the drafting of the clause, it would end very well with the word "profession" in line 23, and then these independent bodies could act in the matter if they thought fit, and not be directed to do so by a falsehood or a Jesuitical approach to a falsehood. They could take care of their own honour; but they would be humiliated by this unjust clause.

Amendment proposed, in page 17, line 23, to leave out all the words after "profession."—(Mr. Warton.)

MR. GORST said, he hoped the hon. and learned Member would not persist with this Amendment, although he was of his way of thinking. He voted against the whole clause, and he should have been glad if the Attorney General had struck out the sub-section; but the Committee had decided, by a considerable majority, against his view, and in favour of the sub-section. If it was to be maintained, these words were absolutely necessary, because it was no use calling the attention of a tribunal to the conduct of a professional man, unless it was to be allowed to deal with the question of corrupt practice as if it had been misconduct in the Profession. Although he should be glad to see the whole sub-section struck out, it was no use making nonsense of it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Committee had discussed this question throughout the evening and taken a Division upon it, and it was not reasonable that they should be now asked to discuss it a second time.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

POOR RELIEF (IRELAND) BILL.
(Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Herbert Gladstone.)

[BILL 154.] COMMITTEE.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [2nd July], "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (for Committee on Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill).

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Power to make grants to distressed unions).

MR. O'BRIEN said, he desired, in moving the Amendment standing in his name, to steer clear of any controversy or any recriminatory speeches. His Amendment was framed with a special view to two Unions in Donegal, Glenties and Dunfanaghy. The population in those two Unions had, since November last, been supported by private charity, and neither the Government nor the Poor Law had done anything for them. He did not wish to go back to that now, but merely to mention that, as a matter of fact, no relief whatever had been given to those poor people from either of those two sources. Private charity had kept them out of the prison; it had purchased seeds which enabled them to re-sow a great portion of the land. There was a promising crop in the ground; a good many of the people had gone away to Scotland for employment; and the object of the Amendment was to preserve those who remained behind, and who had no means of subsistence, until their potatoes were ready, which, in this barren region, would not be until the end of August. The funds which had hitherto supported them were now exhausted, and he did not think it was too much to ask the Government to come to their rescue even now, at the eleventh hour, and for a few weeks to take up the work which the priests and other persons had been doing for the last six months. Nobody could question the reality of the distress in these two Unions. The Chief Secretary visited a mere strip of these districts in January last, and was horrified at what he saw—that was, when he trusted to his own eyes, and not to the obsequious officials in Donegal. In March last the Poor Law Inspector, Dr. Woodhouse, admitted that in one of these districts one-third of the people had no means of subsistence. Nothing had happened to alter their situation in the least, for Dr. Woodhouse admitted that none of the people had migrated from Glencolumbkille to Scotland. Mr. Macfarlane, another Inspector, admitted that the Rosses was the most distressed part of Donegal. Father Gallagher, the parish priest, had stated that the Government had given the people no assistance whatsoever, and they had been left to struggle alone with the monster, Famine. There were, he said, 3,500 people on the poor relief list, and that immense number of human beings were dependent entirely upon him for support; but he was not able to give them half sufficient food. Men were fainting at their work, and, but for Mrs. Lalor's assistance to the children, many of them would have died. The other day he (Mr. O'Brien) had directed attention to a letter in The Daily Chronicle from a lady whose authority he should have thought would have outweighed that of a great many interested officials, Mrs. Ernest Hart. In that letter she mentioned that a Captain Hill had sent his bailiff to collect the rents of tenants who were reduced to the lowest ebb of poverty. She said—

"While Captain Hill is pressing for his rents, hundreds of wretched tenantry are being kept from starvation by doles of a pennyworth of meal per day, and all the paupers are kept by two biscuits a-day. The poverty seen is enough to make the most stony-hearted weep."

Mrs. Hart showed the extreme distress existing in Gweedore; how from November to May, 800 persons had been receiving relief in the shape of Indian meal. Of Captain Hill's 600 tenants 400 were so relieved; and in Glencolumb-kill, on June 22, there were still 600 poor recipients of such relief. Father M'Fadden, last week, wrote to the effect that the funds at his command were gone, and that the allowances of food would have to be stopped. If the Government, he said, would step in with relief during the next six weeks, a few hundred pounds would bring the people safely through; but, unless something was done, he did not know what might happen. If there were any prospect of outdoor relief, the danger might be dealt with; but he was sick of appealing to landlord Guardians, who would not give it. He (Mr. O'Brien) did not contend, and never had contended, that the distressed area in Donegal was not very circumscribed; but that was all the more reason why he implored the Government to have regard to these claims of these impoverished people and of probable starvation. While this Bill proposed to give £50,000 for the relief of Irish poverty, he, if it was of any use, adjured the Government to insure that some portion of that should go to the people most pressingly, most cruelly in need of relief. In these miserable Unions there was no outdoor relief, because the Guardians who were withholding it were those who would have to pay it out of their own pockets; but it would be a different thing if a grant of public money was made in aid of their own resources, and if their powers were enlarged to embrace every case of honest destitution during the next six weeks, then they might exist until, please God, a bountiful harvest took the poor people off the Guardians' hands. He earnestly hoped that the Government would not, for the mere sake of sticking to a theory, leave these poor creatures for the next six weeks utterly helpless. They had suffered enough already, much more than the House would ever know; they would feel it in their emaciated constitutions. He hoped the Government would step in now, after private charity had done so much for the past six months, and do something for them, and, in that hope, moved the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 13, after the word "union," to insert the words—"It shall be lawful for the guardians of any union to whom a grant shall be made under the Act, or, in their default, for the Local Government Board, to grant relief, either in the workhouse or outside the workhouse, as to them shall appear expedient, to destitute poor persons, whether such persons are disabled from labour or not, for any time not exceeding two calendar months from the passing of the Act."—(Mr. O'Brien.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. LEAMY said, he had an Amendment upon the Paper altogether separate from that which had been proposed by his hon. Friend; but, in the course of the evening, he had handed in a copy of an Amendment he intended to move to this part of the Bill. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had seen it; but, if he had, he would see that the same reasons and arguments used by his hon. Friend would tell in favour of his Amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): I may inform the hon. Member that I have looked at the Amendment handed in in manuscript, and it appears to me to be identical with the Amendment now before the Committee, and could not be moved. Though I give this information, it would be irregular to discuss it now; the discussion must be addressed to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. LEAMY said, as the Chairman had ruled his Amendment was identical with the present, he should wait until he could put an Amendment before the Committee for discussion.

DR. LYONS said, he regretted to trouble the Committee, and he very much regretted that the measure had been brought on at such a late hour, because it involved a question of vital moment in regard to the position of a portion of the people of Ireland. He was not very sure that the question that had been raised came properly within the scope of the Bill; for, as he understood, the purpose of the Government in bringing in the Bill was with the object of legitimatizing the action of those Guardians who had got into a false financial position, and they calculated that the amount of the grant in aid would be something like £50,000. Therefore, if for the relief of those Unions by loans to that amount the Bill was limited financially, it was impossible to afford any relief for any other object under this measure. He should have preferred that this question had been raised in another, and an independent shape. He could speak in regard to several of the Unions in Ireland from personal observation. For certain reasons with which he would not now trouble the Committee, it became his duty to visit considerable portions of Ireland during the present year, and some of the distressed districts he had had an opportunity of re-visiting at a recent time; and he was justified in stating that the amount of distress prevailing in these districts—and into which he had inquired in the closest possible manner with every feeling of impartiality to arrive at the real facts of the case—that the state of destitution was really appalling. Nothing but the superhuman efforts made by a number of individuals acting from feelings of humanity had enabled the people to be kept alive. He visited Donegal, and made a circuit of the whole county in the early part of January; and having made a very close inspection, having visited the houses of the people, having himself made inquiries in every possible way to exclude error and exaggeration, he could state that such was the state of destitution that, but for the exertions made in Ireland, and the charitable contributions there and elsewhere, the House would have had to face an appalling state of starvation there. From all that he saw, and from all his inquiries, and after examination and cross-examination, he was satisfied there was an absolute want of food at that time, and nearly a complete failure of seed potatoes. But for the exertions of the charitable we should be facing, not only famine in the present, but a condition of things infinitely worse in the coming winter, and for some time subsequently. He could not but mention with all honour the exertions made by a lady whose name was now widely known, Mrs. Power Lalor. She undertook the feeding of a number of poor people, a number that reached to 5,000, poorly clad, and who, while experiencing the effects of the storm that swept over the country, had little protection from the weather. He could not fail to recognize that the people must have been swept off in vast numbers, but for the exertions of this most charitable lady, prompted by feelings of charity, and assisted by an amount of personal energy and ability, enabling her to do what in other hands would have been impossible, the work of keeping the people alive. Nor could he speak too highly of the exertions of the local clergy in the districts of Gweedore, Glencolumbkille, the Rosses, and on the West Coast, but for which there would have been a large mortality to face; or the exertions of that very distinguished and accomplished man, the Catholic Bishop of Raphoe. His efforts were unceasing and untiring.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): I must point out to the hon. Member that the proposal before the Committee is to amend Clause 1; he must confine his observations to that Amendment.

Dr. LYONS said, he understood the Amendment dealt with the subject of workhouse relief. Of course, he bowed to the ruling from the Chair; but he was leading up to his point by showing the exertions made to keep the people alive, and in a manner different from that now proposed. He would come to what he wished to say in that respect. He was briefly alluding to the exertions made to keep the people alive by giving them employment—that was the point he was coming to. The exertions of the Catholic Bishop and the clergy, and the contributions made, were all utilized in giving occupation to the people. He wished to bear testimony in favour of this principle, which was instituted in all cases except those of children and those unable to work. Donations were applied under the direction of the distinguished ecclesiastic and his clergy to whom he had referred in the direction of giving employment. The invariable feeling on the part of the people was for occupation, for honest work, not for doles of charity. The point to which he wished expressly to address himself was this—He did not think the Amendment placed before the Committee by the hon. Gentleman went in a direction which would be acceptable except as a dernier ressort, and to meet the wishes of Bishop, clergy, and people. He had travelled the whole of the county, and in no single instance did he find any disposition on the part of the people to avail themselves of workhouse relief in any shape whatever. Their cry was invariably in the direction of work—honest payment for honest work. He thought it most desirable the Committee should fully understand that there was, undoubtedly, a creditable spirit of independence growing up and finding expression in all parts of Ireland, to which statesmen should give full recognition. This was one of the reasons why he expressed regret that this question had been raised in the form in which it had been sought to raise it, and under a Bill strictly limited to an amount of money to be applied, and having for its object the relief of the pressing financial needs of Unions which had, wisely or unwisely, rightly or wrongly, on this or that principle, by outdoor or indoor relief, undoubtedly got themselves into a position of financial distress from which a sum of money must relieve them. He regretted that this discussion should have been taken upon this particular Bill and in this particular shape. It was of the greatest importance, in a statesmanlike point of view, that the Government should take some steps to meet the condition of distress that existed at present; but he did not see how anyone could hope to do it under this Bill, strictly limited in amount and object. Therefore, he regretted that the question was not raised in an independent manner. It would be worth the attention of Government in some other way to deal with it.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): Again I must point out to the hon. Member that he is not addressing himself to the Amendment before the Committee.

DR. LYONS said, he was endeavouring to address himself to the Amendment before the Committee. That Amendment might not be in strict accordance with the principle of the Bill; he did not think it was, and he was surprised that the Chairman had put it; but he was endeavouring to point out how any attempt to relieve the people from their present position in a manner uncongenial to their feelings was not in the direction in which it was desirable the Government should give aid.

THE CHAIRMAN: That is not the Question raised by the Amendment. The Question is the expediency of giving certain powers to Guardians they do not now possess. The hon. Member must address himself to that Question.

DR. LYONS said, the Amendment was that where relief was proposed, it should be given the workhouse or outside, and he was arguing that this was not congenial to the wishes and feelings of the people in the County of Donegal and other parts of Ireland; and he begged leave to say that he dissented from the principle sought to be established by the Amendment. That was the object to which he was directing himself. He believed it would be quite possible and quite proper for the Government to deal with the distress actually existing, and almost certain to be intensified in the next two or three months; and in regard to that, he thought to contemplate six weeks as the probable duration was to take too short a period, for he believed, having regard to the lateness of the harvest, which at present promised to be a bountiful one, the people must be carried on to the first week in September, for the crops would not be available for the support of the people until then. He challenged the principle which was implied in the Amendment; he was opposed to the principle of outdoor relief. He believed it was not necessary to have recourse to the workhouse, and he believed that Government could readily find means of employing the people on works that would be reproductive, while the people would be raised in every essential point of view from their condition of wretchedness, and a new stimulus would be given to industry throughout the whole of Ireland. That, however, he did not desire to enlarge upon; it was a problem to be solved; but he believed it would be possible, and it was desirable that the Government should take some steps to employ the people in the period that must intervene before the harvest was available for their support. It was not possible that the harvest could be utilized until towards the end of August at least, and in some instances much later; therefore the necessity existed for something being done. He did not believe that what was proposed in the Amendment was the right or the best way, or that most congenial to the people. But at that late hour he would say no more. Anyone who knew the condition of the people could not but feel the duty imposed upon him to make their real condition known to the House, even at the risk of exciting those expressions of impatience which his observations had called forth. He could not support the Amendment before the Committee, and could only express his surprise that it was allowed to be put.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he did not know whether it was absolutely necessary to bring into an Act of Parliament a provision for affording outdoor relief to the poor in Ireland between the finishing up of one harvest and the commencement of the next; but one object he had was to shorten the debate, for no Irish Member was more anxious than he was that relief should be given if required, and to have it voted as quickly as possible. He had heard there was some misapprehension about the Bill, and he rose for the purpose of getting some explanation from the Chief Secretary for Ireland, not in reference to the Amendment. There was an idea that the Bill was being passed for the purpose of paying off old debts; and if that point were cleared up when the Chief Secretary rose, it might possibly enable the Bill to pass in a few minutes. The 4th clause seemed intended to cover a multitude of sins.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): It would be quite irregular to enter upon the 4th clause; the hon. and gallant Member must address himself to the Amendment before the Committee.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he would ask leave of the Committee just to mention one thing which was outside of the Amendment; and he desired to say that, if he was allowed to mention it, and an answer was given, it might be that the Bill would be got through in a few minutes, and, otherwise, might take two or three nights.

MR. CALLAN rose to a point of Order. There was a Chairman of Committees, and, without any disrespect to the present occupant of the Chair (Mr. Courtney), he wished to ask whether this Bill was not a Bill dealing with the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, and whether it was right or proper, on a Bill dealing with Treasury interests, that the Secretary to the Treasury should occupy the Chair?

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): That is not a question of Order.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he was not quite certain if he understood the mysterious hint of the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer); but, no doubt, the difficulty would be cleared up when Clause 4 was reached; but certainly there never was a Bill which more completely contained on the face of it its nature and scope.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he wished to assist in getting it through quickly.

Captain Aylmer

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) had raised a point which he knew the hon. Member had much at heart, in a speech which did not surprise him by its earnestness—for he knew how earnest the hon. Member was—but which did surprise him, to a certain extent, by its extreme brevity in putting his case, which enabled him to put the opposite case without a long speech, which he would be unwilling to inflict upon the Committee with reference to the Bill. The hon. Member had spoken several times upon this question of outdoor relief when it had been raised by Resolution; and he could hardly complain that now, when the hon. Member saw an opportunity, not of abstract debate, but of embodying his views in an Act of Parliament, that he should ask the Committee to insert a particular clause in the Bill. But though certainly he did not complain of the course taken, he did not propose to follow by arguing at great length this most important question of dealing with prevailing distress by means of outdoor relief or workhouse test. It had been discussed—he would not say until the House was tired of it, for it was a question too full of interest not to carry the House through two or three debates—but it had been more thoroughly discussed than any other question during the Session. There had been two debates of what he might call first-class order, one in the month of February, and the other last Friday. On the first occasion the House, by a majority which at the moment he had forgotten, but which he fancied was somewhere between 90 and 120 to a minority of 32, decided, after a long debate, that the policy of the Government with regard to outdoor relief should be supported; and on Friday the House came to a similar decision by 82 to 22. It must be remembered in regard to this Division that the majority represented, to a considerable extent, the feeling of the House of Commons, because it was an occasion upon which hon. Gentlemen who took the view of the hon. Member for Mallow were pretty sure to be present in as large numbers as they could muster. On the last occasion he spoke for nearly an hour, and expressed his opinion upon the bearings of this question of outdoor and indoor relief, both as applied to general and normal distress and to exceptional periods of distress, and he did not intend to repeat the arguments he then used. The hon. Member for Dublin (Dr. Lyons) had quite rightly described the Bill as definite and limited in its purpose; it was a Bill for enabling Unions which, with the permission of the Government, had met distress during the winter months by borrowing money on the local rates, to be indemnified, and in addition, in cases where they required it, to enable them to borrow further; and in cases where the Government considered these Unions had placed themselves in an impoverished position by no fault of their own, to enable the Government to make a grant of the amount of the sum they had borrowed; and this was a power of which the Government intended to avail themselves. In a Bill of this sort he could understand why the hon. Member should raise the question of outdoor relief, for this was the first practical opportunity he had of getting his view inserted into a Bill; but he thought the hon. Member would understand—and he was sure the majority of the House would understand—that the Government could not possibly, at that late period of the Session, and at a late period of the distress, the method of meeting which had been so much discussed—they could not quite suddenly face rightabout, and accept an Amendment which would stultify everything they had said in the House and everything they had done in Ireland. He felt, and he respected very much the sympathy which the sufferings of the people of Donegal had raised in the mind of the hon. Member for Mallow; but he had different accounts of the condition of Dunfanaghy. The accounts he had were to the effect that there was ten-fold more labour in the neighbourhood of the Union, and that the condition of the people was such as would enable them to pass through the time between this and harvest in a state which could not be considered one of very exceptional distress as compared with the state in which they had been for the last three or four months. His accounts were decidedly more hopeful, though, he allowed, they came from other quarters than those from which the hon. Member derived his information. He respected the motives with which the hon. Member had brought forward his Amendment; but it was impossible for the Government to accept it. He earnestly trusted that, although the hon. Member was disappointed on a subject he had very much at heart, he would allow the Bill, against the principle of which he did not understand the hon. Member had objection—[Mr. O'BRIEN: Oh, oh!] He (Mr. Trevelyan) did not know what the objection was, except so far as the hon. Member thought any of this money was to be expended in workhouse relief. He earnestly trusted the hon. Member would accept the decision of the Committee on the Amendment, and allow the Bill to go forward.

MR. LEAMY said, it appeared that the impression on the mind of the Chief Secretary was that the Amendment proposed by his hon. Friend the Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) would impose an obligation on Boards of Guardians to proceed at once to grant outdoor relief in distressed Unions; but it would do nothing of the kind. Simply the Amendment said it should be lawful for the Guardians of any Union receiving a grant under the Bill to grant outdoor relief during the next two months. Here was a sum of money about to be granted to certain Unions in Ireland, granted from an Irish fund, not from the pockets of English taxpayers; and his hon. Friend moved an Amendment giving these Guardians the power to grant relief to destitute poor persons, in or out of the workhouse. This was the Amendment the Chief Secretary said he could not accept, because, he said, it would be turning back from the position he took up a few months ago. Why did his hon. Friend ask for this Amendment? Because he knew that in the Unions where a great deal of distress prevailed a large number of the distressed people were small farmers, who could not go into the workhouse except at the price of breaking up their homes and demoralizing their families. His hon. Friend asked that a discretionary power should be given to Boards of Guardians in these Unions, to give some of this grant from an Irish fund to assist these poor people during the next two months, while they were waiting for the harvest to ripen. In these Unions these small farmers had been kept alive for six or seven months, not by the action of the Boards of Guardians or the Government, but by money contributed by charitable people. As a matter of fact, on one estate in Donegal, there were 400 tenants whose land had been seeded by the money of charitable people, poor miserable farmers, watching their seed ripening while they and their children were starving. He did not ask the Government to put its hands in the pockets of ratepayers, and to give the money to these people, or to impose an obligation upon the Guardians to give this relief; he simply asked that the Guardians should have the power to give from this grant if they thought it expedient to do so. This the Chief Secretary refused, and he was not surprised at this from a Government which months ago adopted the course they had pursued in Ireland; of course, it would never do to admit that their Irish policy had been mistaken for a moment. Of course, the Irish Members present were small in number, and the Bill could be passed by the votes of English Radical Members. But Irish Members were asking nothing from them; they were only asking that Irish Boards should use Irish money to meet the needs of the starving people of Donegal. This request was denied, and the denial would be sanctioned by the votes of Members who never set a foot in Ireland, and who, bad as they were from a political point of view, and hostile as they were to Irish Members' views, would, he believed, if they saw the condition of the people, be the first to come forward and support the claim. The Amendment of his hon. Friend fell short of what he desired. Did hon. Members know what it was? By the law in Ireland, Guardians could give outdoor relief in cases where a man was disabled from work by sickness or accident; and the Amendment proposed that the Guardians should have power to give that relief to the destitute who were not disabled, but starving from want of work, and yet this discretionary power was refused. This grant of £50,000 was to be taken from an Irish fund; they did not seek to have it said how it should be distributed, but only that a discretion should be given to Guardians to dole out a few hundred pounds in the wretched mountain districts of Donegal, and also that the Guardians should not have this power for more than two months. Care would be taken that the privilege should not be abused; the Amendment said the grant might be made, but it did not compel it; the Guardians might grant the relief until the harvest ripened, and then the Guardians would no longer have the power, because the people would have the means of supporting themselves. And this was to be refused. Of course, the Irish Members were too small in number to make an impression upon the Government that night, and it was a sad thing to think that hon. Gentlemen should come down to the House and remain until 3 in the morning, to refuse a concession for which Irish Members could gain no credit if the Amendment were put in the Bill. There was no political reason for their action, that Englishmen, who had sympathy for suffering people in every quarter of the globe, and extended their charity to every part of the world, should come down to the House to prevent a discretionary power being given to Irish Guardians to use Irish money on behalf of starving Irish people.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Waterford (Mr. Leamy) did not make full allowance for the attitude of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. His hon. Friend seemed to think that the condition of the poor starving people in Donegal, watching the grain ripening while they suffered the pangs of hunger, had escaped the notice of the Chief Secretary; but he did not think there was anything in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman from which his hon. Friend could form that conclusion. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had, he thought, told the House that it would be an object of contemplation—an interesting subject for contemplation, so long as he had the privilege of misgoverning Ireland from that official Bench. Some months ago, he informed the House that the Government had adopted a certain line of policy; and as the result of the treatment in Donegal, charitable priests and ladies were obliged, by begging in charitable quarters everywhere—of course excluding Government quarters—to make up for the neglect of Government, and by their action they saved the lives of hundreds and of thousands in Donegal and other parts of Ireland; and while the Government made up its mind three months ago to face the risk of the people starving, they were now prepared to add a couple of months more; for, said he, in those tones of satisfaction that found an echo from the Radical admirers of the Chief Secretary, even if they were in a starving condition they were not in a very much worse condition than they had been in so for several months previously. That was the position of the Chief Secretary. If these sentiments were held by a Cossack savage they would be regarded as barbarous and atrocious; but, coming from the right hon. Gentleman the Liberal Representative of a Liberal Government in Ireland, they were humane and like an Englishman. It was quite clear that argument was thrown away; it was apparent that it was utterly useless for Irish Members to appeal to a Radical Party whose consciences were in the possession of a Liberal Whip; and he did not know really what was to be done, except that it might assist his hon. Friends to make use of those Benches to talk to the Irish people if they were disposed to continue the subject to a length at which it might properly be discussed, when, perhaps, it might help to bring about another Monaghan Election before long. But it was quite clear that, although nothing was asked but that the Boards of Guardians, or, failing them, the official Board in Dublin, should have the power of relieving persons who were disabled from starvation during a short space of two months, though nothing more was asked than the power to relieve grievous cases during a limited period, this was refused because the Chief Secretary said, having laid down certain rules three months ago, the Government could not withdraw those rules now, and if the people went on to starvation, well, they had always been near starvation under a British Government, but the subject would continue to be one for interesting contemplation. The position of the Irish Members was merely to protest, and he was exceedingly sorry they could do no more. Such conduct as Her Majesty's Government were adopting in Ireland, if adopted anywhere else in the world, would be regarded as ample justification for insurrection and rebellion; it was a policy of spoliation, of cruel murderous torture of women and children; it was a policy of detestable barbarity and meanness; it was a policy that deserved the execration and curses of every honest man. But the curses and execrations of honest men would always be matter of mirth to Her Majesty's Government, until honest men had got physical force on their side.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he did not wish to detain the Committee at that late hour; but certainly he would, if only as a protest, carry his Motion to a Division, and see how many Members would follow him into the Lobby. Bitter as had been the words of his hon. Friend who had last spoken, he did not in the least exaggerate the feeling that the attitude of the Chief Secretary would create in Ireland. He had represented that thousands of unfortunate people were admittedly without means of support, and he defied the Government to point to anything that the Government or the Poor Law had done for them. He wanted no victory over the Government in the way of putting outdoor relief in an Act of Parliament, but some sort of pledge that something would be done for these unfortunate people, who, up to the present, had been trusting to private charity for support. In official Reports there had been a misrepresentation of facts, he would not say an amount of lying, though that might be justified. On these Reports the Chief Secretary relied, when he said that things were not quite so exceptionally bad as in the past four months; but during all this time the distress had been in full swing. The Chief Secretary seemed to think that he (Mr. O'Brien) had no objection to the Bill; but he must say that the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman on the subject convinced him that, whether wisely or not, it was only part of the plan to substitute for help the expatriation of the Irish people, to the discouraging of any other mode of dealing with the distress. What was the Bill for? The right hon. Gentleman had admitted, in plain terms, that the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer) had hit the right nail on the head when he said the Bill was to pay off old debts. It was a Bill to pay some debts already incurred by Boards of Guardians, and whom would it actually relieve? It was admitted that there were thousands wanting relief; but would this Bill buy one pound of meal towards relieving starvation? Would it give any relief until the people went into the workhouse, and it was known they would die before they would do that? It would relieve the ratepayers, not the people in distress. But for the Bill, there would be nothing left but to declare the Union bankrupt, and the landlords would be the losers—the persons who all along had made light of the distress that they might not be called upon to relieve it, but who made a long face when there was a chance of getting relief from Government. It was the Boards of Guardians—the landlords and their agents—who had persistently followed the Government programme, denying the distress, enforcing the workhouse test, refusing outdoor relief, getting up long lists of emigrants, getting the people into a better mood for closing with the offers of emigration agents—these were the people who were to have this present of £50,000. All he could say was, he was heartily sick of appealing to the Government on this subject. He did not care in what way they phrased it, or gave the guarantee; but that the process of starvation should not continue among thousands of people for two months longer—that was his object.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): The hon. Member for Waterford did not move an Amendment, I think, though he intimated his intention of doing so.

MR. LEAMY said, he did not intend to do so. His Amendment was simply to confer a greater discretion upon Boards of Guardians; but he did not think it was any use moving it. He would, however, bring it up on Report, when Irish Members would be prepared to support it, and to have a discussion of some length.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 13; Noes 59: Majority 46.—(Div. List, No. 170.)

MR. LEAMY said, he would move the Amendment of which he had given Notice. He did not know whether the Government had any great objection to it.

Amendment proposed,

In page 1, line 17, after the word "pounds," to insert the words "and no portion of such grants shall be applied to the purpose of aiding or assisting emigration."—(Mr. Leamy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

Mr. O'Brien

MR. TREVELYAN said, on this point he was able to explain to hon. Members the peculiar transactions on account of which the Bill was introduced, to show them there was no hidden purpose behind the Bill, and, at the same time, to show them how very small a Bill it was to attract so much attention. Had the hon. Member for Mallow (Mr. O'Brien) inserted his Amendment, it would not have been a small matter; but what remained was a very small Bill indeed. There were three financial principles in the Bill, under none of which could any money, or would any money, be spent in emigration. On the principle contained in the 4th clause certain Unions had borrowed money, with the approval of the Local Government Board. Of these Unions, three out of four were Unions that had not contributed a single penny from their funds, or borrowed a single penny for emigration purposes—Belmullet, Clifton, and Newport—and in the fourth Union £500 had been borrowed, and none of that had been applied to purposes of emigration. The 3rd clause contained the power to borrow in the future, under the sanction of the Local Government Board; and he was able to say positively that with regard to Unions who might seek to exercise that power in future, the Local Government Board would not give its sanction to their so charging themselves for purposes of emigration. Then, the other object of the Bill was the relief of the four Unions which had borrowed from their debt; and he gave an absolute pledge for the Government that not one single half-penny of the money should be spent, directly or indirectly, upon emigration. He should consider it a gross breach of faith on the part of the Government to extend a system of emigration which had created so much approbation, and, at the same time, some disapprobation, without giving hon. Members full and fair opportunity of discussing the question again, and of refusing or granting any further contribution from public funds. He was unwilling to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member; because it appeared to him, among other things, that it could scarcely be introduced without appearing to imply that the House disapproved of the system of emigration. He hoped the hon. Member would be content with the explanation and the assurances he had given.

MR. LEAMY said, the right hon. Gentleman's strongest objection was that it might appear to some people that if the Amendment were accepted the House disapproved of emigration. Now, what was the Amendment? The Bill proposed to grant £50,000 to certain Unions, and the Amendment proposed that no portion of such grant should be applied or spent to aid or assist emigration. That was merely a declaration that a particular fund should not be devoted to purposes of emigration; but in no way did it express disapprobation of emigration, or refer to any other fund. The Chief Secretary said no part of the fund should be so applied. Then, where was the substantial objection to the Amendment? He was not calling in question the right hon. Gentleman's word; he was quite willing to trust him; but suppose the present Government went out of Office—such a thing might easily happen—and another Chief Secretary came in, he might not consider himself bound by the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman. He might probably say to Irish Members who got up and said there was a promise that none of this money should be applied to purposes of emigration—"Oh! many things have happened since then. Besides, the right hon. Gentleman has gone into the cold shade of Opposition." Without offering any disrespect to the right hon. Gentleman, and without lessening the value of his word ever so slightly, some better, some stronger assurance, must be asked for. Of course, if the word of a Minister was to be taken as sufficient, then the House might give up passing Acts of Parliament altogether.

MR. FINDLATER said, he understood the undertaking given by the right hon. Gentleman was given on behalf of the Government; and it was well known that if a change of Government took place such undertakings were always recognized and acted on.

MR. CALLAN said, the assurance carried no weight whatever. For weeks the House had been discussing the Corrupt Practices Bill, and the Attorney General day after day gave assurances and opinions; but, to carry out such assurances, he had been obliged to put them into words in the Bill. The Attorney General made statements to the Committee as clear and explicit as that made by the Chief Secretary, as to what was the intention of the Bill; but he had to put words into it, clearly showing the limitations of the Act, simply because the Judges would not, in construing the Act, have any regard to what the Attorney General might have said; they would only have that before them which was contained within the four corners of the Bill. In the same way must the word of the Chief Secretary be regarded in relation to this Bill. How unscrupulous Poor Law Commissioners in Ireland were was well known, and they would have the working of the Act. The Chief Secretary said there would be no intention so to use the Act while he was at the head of the Board; then, why should he object to put that assurance in the Bill? His assurance would bind himself in the House; but they wished to bind his successors.

MR. J. N. RICHARDSON said, he should like to point out that, in effect, the Act would expire on March 31, 1884. Surely, the hon. Member would allow the Government to remain in Office until then.

MR. DILLWYN said, he did not think that anyone reading the Bill could suppose that the money could be used in the way hon. Members apprehended. The objects of the Bill were clearly stated, and he did not think any stretch of the wording would allow it. It was clearly imagination on their part.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he wished he could agree that it was distinctly stated what the money was for; he was at that moment utterly bewildered as to the destination of the money. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned four Boards of Guardians as the destined recipients, so far as he understood, of grants under the Grants Clause of the Bill; but he (Mr. O'Brien) did not know what was to be done with the margin of the money at all. Of course, anyone would accept the guarantee of the right hon. Gentleman; but they knew very well he was only one partner—a sleeping partner—on the Local Government Board, which directed its policy to the object of driving the people from the country by stress of hunger. If, as the Chief Secretary said, beyond all doubt, it was not the intention of the Government that any portion of the money should be devoted to emigration, he could not, for the life of him, see what was the difficulty in putting it in black and white to bind himself, his subordinates, and successors.

MR. CALLAN said, the hon. Member for Armagh (Mr. J. N. Richardson) directed attention to the fact that the Bill would only be in operation to the end of March, and surely, he said, the Government would be allowed that length of existence; but he (Mr. Callan) did not know that he would allow them even that length of time, if the hon. Member interested himself in many more elections with such disastrous results as attended his efforts at Monaghan.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not wish to interfere; but he must confess his experience of the conduct of the Chief Secretary did not encourage his inclination to believe his statements with regard to this or any other question. He had already broken his word once in regard to this Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): I must call the hon. Member to Order. He must retract that statement.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not know what the hon. Gentleman meant.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY): The hon. Member must retract the statement.

MR. BIGGAR said, he would withdraw the statement that the right hon. Gentleman had made a false statement; but, at the same time, he stated he would not bring on the Bill after half-past 12, and he had done so.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 8; Noes 59: Majority 51.—(Div. List, No. 171.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. O'BRIEN said, before the clause was passed, he would like to elicit some definite information as to the destination of the money. The right hon. Gentleman had mentioned four Unions, and these were not the most distressed, which were to receive the benefit of the Act. He would like to know how it had been arranged, and whether any other Unions would receive anything?

MR. TREVELYAN said, the operation of the Bill upon what had taken place was confined to the four Unions named, and the sum borrowed was very small, in amount about £3,000. These the Local Government Board would assist by the 1st clause; but when the accounts for past distress were wound up, distress which had involved a certain number of Unions in an amount of expenditure that might be fairly called unusual, the Local Government Board would take into consideration, with the object of seeing, in addition to the grants of 1880, whether they should assist any embarrassed Unions, or Unions in the way of becoming embarrassed, out of this sum of money. Hon. Members would remember that after 1880 a sum of something like £19,900 was, under the Relief of Distress Act, given to embarrassed Unions. This sum of £50,000 was named when the Government thought the necessities of the Unions would be greater than would probably be the case now, and it would enable Government to assist Unions to get through a period of embarrassment and start afresh. The four Unions he had referred to would, no doubt, be assisted.

MR. LEAMY said, according to the right hon. Gentleman, the debt incurred was not more than £3,000; so power was given to the Commissioners to grant £47,000 to other Unions. He had mentioned only four Unions as being in a distressed condition, and the amount of the debt incurred by them did not exceed £3,000; so it seemed to him the sum named was too high, seeing that the Church Fund might be applied to many other legislative objects. The maximum might, he thought, be lowered from £50,000 to £25,000, and he did not quite see the object of asking for £25,000 when the debt incurred was only £3,000.

Clause 2 (Extension of borrowing powers).

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 8: Majority 51.—(Div. List, No. 173.)

Clause 3 (Power to borrow).

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 8: Majority 51. — (Div. List, No. 174.)

Clause 4 (Confirmation of borrowing by Boards of Guardians).

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 8: Majority 51. — (Div. List, No. 175.)

Clause 5 (Short title).

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. CALLAN said, he had an Amendment to propose, which he hoped the Government would agree to. It was, in fact, to make the Act in consonance with its title. It was to make temporary provision for the destitute poor in Ireland, and the short title was the "Relief of Unions (Ireland)." He would move to leave out "Unions," for the purpose of substituting "Destitute Poor."

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "Unions," and insert "Destitute Poor."—(Mr. Callan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Unions' stand part of the Clause."

MR. TREVELYAN said, the title in the 5th clause properly expressed the contents of the Bill. It was precisely the purpose of the Bill, which had as its main object the relief of distressed Unions.

MR. CALLAN said, if the title "Relief of Distressed Unions" was the proper title, why was that title not given when the Bill was introduced? Was the first title given to mislead? The short title should be in consonance with the title of the Bill when introduced.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he was not in favour of christening the Bill with a dishonoured title. It would not be decent to say it was for the relief of destitute poor in Ireland. It had not been very pleasant to the Irish Members to press their opposition; but they would have failed in their duty if they had held any compromise with a Bill they considered a cruel evasion of the duty of the Government towards the people, thousands of whom were in such deep distress in Ireland. Month after month had the Government been face to face with this destitution; the Chief Secretary had witnessed and confessed it; the Poor Law Inspectors had confessed it, admitting that the Poor Law was inoperative; and then, when the supporters of the Government cried shame on the Government, after all the Government came down with this miserable shuffling little Bill, seizing £50,000 of Irish money, not to feed the Irish people—he did not care what was its purpose; its effect would be to relieve Unions that were injuring and banishing the people.

MR. LEAMY said, the Bill was not for the relief of the destitute poor. It was nothing of the kind. He was certain that some of the money would go to Unions which joined in the exportation of the people to America.

MR. O'DONNELL said, assuredly the objections of his hon. Friends were well founded; but his hon. Friend the Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) was probably actuated by a desire to maintain the symmetry of the Government proposition. Of course, the Bill was not for the relief of the destitute poor; but, the Government having started the Bill with that description, his hon. Friend tried to preserve the hypocritical character of the Bill from the first line to the last. It was more with a view to artistic effect that he had brought on his Amendment. The Bill undoubtedly was of a deceptive character. It appeared as a Poor Relief (Ireland) Bill; it went on to say it was expedient to make temporary provision for the destitute poor in Ireland, and it was not a Poor Relief Bill; but, on the contrary, when an Amendment was moved to make temporary provision for two miserable calendar months the Government opposed the suggestion. However, though it was almost a pity that the truth should be allowed to come in in part of the title, on the whole he hoped his hon. Friend would consent to withdraw his Amendment, and let a Division be taken on the clause. It would be impossible for him at this stage to invest the Government proposition with any more merit than it already possessed.

MR. BIGGAR said, there was one thing in regard to the Bill that should be noticed, and that was that the first two lines and the last two lines diametrically contradicted each other. He did not think that hon. Gentlemen should think it strange that he should raise doubts as to the veracity of Gentlemen who directly contradicted themselves in a document they introduced into the House.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, the Chairman had prevented him putting a question, some two hours ago, by which he then hoped to prevent a long discussion; but the discussion had now been raised upon the title. He was particularly anxious to know from the right hon. Gentleman—and this was the question he wished to put before—whether this money was wanted to meet distress between the present time and the harvest, or whether it was all to be devoted to the relief of former distress?

MR. TREVELYAN said, he had stated the sum which had been borrowed, the total amount being £3,000. That was the total amount of borrowed money which would be paid off. If there were other Unions which had hampered themselves, which could not pay their way, or come near paying their way, the Government would consider whether they should be relieved. The Unions sure to be relieved were the four he had named.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, then four-fifths of the money would be devoted to relieving distress between now and the taking in of the harvest. He knew there was a misunderstanding on the subject among hon. Members below the Gangway, they believing that the money was going to the payment of old debts. If the Chief Secretary would say that £40,000 out of £50,000, or, at all events, a very considerable proportion, would go to relieve distress existing, or likely to exist, in the next two months, it would stop a long discussion.

MR. CALLAN said, his sole object in his Amendment was that if the Bill was honestly intended the title should be that under which it was introduced. By his Amendment he had marked the divergence in title, one falsifying the other. The probable effect of the Act would be equally to falsify the assurances with which it was introduced and the pledges given. He begged to withdraw his Amendment.

MR. O'BRIEN said, he was sorry the Chief Secretary had not yet cleared up the point raised by the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer). The hon. and gallant Member was plainly under the impression that the Bill made provision for distress actually existing, and which would continue to exist for the next two months. Now, he would ask the Chief Secretary, was there any provision in the Bill that would give 1 lb. of meal to anyone actually starving at the moment, or was the Bill meant to do more than to clear off the liabilities already incurred?

MR. TREVELYAN said, the probable effect of the Bill would be to clear off the liabilities already incurred. The Bill gave power to Unions that might find it necessary for the relief of distress to borrow between this and the 25th of March, 1884, to do so. He hoped and trusted that there would not be such distress in Ireland as to give occasion for that clause being brought into operation; and he thought it probable that, as the Government provided against a much greater amount of embarrassment than had actually occurred, that £50,000 would not be needed. Such of it as was spent would be spent in relieving those four Unions, and any others that had embarrassed themselves in the relief of distress.

MR. LEAMY said, the right hon. Gentleman was a great master of language; but he might have said "Yes" or "No" in answer to the question of his hon. and gallant Friend. That question referred to Clause 3, which gave to Boards of Guardians power to borrow money, and that was altogether independent of the £50,000. He wanted a specific answer to the question—was any of the £50,000 the Commissioners took power to lend to Boards of Guardians to be spent in the relief of distress existing at the moment, or likely to exist in the next two months? "Yes" or "No."

MR. TREVELYAN said, it might be spent in relieving such distress; but spent in relief under the present Poor Law.

MR. O'BRIEN said, the effect would be, in those Unions which were of all most affected, that of which he had complained all along. In those Unions, owing to extreme poverty, the landlords were in dread of being mulcted for outdoor relief; therefore, in those Unions the Act would have no effect at all, but an encouragement even would be given to those Boards of Guardians who had been refusing to relax the Poor Law rules. Nothing absolutely would be done for the relief of distress; but some thousands of pounds would go to remunerating Guardians.

CAPTAIN AYLMER said, he had voted with the Government on the assumption that some of the money was going to the relief of distress in Ireland; but, as he had got to the fact that the money would simply go to pay off debts that had been incurred, he would give the Government Notice that he would oppose the Bill on the third reading.

MR. O'DONNELL said, when that was confessedly the object of the Bill, he wanted to know why the Bill was introduced under a deceptive title? Here was a Poor Relief Bill, and it gave no relief to the poor. It was described in the most hypocritical and mendacious manner as a Bill to make temporary provision for the relief of destitute poor. Why, next day there would be leading articles in the Press denouncing the conduct of Irish Members who opposed a Bill for the relief of destitute poor in Ireland! Thus, by false pretences, was the opinion of the country turned against sympathy for distress in Ireland in a scandalous and disgraceful manner.

MR. TREVELYAN said, he would not answer the epithets of the hon. Member. The title of the Bill was perfectly justified. The debts these Unions had incurred were debts to flour and potato merchants, debts incurred for the support of people in the workhouses and the infirm and persons incapable of labour outside, and therefore the Bill was described justly as for the relief of destitute poor. He quite allowed that hon. Members did not agree in the mode of spending it; but every penny was well spent in feeding and clothing destitute poor. As to confessions being wrung from the Government, he would remind hon. Members that he gave the same explanation last Monday when he moved that the Bill be allowed to go into Committee.

MR. LEAMY said, he would point out that the Bill was described as a Bill to make temporary provision for the relief of the poor; and did that not convey the meaning that it was to meet immediate pressing wants? But now the Chief Secretary admitted that its object was to merely pay off old debts. They had no objection to the Chief Secretary granting as much of the £50,000 as was necessary to pay off debts; they had not fought the Bill on that ground. What they asked from the first stage of the Bill was that, while taking £50,000 of Irish money, the Government should give some of it for the temporary relief of the poor in Ireland. What other object had they in their speeches that night?

MR. O'BRIEN said, no charge could be brought against them that they had any wish to obstruct Business; their action in regard to this Bill was because they felt that miserable people in the North of Ireland were starving. He could not, for the life of him, understand why the Chief Secretary should object in a Bill taking £50,000 to spend £1,000, £2,000, or £3,000 to keep the people from starvation. It was not the first time that the hon. and gallant Member for Maidstone (Captain Aylmer), who usually differed from Irish Members in politics, had voted with them on questions relating to Ireland of a practical nature; but he was grieved to find the Liberal Members from Ulster opposed. But he supposed the Government were persuaded that so long as the Liberal Members from Ulster backed them up, they must be right, and that they had the approval of the people of Ireland. He hoped they would regret their harsh conduct to the miserable starving people of the North of Ireland.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 9: Majority 49. — (Div. List, No. 176.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be reported without Amendment."

MR. O'BRIEN gave Notice that on the Motion for third reading he should move that the Bill be re-committed, with a view to the insertion of clauses making temporary provision for the destitute poor in Donegal County.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 59; Noes 7: Majority 52. — (Div. List, No. 177.)

Bill reported, without Amendment; to be read the third time upon Monday next.

DETENTION IN HOSPITALS BILL.

(The Marquess of Hartington, Secretary Sir William Harcourt, Sir Arthur Hayter.)

[BILL 247.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading [9th July] read.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON said, owing to an inadvertence there was an error in the Votes in the description of this Bill. The Votes did not agree with the Notice he gave, and which was assented to by the House. In order that the Bill might be re-constituted, he would move that the Order be discharged, with the intention of introducing a fresh one.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged,"—(The Marquess of Hartington,)—put, and agreed to.

Order discharged; Bill withdrawn.

Leave given to present another Bill instead thereof.

DETENTION IN HOSPITALS (NO. 2) BILL.

Bill to provide for the Detention in certain Hospitals of persons affected with Contagious Diseases, and to repeal the Contagious Diseases Acts, 1866 to 1869."

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 259.]

House adjourned at a quarter after Four o'clock in the morning.

LAW AND POLICE (SCOTLAND)—THE CLYDE DISASTER.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: My Lords, seeing the noble Earl opposite in his place, I beg to ask him a Question of which I have given him private Notice. It is, Whether the Government intend to take any steps to ensure that an inquiry will be made into the Clyde catastrophe? From all the information that has been published, it is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that there must have been gross mismanagement; and I think the Government should take immediate steps to see that a searching investigation into the circumstances should be made.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, on receiving the Notice of the noble Viscount I communicated with the President of the Board of Trade, but I found it was not a case that will come under the Board of Trade. The matter is one that will have to be considered by the Procurator Fiscal in Scotland, and I have not had time to communicate with him since I received Notice of this Question.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: I understand an investigation is being made, and I should like to know if the Report will be laid on the Table before the House rises?

EARL GRANVILLE: If the noble Viscount will revert to the usual practice of giving Notice of his Question, I will be glad to do my best to answer him. It is very inconvenient to be called on to answer Questions of this kind without Notice.

WESTERN ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC—THE NEW HEBRIDES—OCCUPATION BY FRANCE.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: I hope I may be allowed to ask a Question on another matter. On coming down to the House a telegram from Sydney was put into my hands, stating that a French gunboat had been sent with orders to hoist the French flag on the New Hebrides. I should like to know Whether the Government have any information on the subject?

EARL GRANVILLE: I have not had time to communicate with my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby). If the noble Viscount will give Notice, according to the usual practice of the House, I have no doubt that my noble Friend will answer the Question on another occasion.

VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: I will repeat the Question on Monday.

INDIA—CRIMINAL LAW—PUNISHMENT OF FLOGGING.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD TRURO, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government, What steps (if any) have been taken in regard to the abolition of the punishment of flogging for minor offences in India; and to ask whether any returns on the subject will be furnished, and, if so, when? said, that it was not until last year that an assurance was given in that House which led him to believe that some activity had been shown on the part of Her Majesty's Government with the view of remedying the evils to which his Question applied. An assurance was given by the then Under Secretary of State for India that the subject was receiving the attention of the noble Marquess who at that time presided at the India Office. He was inclined to believe, from observation of the Indian journals, that the noble Marquess had acted in the matter with his accustomed energy and promptitude. Flogging in India was in itself a punishment that inflicted the deepest indignity upon the Natives, and was the cause of far more grievous suffering than corporal punishment inflicted in this country. The Returns showed that sentences of flogging were passed in India for the most trivial offences; while in this country flogging was only used to punish the most heinous offences, such as robbery with violence. He wished to bring before the attention of the country the dreadful horrors which were perpetrated under the British Government in India by the indiscriminate infliction of flogging for trivial offences. He had collected information on this subject from public journals enjoying, and rightly enjoying, the respect and confidence of the Indian public—The Englishman of Calcutta, The Madras Times, and The Bombay Gazette—and the cases which he had selected were not old ones, but had occurred as recently as 1882. For stealing eight annas, value 1s., a sentence of 30 lashes and three years' rigorous imprisonment had been inflicted. On a previous occasion he had been told that severe punishments were inflicted because the subjects were old offenders. The House should remember that they were administering British justice in India according to English law, and there was no such thing in English law as accumulative punishments. But even if there were, unless for offences of a most grave character, such a punishment as 30 lashes, administered with a cat or rattan, in addition to three years' rigorous imprisonment, ought not to be inflicted. The theft of a bottle of whiskey was punished with 20 lashes and two years' imprisonment; for stealing seven annas, value 10d., the sentence was 30 lashes and two years' imprisonment; stealing cloth, value 6s., 25 lashes and one year's imprisonment; the theft of a tiffin box, 35 lashes; stealing gold ornaments, value £15, 50 lashes and two years' imprisonment; the theft of a pocket-handkerchief, 18 strokes with a rattan; stealing a bottle of brandy, 10 lashes; stealing a pocket-handkerchief, 15 strokes and two months' imprisonment; while a boy of 12 years of age received 12 strokes for stealing a bottle of Eau de Cologne. The theft of a pair of shoes was visited with three years' imprisonment; and stealing 3d. was punished with eight months' rigorous imprisonment and one month's solitary confinement. Stealing a necklace was punished by three years' imprisonment and two months' solitary confinement; stealing 9d., three years' imprisonment, with two months' solitary confinement. To show the inequality of the punishments, he would point out that for stealing £2 10s. only two months' hard labour was given; and for stabbing, only six weeks' imprisonment. The theft of £150 and other articles was punished with four months' imprisonment; while three years' was given for stealing 3d. He did not suppose the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India would justify these cases on the ground of cumulative punishments. What was the cause of these small offences? The cause was the most lamentable that could be conceived. It was admitted on all hands that these trivial thefts took place because 40,000,000 of the population were in a state of chronic starvation. Many of the thefts that were committed and punished with flogging were committed by the offenders for the purpose of relieving the chronic hunger from which they suffered. Labourers were only paid 4s. a week. Out of every sum of 5d. expended in the purchase of salt, 4½d. went to the Government. It was further to be remembered that this was in a country where £4,000,000 out of the £60,000,000 of Revenue was paid as pensions and deferred pay to persons not resident in the country. These circumstances explained how it was that the working people were sometimes driven to commit theft. Hunger was the cause of their misconduct; and that being so, the British Government deserved severe censure for having permitted the practice of flogging to extend to such proportions as it had reached in late years. In a recent year there were 17,032 cases of corporal punishment for offences committed in gaols. That was an enormous number; and what made the matter worse was that the flogging in those cases was ordered to be inflicted by the prison officers, without the intervention of any magistrate. He trusted that the Secretary of State for India would give the House an assurance that the punishment of flogging would, in the future, be much less frequently resorted to, if not abolished altogether.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY said, it was quite understood in that House that when a noble Lord had given Notice that he would call attention to one subject he was allowed to speak on all other subjects, however remote their relevancy might be. But his noble Friend behind him had extended their Lordships' privilege very greatly on that occasion, for he had referred, not only to the subject of flogging in India, but to questions that had very little connection with the subject matter of his Question — such questions as the condition of the population of India, the food supply of that country, and its taxation, not one of which subjects could be discussed adequately in less than a whole Sitting. If his noble Friend wished to have them discussed, perhaps he would be good enough to give Notice of his intention. Passing by the figures of his noble Friend, which were not all of them accurate, he said that he feared that the noble Lord could not have read the Papers presented to the House last August on the subject of flogging, because in those Papers, although he did not say that they would remove all the censure which the noble Lord had passed upon the Government of India, there was very full information upon the whole question; a statement of the inquiry made by the Indian Government on the subject; the answers of the Local Government; the view taken by the Indian Government; and the despatch of Lord Hartington stating his views upon the whole question. In order to understand the present position of the matter it was absolutely essential that those Papers should be referred to, and his natural answer to the noble Lord, therefore, would be—"Read those Papers." He was not prepared to deny that the great amount of flogging which had been inflicted in India for minor offences was a subject deserving of attention, and that it was most desirable to diminish the number of such punishments. His noble Friend would find, if he would look at the Papers, that the Government of India quite recognized those considerations; but the replies received from the local Governments disclosed practically an unanimity of opinion as to the propriety and necessity of retaining whipping as a form of punishment. The inhabitants of India had always been familiar with that form of punishment, and in the opinion of the Indian Government the advances made by the people in civilization were not yet such as would justify the Government in abolishing flogging. It was for reasons connected with the question of caste, a less severe punishment than imprisonment, and it relieved the gaols. It was also preferable to imprisonment in that it left the bread-winner, supposing him to be the offender, with his family. The Indian Government, however, thought that magistrates of the second class should alone have authority to order a prisoner to be whipped, and suggested other limitations to the punishment. The Governor General added that indiscriminate flogging should be checked, especially in times of distress. Lord Hartington approved generally the views taken by the Governor General; but he added that he desired that the Viceroy in Council should take into consideration the question of a further reduction in the class of offences to be punished by flogging. That was the last despatch on the subject. He had no doubt that Lord Ripon's Government would consider whether a diminution could not be effected in the number of offences for which whipping was inflicted; but while it would be necessary to preserve in India a punishment which would not be necessary in this country, where the ways of life and the habits of the people were very different, at the same time he strongly felt, as everyone must feel who considered the subject, that every effort should be made to diminish the number of floggings. There was one piece of information which would be satisfactory to his noble Friend, and that was the number of corporal punishments for gaol offences had been largely diminished. While in 1880 the number was 17,057, in 1881 it was 8,921, or a reduction of 47 per cent. Further and more complete Returns would be shortly received. The ordinary Returns had been received already, but not those for which Lord Hartington called, distinguishing the kinds of offences and the nature of the punishment. When his noble Friend saw those Returns he would be better able to judge how far an advance had been made towards the object he had in view.

LORD TRURO said, that he had been in communication with a medical man who had been 10 years in India, and who told him that after seven or eight lashes of the rattan, he had seen the flesh fly from a man's back, and that he had witnessed scenes really disgusting and horrible. It was partly owing to his representations, and the terrible nature of the punishment, that he had brought the matter before their Lordships. He had no doubt that Her Majesty's Government would do their best to reduce the punishments; but he hoped they should be able to see their way to substituting some other punishment for that of flogging.

RAILWAY SERVANTS—HOURS OF DUTY.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD FORBES, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government, If a Return could be obtained of the number of hours in the day or week that the railway servants were on duty? said, the subject was one of national importance, inasmuch as now-a-days all the community were, if not travellers themselves, at all events deeply interested in the convenience and safety of those who were; and it was well known that many of the accidents that occurred were attributable to the long hours that railway servants were employed. Quite recently the Irish mail escaped from a terrible accident by an engine with two men asleep on it being providentially discovered just in time to be removed. While asking for information on this subject, he would like to know the powers of the Board of Trade in regard to signals, brakes, composite trains, and other matters of that kind. In regard to brakes, he thought we were far behind Continental countries; and as to the danger of forming composite trains of passenger carriages and goods waggons, they had a strong proof in an accident that occurred on the Alford Branch of the North of Scotland Railway. He did not make any charge against any particular Company, but thought he was justified in urging on the Government the necessity of introducing more stringent regulations.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN said, that, before his noble Friend answered this Question, he should like to be allowed to make an observation. The number of railway servants in the United Kingdom was about 240,000, and, therefore, the information referred to in the Question would indicate a vast mass of statistics. He did not mean to suggest that it would be impracticable for the Board of Trade to obtain from the various Railway Companies a copy of their time-sheets during some given week; but the items ascertained would, if they were to be turned to any practical purpose, require so many explanatory qualifications that the result might become somewhat uncertain and complicated. A pointsman at some local station might be nominally on duty for, say, 20 hours; but that might be occasioned by the fact that he had to start an early goods train at 3 o'clock in the morning, and he might then be without actual work till many hours later when the regular traffic commenced; and the Railway Company would, of course, be entitled to insert all such extenuating circumstances. At the same time, the general fact remained that it was exceedingly common for railway servants to be employed for periods which were undesirably long. That might be explained partly by the varying and peculiar requirements of railway traffic, but also he thought by the fact that there was a certain attractiveness in railway work, which secured a constant and superabundant supply of applicants for that kind of employment, and that enabled the Railway Companies to make terms of a more stringent kind than those which were practicable in other kinds of business. What he would suggest, as he could not, of course, put a formal Question to his noble Friend without Notice, was whether it would not be quite feasible to arrange that, as every casualty on a railway, however slight, was by regulation reported to the Board of Trade—in the year 1881, for example, there were 3,734 cases of injury to railway servants duly reported—it should be at the same time stated in the Report for how many hours the railway servant, or servants, concerned had been employed at the time of the occurrence, or what was the average length of their day's work?

LORD SUDELEY: My Lords, this question of the hours of employment of railway servants has been brought before Parliament on several occasions. In 1877, the noble Duke (the Duke of St. Albans) brought in a Bill to limit the length of time during which railway servants could be employed; it being stated to be—“Detrimental to the proper working of railways, and dangerous to the public, that the hours of employment should be excessive.”

That Bill was discussed by the House at some length; but it was thrown out as likely to cause needless interference with Railway Companies, and because it would, to a great extent, reduce their responsibility. The Board of Trade have no legislative authority, and can lay down no special binding rules in the matter; but they have indirectly great moral power. It is found that, when accidents happen and inquiries are made, the publicity given by the Inspectors to cases of working overtime is far more efficacious on the Companies than any law on the subject could possibly be. As a matter of fact, the Board of Trade have reason to know that, on the whole, the Railway Companies are most anxious to prevent this sort of irregularities happening, and take stringent steps to prevent them; but it is clear that sometimes under special circumstances they will happen, as, for example, when goods trains are delayed from fog, snow, and other causes. A few cases, therefore, do sometimes arise, though the Board of Trade are convinced they are very rare. The case to which the noble Lord refers appears to have been due solely to the great desire of the men to get back to their homes; and they distinctly made a wilful mis-statement to the night porter to the effect that they came out at 12.45 mid-day instead of 8 o'clock that morning. The London and North-Western Company state to the Board of Trade—

“The delay to the Irish mail was caused through an engineman and fireman falling asleep on their engine when returning empty without waggons. They reported themselves at Bangor to the night foreman and were allowed to return to Chester. This would not have been done if the men had not wilfully made a mis-statement to the effect that they had commenced work at 12.45 mid-day instead of 8 o'clock. The men stopped in obedience to signals at Llanfairfechan and fell asleep. The signalman at Llandudno exhibited great presence of mind, when the light engine ran through that station, in telegraphing to Colwyn Bay for the protection of the line. Both driver and fireman were asleep, but perfectly sober. . . . Although a delay of 22 minutes occurred to the mail owing to its being stopped at the various block points, no danger whatever could arise, as the signalman and other servants on duty took the usual precautions necessary under the block regulations, nor was there any possibility of the engine exploding, as the fire had naturally died down.”

There is no doubt the signalmen deserve the greatest credit. The policy of Parliament has always been to show that it thought it would be a dangerous precedent to interfere between the employer of adult labour and the employed as to the number of hours he was to work. It has always considered it far better to leave the responsibility on the right shoulders—namely, on those of the Railway Company. The whole question of Government taking additional responsibility and interfering with the Railway Companies was also most fully discussed before the Royal Commission in 1878. As regards the question raised by the noble Lord on the judgment of Major Marindin, one of the Board of Trade Inspectors, about three years ago, I have not the Report by me; but I can say that it is the practice of Inspectors to point out all matters connected with accidents that appear to have tended to cause them. There are several occasions on which it has been pointed out that mixed trains are an element of danger. I have one here, in which it is stated that—

“Mixed trains are always more or less an element of danger; but the risk of accident is far greater when the goods waggons are in front of the passenger carriages, although, doubtless, it is more convenient to place them there for shunting purposes.”

This is not done because the Board of Trade have any legal power to enforce it, but merely, by giving full publicity, to let it operate on the Railway Companies. It must be remembered that it is the direct interest of the Companies to prevent accidents; and up to a certain point there can be no doubt, provided you obtain uniformity of practice, it is far better for a Public Department not to interfere more than is absolutely necessary. In the present instance, where a strong case has been brought to light of a fireman and engineman working over hours, the Board of Trade consider that it is their duty to point it out as a caution to all other Railway Companies, to show the great and urgent care that is required to prevent overtime. They propose, therefore, to issue a special Circular to the Railway Companies, calling their attention to this case, and to the necessity of providing for the regularity of the hours of labour. I have only to add that I hope the noble Lord will not press for the Return for which he has moved. It would be a most voluminous document, and, besides being very difficult to obtain, would, I believe, be found altogether useless.

LORD NORTON said, he agreed with the noble Lord that, if the Board of Trade were to obtain such powers of interference, it would be undertaking the conduct of the railways, and with it the responsibility of their management. The Return asked for might very probably not be as voluminous as the noble Lord opposite supposed; but there could be no objection to a Return of the hours of labour of such classes of workmen as engine-drivers and signalmen, whose long periods of duty were often injurious to their health, as well as dangerous to the safety of the public. The rule of dividing the 24 hours into three sections of eight hours for signalmen had been departed from by the Companies, except in the neighbourhood of London and other large towns. The time was now often divided into two equal parts, and thus a signalman had to remain in the box every day for 12 hours continuously, with, perhaps, a good many signals constantly to attend to. He knew of several cases in which this stress of duty had injured the health and even the sanity of those employed. This, of course, involved serious risks to the public. He thought there was great cause for a general Circular on the subject of hours; and, as in the case of continuous brakes, the Board of Trade would do well to lay down some general standard rules, which would serve as tests of responsibility in inquiries about accidents.

LORD COLVILLE OF CULROSS said, that the ordinary practice was that the drivers and firemen of passenger trains were employed from seven to ten hours a-day, and those of mineral trains from nine to twelve hours; but the fixed hours were subject to exceptional delay by reason of bad weather. Passenger guards did 10 hours' duty. It was now rather the exception for signalmen to work the long hours that had been stated. At all important stations the time was eight hours; at some out-of-the-way places it might be longer. If attention were turned to some other employments, it would probably be found that the hours of work were longer than they were on railways. For instance, omnibus-drivers in London were on duty from 12 to 15 hours a-day. As to the inspection of works and bridges by the officers of the Board of Trade, as he was a Director of the Company that was building the new Forth Bridge, commenced three months ago, he might say that the officers had been there and had made a rigid inspection of all the material that was to be used in the work.

OFFICE OF THE GENTLEMAN USHER OF THE BLACK ROD.

RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN, in rising to move—

"That the Select Committee on the Office of the Clerk of the Parliaments and Office of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod be directed to inquire into the department of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, with the view of ascertaining whether the appointments in that department, or some of them, may not in future be conferred upon persons who have served with distinction in the army or navy or some department of the public service," said, he could not bring forward the Motion without expressing his deep regret, in which he was sure their Lordships shared, that they would never again see Sir William Knollys take his place in that House. The late Sir William Knollys led a long career in the service of his country and in the service of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and when he was appointed to the Office of Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, the general feeling was that he well deserved the tribute that had been paid to his services. Sir William Knollys was the personal friend of most of their Lordships, and, therefore, it was not necessary for him to say anything further; but he was sure that his name would never be mentioned in that House with any other feeling but that of the deepest esteem and regret. This was not the first time that the propriety of making this Motion had occurred to him; but for obvious reasons he had postponed it until it could be discussed on some such occasion as that, when nothing of a personal character could be supposed to be attached to it. The offices attached to their Lordships' House were valuable offices. There were two principal door-keepers who received a salary of £300 a-year; one who received £250, and 18 who received salaries from £70 to £170 a-year. These appointments were formally made by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. He himself was not in the primary sense an officer of the House; he was senior Gentleman Usher of the Queen, and was deputed as such to attend upon this House. In point of fact, he was the representative of Her Majesty in that House. Formerly, he was paid by fees, which were commuted into a salary. Originally, when there was only one door, he was the only officer admitted into the House during the debates, until the increase in the number of doors had involved an increase in the number of door-keepers. The appointments were made under the authority of the House, which at no time relaxed its control over them, and they were in no sense attached to the office of Black Rod. They were made by him simply because the House had permitted him to make them. In early times the offices were disposed of by sale, and a Committee reported with satisfaction that the practice had ceased, intimating that it ought not to be revived. The duties attached to the offices were not laborious. With regard to that portion of his Motion which alluded to the Army and Navy, he thought it would be admitted that there was a growing desire in the country to do what was possible to elevate those two great public Services in public estimation by reserving for those who distinguished themselves in those Services appointments of the character of those under consideration. The civil employment of soldiers and sailors had occupied the attention of both Houses of Parliament; a Committee of the House of Commons had reported strongly in favour of it; the Commander-in-Chief had advocated it; some of the Public Departments had recognized the claims of soldiers and sailors; and preference was given to them at the Admiralty and at the War Office respectively. Their claims had been urged on a Committee of the House of Commons, which had not yet reported. If it was urged that the appointments in that House must be filled by responsible persons, what better guarantee of responsibility could there be than the training of the Services and the recommendation of the commanding officers? It seemed to him that there was every reason in favour of this Motion. There were many of their Lordships, and he was one of them, who owed their seats in that House to the services rendered to the country either by themselves or their Predecessors in the Army and Navy. Therefore, he thought it was only right that they should seize every opportunity of recognizing the debt they owed. Large numbers of commissioned officers would, he believed, be keen candidates for such places. For his own part, he would far rather be a principal door-keeper of that House with £300 a-year than the Governor of a gaol. Yet whenever the Governorship of a gaol became vacant there was sure to be a large number of candidates for the post, including many officers in the Army and Navy. He was certain that both Services would consider the acceptance of this Motion by their Lordships as a very great compliment. He had proposed the Motion simply for the reasons he had stated, and without any reference to any of the present officers of the House. If there were anything in the terms that might seem to be too stringent he should be perfectly willing to accept a change in the words. He might mention that he did not wish to limit these appointments necessarily to persons who had served in the Army or Navy. All he desired was that candidates from the Army and Navy should have a preference given to them. In conclusion, he begged to move the Motion of which he had given Notice.

The Earl of Camperdown

Moved, "That the Select Committee on the Office of the Clerk of the Parliaments and Office of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod be directed to inquire into the department of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, with the view of ascertaining whether the appointments in that department, or some of them, may not in future be conferred upon persons who have served with distinction in the army or navy or some department of the public service."—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, he entirely agreed with every word the noble Lord had said. He had no wish to find fault with anything that was going on now; but he was of opinion that if this Motion were accepted an opening would be given to the valuable men who were now serving their country in the Army and Navy, and there would be an immense inducement to men to enter and continue in those Services. It would, he thought, be a great pity if they did not attempt to introduce a system of giving such appointments as these to naval and military officers. At the same time, he should be sorry if it were made an exclusive system; but the noble Lord distinctly guarded himself against that. He hoped the noble Earl at the head of the Admiralty would, on behalf of the Navy, support the Motion. For his own part, he cordially approved it.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD said, that during his connection with the Civil Service Commission it had fallen to his lot to see the excellent characters and the creditable examinations passed by the pensioners both of the Army and Navy. These very deserving non-commissioned officers came before the Civil Service Commissioners for the very small number of appointments which they were now able to receive. Such appointments were very few, both at the Admiralty and the War Office. He felt certain that if some scheme, such as his noble Friend had sketched forth, could be entertained by those in authority, it would constitute one of the greatest inducements possible to recruit even a better class of men than we had at present in the Army and the Navy. The excellent testimonials of soldiers and sailors produced in Cannon Row had come under his notice, and it was a subject of regret to the Civil Service Commission, of which he had the honour to be the head, that there were so few of these appointments that could be given to them. If the scheme proposed by the noble Earl could be entertained, it would be viewed by the Civil Service Commissioners with the most hearty approbation.

THE EARL OF NORMANTON said, there was one point on which he could confirm everything the noble Earl had said. The noble Earl had remarked that he would far prefer to be a door-keeper of that House than the Governor of a gaol. It had been his evil fortune more than once during the last few years to act on a Committee appointed for the purpose of choosing the Governor of a gaol. On one occasion there were upwards of 300 candidates, and he was astonished to find that among them there were not only subordinate officers of the Army and Navy, but officers of high rank—General Officers and Admirals of the Fleet—who were most anxious to obtain the appointment. On one occasion he was so astonished that he spoke to one of the candidates—an Admiral who had since held a high command. He at first thought it was impossible that he could be aware of what could be the duties of the office; but to his surprise the Admiral told him that he was prepared to go through them all, that he could get nothing to do, and that he was in the greatest possible distress. If this Resolution were carried, he believed it would be found that a large number of applications would be received, not only from non-commissioned officers and men, but also from commissioned officers of Her Majesty's Army and Navy.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said, the evidence adduced before the Select Committee of 1876 was strong and conclusive as to the important effect on recruiting that would be produced by giving civil appointments to non-commissioned officers. It was recommended that more of these places should be placed by the Government at the disposal of deserving non-commissioned officers. At the War Office the number of military clerks was very small as compared with the number of civil clerks. He thought that the War Office should be entirely manned by soldiers; and that even the higher appointments in that Department of the State should be filled by officers. Many officers would gladly compete for such appointments, especially if they found promotion in the Army slow. In Germany and France the War Departments were wholly manned by soldiers.

THE EARL OF REDESDALE (CHAIRMAN of COMMITTEES) said, that the late holder of the Office was an officer in the Army, and his Predecessor was an Admiral, and there had been no impediment to their appointment because they were in the Army and the Navy; but it might be carrying the matter a little too far to say that the Office should not be conferred upon any others than officers in the Army and Navy. It was surely fair that domestic servants throughout the country should have opportunities of getting these places. The evidence was clear that these appointments rested with Black Rod, and down to the present time there had been no dissatisfaction as to the manner in which they had been filled up. He did not resist the Motion, though he was a little sorry that new restrictions should be placed upon a public officer at the time of his appointment.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was impossible not to sympathize with those who had advocated the cause of the Army and Navy on the present occasion. He thought, however, that other officers in the Public Service besides those in the Army and Navy were entitled to consideration. He was glad the noble Earl (the Earl of Redesdale) had given them some advice upon the matter. No doubt, the habits of discipline acquired by officers in the Army and Navy rendered them peculiarly fitted for certain situations; but he understood that the noble Earl (the Earl of Camperdown) who made the Motion only wished for an inquiry into this matter. He thought, however, that one subject of inquiry should be not only the rewards given, but what would be most for the convenience of the House. Some noble Lords had pushed their arguments to an extreme length. Some of the officers of the House had to perform duties of a menial character; and he should himself be very unwilling to order a retired Admiral or officer in the Army to perform duties of that class. It was, he thought, necessary to appoint men who could deal with distinguished foreigners and ladies when they visited the House; and that, no doubt, required a certain amount of training, which was not necessarily, but might be, possessed by a gallant soldier or sailor. Though he adopted the Motion, it would be quite understood that it should be an Instruction to the Committee to inquire, not only into the character of the rewards, but also as to what was most for the convenience of their Lordships' House.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, he disclaimed any intention of interfering with the convenience of the House, and expressed his gratitude at the manner in which his Motion had been accepted; also his willingness that the Motion should be adopted in the sense placed upon it by the noble Earl.

ENNERDALE RAILWAY BILL [Lords].

INSTRUCTION TO THE COMMITTEE.

MR. E. S. HOWARD moved—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee to inquire and report whether the proposed Railway will interfere with the enjoyment of the public, who annually visit the Lake District, by injuriously affecting the scenery in that neighbourhood, or otherwise; and that they have power to receive Evidence upon the subject."

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that on the part of the promoters of the Bill, he was authorized to state that they did not intend to offer any opposition to this Instruction; but he thought it was right that he should take advantage of the opportunity to explain the circumstances in which he found himself yesterday. A most unusual course was then taken by several hon. Members. The case had been brought under his notice shortly before he entered the House, when he was informed that there would be no opposition to the Bill. He was, therefore, very much astonished to find that an opposition was raised by the hon. Member for West Cumberland (Mr. Ainsworth), who had presented a Petition on his own account against the Bill. He held a copy of that Petition in his hand, and the grounds on which the hon. Member opposed the Bill were that the Railway would intercept his property in an injurious manner and impair its value, and also the value of the property of other proprietors in the neighbourhood. The hon. Member had further alleged that the Bill was not promoted for the public interest, but for the benefit of private individuals, and that the House ought to reject it.

MR. SPEAKER wished to point out to the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he was wandering from the point before the House. He must confine himself to the Instruction which had been moved.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he was coming to that; but, unless he stated the circumstances, he did not see how he was to make the House comprehend the position in which the matter was placed. All he desired was that the House should know that the opposition to the Bill was merely a landowner's opposition. After the hon. Member for West Cumberland had addressed the House yesterday, up rose the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. W. E. Forster), who made another and an altogether different statement in regard to the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said the proposed Railway would have the effect of spoiling one of the most beautiful pieces of scenery in the Kingdom; and the question before the House to decide on the second reading of the Bill was whether it would allow one of the most beautiful features of the Lake District to be spoilt without further inquiry? Now, that was a question to which the hon. Member for West Cumberland, in introducing his opposition to the Bill, had never referred in any way. The hon. Member himself had never suggested that the proposed line of Railway would interfere in any respect whatever with the scenery of the district. That suggestion came entirely from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford. Unfortunately, he (Mr. Bentinck) had exhausted his power of addressing the House yesterday; he was unable to say a word in explanation, and that was the reason why he desired to do so on this occasion. He totally denied the suggestion that the line would in any way interfere with the scenery of the district, and it was a question for a Committee on that Bill to decide. It ought not to have been allowed to be raised in a mere harum scarum manner upon the ipse dixit of a single hon. Member. He, therefore, reiterated his statement that the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford was most unusual. But the matter did not rest there, because he found, to his great surprise, on going into the Lobby that there were with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford several Members of Her Majesty's Government—namely, the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), the President of the Local Government Board (Sir Charles W. Dilke), the political Under Secretary of the Board of Trade (Mr. J. Holms), and the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Lord Edmund Fitzmaurice), and he believed some others. He altogether protested against such conduct as this, for never during his Parliamentary experience had he seen anything of the kind. It was a principle of the House to give the promoters of such Bills an opportunity of being heard, and not to reject such a measure as this on the second reading on account of the personal grievance of any hon. Member. He desired to add that he was not one of the promoters of the Bill; but he knew the locality very well—no one better—and he was perfectly satisfied that it would not do any injury to the scenery. However, on behalf of the promoters of the Bill, he was authorized to say that they courted the fullest inquiry in every way; and therefore, on their behalf, he did not object to the Instruction which had now been moved.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN wished, before the Question was put, to ask whether there was any precedent of a similar Instruction? During the time that he had been in the House he had never heard of any Instruction of this kind being given to a Committee, and the House ought to be informed whether there was any precedent for the proposal now made?

MR. E. S. HOWARD said, there was a precedent in the case of the Manchester Corporation Water Bill. He believed that Clause 13 of the Bill required the Corporation of Manchester to enter into a certain undertaking in regard to making certain plantations, in order to prevent the scenery from being interfered with; and if they failed to comply with that provision, there was a power to take them before the Justices of the Peace.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON knew nothing of the Bill; but the hon. Member who moved the Instruction ought to say whether there was any likelihood of the scenery being destroyed, if it was not passed. They ought to have a distinct statement whether that was likely to be the case or not. He understood the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) to state that the promoters did not propose in any way to interfere with the scenery, and that they altogether disclaimed any intention of interfering with it.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that was perfectly correct.

MR. W. H. JAMES pointed out that there was an Instruction given to a Committee almost identical with the one which had been moved by the hon. Member for East Cumberland (Mr. E. S. Howard). It would be found that in the case of the Bill promoted by the Corporation of Manchester, which proposed to take certain portions of the Thirlmere Lake, an Instruction was given to the Committee to strike out the provisions of that Bill which might have the effect of destroying the scenery; and unless an Instruction of the same kind was given before the present Bill was sent to a Select Committee, it would be impossible for the Committee to consider the matter.

QUESTIONS.

THE AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT—STATISTICS.

MR. DUCKHAM asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the Agricultural Department will obtain returns in December showing the estimated produce of grain for the year, and the number of the different kinds of live stock in the Country at that period; and, if so, whether he will give instructions that the Report of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council, which is now only obtained on application, shall be circulated with the December Agricultural Returns?

MR. DODSON: I quite agree with my hon. Friend as to the importance of obtaining not only a Return of grain produce, but of produce of other kinds; and several years ago I publicly called attention to the fact that Great Britain is, as I believe, the only country possessing a civilized agriculture which is destitute of such Returns. Since the Agricultural Department has been established, Lord Carlingford and myself have had the whole matter under our most careful consideration. But to obtain reliable grain statistics—and if we are to have Government statistics, they must be reliable—it will be necessary for the Government to begin to collect them very much earlier in the year than December, and I can hardly say that we could this year obtain satisfactory Returns. As regards the other part of the Question, that of obtaining Returns of the different kinds of live stock in the country in December, I should like to be satisfied as to the advantage of obtaining a second census of animals in the course of a year, as it would involve troubling occupiers with a second set of Schedules. Before committing myself to that, I should like to assure myself that it will be worth the trouble and expense it would involve. With regard to the latter part of the Question, I think the Report of the Veterinary Department of the Privy Council might usefully be circulated when it is issued; but I will make inquiries and see what can be done.

VACCINATION LAWS (GERMANY).

DR. CAMERON asked the Secretary to the Local Government Board, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in "the Königliche Privilegirte Berlinische Zeitung," regarding certain tables recently issued by the German State Health Office, illustrating the working of the Vaccination Laws in Germany; and, whether he will have the goodness to procure a copy of the tables for the Library of the House?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: The attention of the Local Government Board had not previously been called to the tables referred to; but they have communicated with the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with a view to a copy being obtained for the Library of the House.

POST OFFICE (CONTRACTS)—MAILS TO MAURITIUS.

DR. CAMERON asked the Postmaster General, Whether a contract has been signed with the Mauritius Steamship Company, Limited, to run a line of steamers to carry mails between Aden, Réunion, Seychelles, and Mauritius; and, if so, when the contract will commence?

MR. FAWOETT: In reply to my hon. Friend, I may say that in September, 1881, an arrangement was entered into with the Mauritius Steamship Company, Limited, to carry mails by steamers which they announced their intention of running between Aden, Réunion, the Seychelles, and Mauritius; but after much delay, it was found a few weeks ago that the Company were not in a position to fulfil their engagement in a satisfactory manner, and notice was given them to consider the negotiations as at an end.

INDIA (BENGAL)—LAW AND JUSTICE —MR. BANERJEE.

MR. A. M'ARTHUR asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the Government have received Mr. Sundranath Banerjee's memorial, praying that the question of the legality of his committal for contempt of court should be referred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and, whether he has come to any decision in the matter?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Mr. Banerjee's Memorial has been received, and is under the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council at the present time.

DRAINAGE AND INLAND NAVIGATION (IRELAND)—DRAINAGE OF LOUGH NEAGH.

SIR RICHARD WALLACE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether the Government propose to take any action with respect to the drainage of Lough Neagh and the Lower Bann, having regard to the Report of the Royal Commission of 1880 on Inland Navigation, and to the deputations which recently waited on the Lord Lieutenant?

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he has seen the report of Mr. Barton, the eminent engineer, with regard to the drainage of Lough Neagh and the Lower Bann, and the resolution of the Grand Jury of the county of Londonderry founded on that report, passed at Spring Assizes 1883; whether he is aware that a large area of land on Lower Bann was taxed for drainage purposes for the benefit of lands on Upper Bann, which lands on Lower Bann are also taxed for navigation purposes both inland and to the sea, which taxation, to repay large expenditure, would be of much less advantage if the inland navigation were destroyed; and, whether the Government have decided upon the course they intend to pursue?

MR. COURTNEY: In answer to the hon. Baronets the Members for Lisburn and Coleraine, I have to say that Her Majesty's Government have been fully informed of the views held by the various districts and persons interested in the question connected with the River Bann. The second of these Questions well illustrates the conflicting character of the claims to be reconciled. The matter is one which should be settled by mutual agreement between the parties concerned; but with a view to suggesting a solution, the Government have ordered an immediate and careful survey of the Lower Bann, in the hope that it may be found practicable to alleviate the floods without destroying the navigation, to which some importance seems to be attached.

The numerous engineering schemes which have been forwarded will not fail to receive their due share of consideration before a decision is arrived at.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE REPUBLIC OF STELLALAND—MURDER OF MR. J. W. HONEY, A BRITISH SUBJECT, BY DUTCH BOERS.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of the Government has been called to the murder in February last by Dutch Boers, in the so-called "Republic of Stellaland," of Mr. J. W. Honey, a British subject; and, what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken, or propose to take, in order to secure the punishment of the murderers, who are well known?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The only news the Government has is that this man Honey was one of the freebooters in Bechuanaland, and that he has been murdered. He was proclaimed an outlaw by the Government of Stellaland. [Mr. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: What Government?] The self-constituted Government of Stellaland. The information we have is that his murderer is supposed to be a man named Ireland, who has come into Griqualand West, and the officer administering the Government there has issued a Commission under 26 & 27 Vict. c. 35, which is entitled an Act for the Prevention and Punishment of Offences committed by Her Majesty's Subjects in South Africa, under which, if evidence was forthcoming, the men would be arrested and tried.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I should like to ask whether we are to understand that Her Majesty's Government regard Honey as one of the freebooters of Bechuanaland? [Mr. EVELYN ASHLEY: Yes.] And, secondly, whether we were to understand from the answer that Her Majesty's Government recognized the so-called Republic of Stellaland, or the so-called Government of Stellaland?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: The only reason why I said anything about the self-constituted authorities of Bechuanaland is, that this murder was brought about because Honey had himself served up to that time as an ally, and then when he was proclaimed as an outlaw he was murdered by the people.

Mr. Courtney

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: But is it not a fact that the self-constituted authorities of Stellaland are the Dutch freebooters who deprived Montsoie and Mankoroane of their territories?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I believe the hon. Member is right.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: What we want is an explanation of the sort of Government that was established in Stellaland. We ought to have some clear notion of what it is, and if it was recognized in any way by Her Majesty's Government?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: It is a very simple matter. ["Oh, oh!"] I have been giving a narrative of facts. I cannot see what complication there is. The Government have had sent to them this proclamation of this so-called Republic, issued by a man called Niewkirk, styling himself President of the Provisional Republic of Stellaland, and Honey's name was mentioned as an outlaw, and soon after that he was murdered.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: What we want to know is the sort of people Her Majesty's Government have been corresponding with?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: You cannot say we have corresponded with them. The document was forwarded to us as a public document by the authorities.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CROWN LANDS BILL.

MR. W. H. JAMES asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he will undertake not to take the Committee stage upon the Crown Lands Bill at a time when the opponents of the Bill would not have time to state their objections previous to the Speaker leaving the Chair?

MR. COURTNEY: I believe the opposition to this Bill is, in reality, directed to a couple of clauses, and I would undertake not to take these clauses in Committee without due warning to those who opposed them. At this time of the Session, I must avail myself of any opportunity that offers to move that the Speaker leaves the Chair.

STATE-AIDED EMIGRATION TO THE UNITED STATES—IRISH EMIGRANTS.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any of the emigrants forwarded to America by Mr. Tuke's Committee were persons who had been inmates of the Belmullet Union Workhouse?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have applied to Dublin, and am informed that the authorities are in communication with Mr. Tuke; but that the right man for information is my hon. Friend the Member for Peterborough (Mr. S. Buxton), who has worked with such extraordinary and disinterested energy in the West of Ireland. He informs me that out of the 2,500 emigrated, with the circumstances of all of whom he made himself intimately acquainted, he knows but two families who had been in the Belmullet Workhouse. In one case the father, Henry Barrett, went out to his son at Rose Mountain, Wisconsin; he received £9 on landing in America, and my hon. Friend has heard from the son that the party have arrived safely, and are doing well. The other family went to Minnesota, and got £6 on landing. They left as long ago as March 30. There was, perhaps, a single woman besides; but my hon. Friend is pretty sure there were no more.

MR. O'BRIEN said, in reference to a previous reply of the right hon. Gentleman, that these persons were not ordered to be returned by the American Government on account of their poverty, he would like to ask him was it not a fact that the only money they had on landing was the £1 or so left after paying for their passage money, &c.; and he would like further to ask him whether any proposal would be made to the United States Emigration Commissioners to allow these unfortunate people to land, with some provision for their maintenance, instead of having them sent back again to the workhouse?

MR. TREVELYAN: In consequence of the suggestions of my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) last night, I have drafted a letter, the result of which will be that we shall ascertain whether the suggestions he made can be carried out. Until we obtain full information I shall be unable to inform the House on what grounds these poor people have been sent back. They are so few, and the circumstances are so very different, that I cannot but think that it is not a question of a few pounds, but that the United States authorities see something about them which make them not satisfactory settlers. It is impossible to say anything further just now.

MR. LEAMY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is the fact that some of the Irish emigrants whom the American Government have ordered to be sent back to Europe are coming back in a ship bound for Antwerp; and, if this is so, whether the Irish Government intend to send anyone to Antwerp to look after the returned emigrants, and to provide for them a passage to Ireland?

MR. TREVELYAN: I have requested the Foreign Office to ascertain how this matter stands. Her Majesty's Representative has been communicated with, and has been asked to watch carefully what are the steps taken in each individual case.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE — THE SHANNON TRUST.

MR. KENNY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If the Bill dealing with the Shannon Trust, and which was stated to be in the hands of the draughtsman some months ago, will be introduced this Session?

MR. COURTNEY: I am sorry to say that I must abandon the hope of introducing this Bill in the present Session. A Bill was drawn; but unexpected difficulties have presented themselves in working out the details, which I will do my best to settle in the Recess.

PETROLEUM ACTS—STORAGE OF PETROLEUM.

SIR EDWARD WATKIN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been directed to the storage of petroleum in and near the Metropolis; whether he is aware that at the present time there is stored at the seven wharves in the Metropolitan area 335,000 barrels, equal to 13,400,000 gallons, and that at one wharf alone on the Thames over 80,000 barrels, equal to 3,200,000 gallons, are stored, mostly in the open air, 15 to 20 feet above the level of the surrounding property, without any adequate protection to prevent inflammable material flowing into the river and neighbourhood in case of accident; whether such storage is under the control of either the Government, the Metropolitan Board of Works, or the Thames Conservancy; and, if the mode of storing has been sanctioned by the Home Office?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, this was, no doubt, a matter of great importance, but it was one in which the Secretary of State had absolutely no authority. The storage of petroleum was regulated by the Act of 1871. Under that Act the Secretary of State was not responsible in any way for the storage of petroleum, and had no official cognizance of the extent or condition of the storage in any particular locality, nor had he any authority in regard to the inspection of the stores. The storage was entirely controlled by licences granted by the local authority, which, in the Metropolitan area outside the City, and outside the jurisdiction of the Thames Conservancy, was the Metropolitan Board of Works. The high-test petroleum was not subject to any legislative restriction. It was only the more highly inflammable petroleum which was subject to any legislation whatever. The only authority the Secretary of State had was if a licence was refused to a trader he might appeal to the Secretary of State to enlarge his rights, but not restrict them. He had made inquiries as to the state of affairs, and the Metropolitan Board of Works had informed him that the figures given by the hon. Baronet were not very far from the mark; that the storage took place mainly in the open air; that in the case specially referred to in the Question the petroleum was surrounded by high embankments, which would prevent it flowing on to the adjacent lands or into the river. Control was only provided by the Act over petroleum which flashed at lower than 73 degrees. Samples were occasionally taken to test it in the stores; and it had been ascertained that out of 155 samples taken in the present year, not one flashed below 73 degrees. He confessed that he had long been of opinion that this was an unsatisfactory state of things. Some time ago he prepared a Bill on the subject of petroleum, and it was carefully considered, in conjunction with the scientific authorities of the Metropolitan Board. He need not say that he should be glad to introduce such a Bill; but it would not be possible to pass it through that House, for directly he put the Bill down it would be blocked. What he proposed to do was to introduce the Bill into the House of Lords, and to see what course was taken with regard to it by their Lordships, and afterwards, if possible, to bring it before the House of Commons.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked whether, a short time ago, the right hon. and learned Gentleman did not get a Dynamite Bill through both Houses in three hours?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Yes; and if the hon. Member can promise that I shall have the same facilities, I will endeavour to do the same with this Bill.

In reply to Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR,

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that petroleum was regulated by the Act of 1871.

MR. CALLAN asked whether it was a fact that the Home Secretary had been in Office three years, and had taken no measures to remedy the state of things that he had just confessed now existed? ["Order, order!"]

[No reply was given.]

THE IRISH BOARD OF WORKS— LOANS.

MR. KENNY asked the Secretary to the Treasury, If he is aware that Mr. Michael Quigley, of Knockjames, Tulla, county Clare, applied for a loan of £200 to the Irish Board of Works as far back as February 1880, but has not yet obtained it; if it is a fact that Mr. Quigley is owner in fee of the farm upon which he proposed to expend this money, and that he also gave two respectable farmers as sureties, but that he was informed by the Board of Works that they required "unquestionable security," and what is meant by "unquestionable security," whether it refers to repayment or application of loan, or both; if it is a fact that a sum of £1 13s. 4d. is now claimed by the Board of Works from Mr. Quigley as "preliminary expenses," besides his having to pay an engineer £2 10s.; and, if it is a fact that delays of this description are of common occurrence in the transaction of Board of Works business, and that preliminary charges are in all cases so exorbitant; and, if so, whether any steps will be taken to remedy these defects in the administration of so important a Department?

Sir Edward Watkin

MR. COURTNEY: Mr. Quigley applied for a loan in August, 1880, which, after due inquiry, was sanctioned in October of that year. In accordance with the Rules, he was called upon to name sureties for the due application of the money, not for the repayment of the loan. He first named a man whose security was not considered satisfactory; then, after a very long delay, he named a priest, who, however, was forbidden by ecclesiastical regulations to sign the bond; but at last, on the 18th of June, he named a sufficient surety, to whom the bond has been sent for execution. The first instalment will be issued as soon as the bond is returned. The preliminary expenses, for which £1 13s. 4d. will be deducted from the first instalment, are the cost of the advertisements required by law and of the registration. The Board of Works have no knowledge of the other payment mentioned.

DWELLINGS OF THE POOR— LEGISLATION.

MR. ASHMEAD - BARTLETT asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether the Government will give an opportunity this Session for a discussion upon the dwellings of the poor, and especially for the consideration of a scheme for the provision of houses with land and recreation ground in the rural suburbs of the large towns?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to this Question, I am bound to say that the Government could not engage, in the present state of Public Business, to set aside any other Business for the purpose of such a discussion, or I think I may say generally of any discussion, except that having regard to legislative measures which it is intended to proceed with during the present Session.

SUEZ SECOND CANAL — RUMOURED AGREEMENT WITH M. DE LESSEPS.

MR. BOURKE: I wish to ask a Question of the Government, which is of some urgency, and of which I gave private Notice to the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs about two hours ago. It is with regard to the following notice which appeared in the newspapers this morning:—

“The following Official Note, drawn up and signed by the Secretary of the Suez Canal Company, was yesterday posted up in their offices at Paris. It was previously submitted to the English Delegates for their approval:—‘The bases of the accord between the Suez Canal Company and the English Government being established, M. Ferdinand de Lesseps, in compliance with the express desire of Her Majesty’s Ministers, leaves for London with his son, M. Charles Aimé de Lesseps, for the consecration of that accord.—MARIUS FONTANE, Secretary General.’ ”

The Question I wish to ask is, whether it is true that Her Majesty’s Government have come to an agreement with the Suez Canal Company as to the point mentioned in the notice I have just read?

MR. GLADSTONE: The information that I have to give on the part of the Government is as follows. In the first place, M. Charles de Lesseps has actually arrived in London, and M. Ferdinand de Lesseps is expected in London this afternoon, and their arrival here is on the express invitation of Her Majesty’s Government—Her Majesty’s Government having thought that matters have reached a stage at which personal communication between the Chairman and the Vice Chairman of the Company and themselves will be conducive to a satisfactory settlement. The stage is this—that bases have been provisionally agreed upon, which gives, as we think, reasonable ground—I do not wish to go any further—for hope of arriving at a conclusion that may be satisfactory to all parties; but, of course, the engagement I previously gave of the arriving at no final conclusion without publicity still holds good.

MR. BOURKE: Can the right hon. Gentleman tell the House what those bases are?

MR. GLADSTONE: No advantage would arise from entering into that. We have not arrived at the point when that information could be given.

WESTERN ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC— THE NEW HEBRIDES—OCCUPATION BY FRANCE.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs a Question of which I have not been able to give Notice, Whether there is any truth in the report that the French have taken possession of the New Hebrides?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have received a private Notice of a similar Question from an hon. Member opposite. No information has been received at the Foreign Office; but I may say that it is probable that information would arrive in the first instance at the Colonial Office; and, having communicated with the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, I have his authority to state that no information on the subject has been received.

EGYPT—THE CHOLERA.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I wish to put another Question to the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government have offered or given any assistance to the Government of Egypt with a view to suppress the cholera; and, if so, what steps have been taken?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: If the House desires information as to the measures taken for the suppression of the cholera in Egypt, it would be better that I should give a short statement on that subject on Monday.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT asked whether, when he came to answer the Question on Monday, the noble Lord would be good enough to say whether there had been any increase in the number of deaths from cholera at Damietta and Mansourah; and, whether there had been any cases in the Egyptian Army or among English soldiers in Egypt?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The last figures I have received of the number of deaths are in a telegram from Mr. Cookson, at Alexandria—namely, the number of deaths from cholera on July 5—at Damietta, 109; Mansourah, 68; Samanoud, 10; Cherbin, 4; and Alexandria, 1; about which there was some doubt. As to the other part of the Question, we have not heard of any deaths from cholera in either the Egyptian or English Army.

WESTERN ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC—AUSTRALIAN COLONIES—ANNEXATION OF NEW GUINEA BY QUEENSLAND.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: In consequence of a reply that was made to a Question of mine yesterday, I beg to give Notice that I will, on the earliest opportunity, move the following Resolution:—

"That in view of the unanimous desire of Her Majesty's Australian Colonies for the establishment of a British Protectorate over New Guinea and the adjacent Islands, and the importance of Preventing any Foreign Power taking possession of these Islands, this House prays Her Majesty's Government to establish a Protectorate over them."

MR. CALLAN: In that case I give Notice that I shall ask whether the French have not just as much right to take possession of the New Hebrides as the English had to take possession of New Guinea?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: That is a matter of opinion which I could not answer.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES)

BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 5th July.]

[SIXTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Disqualification of Electors.

Clause 32 (List in register of voters of persons incapacitated for voting by corrupt or illegal practices &c.) agreed to.

Clause 33 (Notice of paid polling agent, &c. and preventing his voting).

MR. W. H. SMITH said, they were imposing, by this clause, an immense number of difficulties upon the candidate, as well as the Returning Officer and other persons engaged at elections. The enormous details involved in these operations would impose great labour upon these individuals, and could not fail in some cases to end in default. He thought it must be accepted that the object of the candidate and election agent was to conduct the election with due regard to the spirit of the law.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that there was an Amendment on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Brighton (Mr. Hollond), dealing with the first part of the clause; and, until that Amendment had been disposed of, the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman appeared to be premature.

MR. W. H. SMITH said, his sole object was to save the time of the hon. Gentleman opposite, and of the Committee, in discussing this clause. He had a strong impression that the multitude of details set forth would impair the efficiency of the measure; and if some of them could be got rid of, he believed it would be of the greatest advantage to the working of the Bill. He would like to see the clause withdrawn, for the purpose of reconsideration.

MR. J. HOLLOND said, he rose to move the Amendment standing in his name.

MR. CALLAN wished to put a question to the Chairman on a point of Order. [Cries of "Order!"]

THE CHAIRMAN said, there was no Question before the Committee.

MR. CALLAN said, he was about to propose an Amendment. It would be quite time enough for hon. Members to call him to Order when he had transgressed the Rules of the Committee; but he was perfectly within his right, and was, moreover, acquainted with the Bill, of which it appeared to him a good many Gentlemen opposite knew nothing.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the hon. Member must confine himself to the Amendment which he intended to propose.

MR. CALLAN said, there was a great difficulty already in counting the constituency even under the Ballot Act. Under the present Bill a candidate would have to appoint, under his own hand, a polling agent, a clerk, and messenger for every polling booth, who must make a statutory declaration before a magistrate, and whose appointment must be made by 8 o'clock in the morning. It would be impossible to carry out this portion of the Bill. Let the Committee consider for a moment the county of Cork, which was 70 miles in length, and see how it was possible for the provisions of the clause to be complied with. At the present day a candidate was bound to sign the appointment of every polling agent who entered the booth, and that agent must produce to the Returning Officer a statutory declaration as well as his appointment in writing. He believed that in the Universities of the country the candidate, relying on the discretion of his agents, signed these appointments in blank. He wished to have omitted from the clause the words which provided that the election agent should send to the Returning Officer before the day of the poll a list stating the name of every person appointed on behalf of the candidate to be a polling agent, clerk, or messenger, and specifying whether such person was paid or not. As to that part of the sub-section which required that the list should contain the description of every such person, and, where he was an elector, his number in the register of electors, that he admitted to be right and fair; but he foresaw the impossibility of handing to the Returning Officer before the day of the poll the name of every polling agent, clerk, or messenger. It would be utterly beyond the power of any candidate or his agent to comply with the requirements contained in the 1st sub-section. He was not speaking in any obstructive spirit; he was addressing himself, through the Chair, to the President of the Local Government Board particularly, because he knew that he was acquainted with the working of the Ballot Act, and was, therefore, aware of the enormous difficulties placed in the way of candidates in complying with the Act. Referring again to the county of Cork, he pointed out that there were 27 polling places, for every one of which the appointment of three separate individuals would have to be signed. Again, if it were possible to supply the names of the polling agents, clerks, and messengers to the Returning Officer, the election agent would be certainly unable to supply them to the candidate on the opposite side. He challenged any Member of the House, who was acquainted with the management of elections, to say that it was possible in any but the very smallest constituency—Portarlington, for instance—to comply with the requirements of the section. Nothing could possibly result from the clause but vexation and trouble; for instance, what was the use of sending in on the day before the poll a list containing all the details mentioned, and requiring that a copy of it should be sent to the agent of every other candidate, who would probably not receive it until 48 hours after the election? The clause imposed such enormous difficulties in the way of everyone engaged in the conduct of an election, and it was, moreover, so unnecessary, that he believed the mere statement of the case to the Attorney General would secure the alteration which he desired. At present, a candidate had simply to appoint a polling agent, clerk, and messenger, and send in their names with the statutory declaration to the Returning Officer; but if a personation agent were appointed, not only his name, but his address must be given. He thought it would be an improvement of the present law if a candidate, or his election agent, were compelled to give the name as well as the address of the persons employed at the polling booth; but he could not agree to the proposal to place upon the candidate and his agent conditions with which it was utterly impossible to comply. He, therefore, proposed to leave out the words "before the day of the poll."

MR. J. HOLLOND said, that, in that case, his Amendment would take precedence of that of the hon. Member. He, therefore, begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed, in page 19, line 17, after the word "officer," to insert the words "one clear day."—(Mr. J. Hollond.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was always ready to listen to suggestions coming from any Members of the Committee. As persons employed as polling agents, messengers, and clerks were disqualified from voting, it was necessary that some information should be given as to the persons employed in the manner specified by the clause. He was prepared to consider whether, within a reasonable time after the election, there might not be a Return made with regard to these persons; and with that object he was willing to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. W. H. Smith) to withdraw the clause.

MR. CALLAN said, the Amendment put down by the hon. Member for Brighton was an instance of the complete ignorance of Members of that House with respect to the actual working of elections. One might take a morning stroll over the whole constituency represented by the hon. Member; but it would take a day and a-half to go over his constituency, and probably a week to cover the county in which it was situated.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. ONSLOW said, before the clause was withdrawn, he wished to point out the impossibility of complying with its provisions, so far as related to giving to the Returning Officer the names of persons from whom committee rooms were hired on behalf of the candidate. It might be possible in the case of a room taken from one individual; but how, in the case of an Association, would it be possible to give a description of every one of, say, 15 Directors? If words were introduced into the Bill which would render it unworkable, it was necessary that the Committee should take some steps to guard against such consequences.

MR. TOMLINSON asked whether it was worth while to disqualify a person properly employed at an election? He believed that about an equal number were employed on both sides, and in that case their votes would have no influence on the result of the election.

MR. WARTON said, that throughout the Bill the Government had introduced a number of cumbersome and unworkable provisions. In assenting to the withdrawal of the clause, he hoped it would not be understood that there was any agreement on the part of the Committee to these small details. He trusted that when the new clause came forward they would not be told that they had already assented to something of the same sort. For his own part, he protested against these miserable and petty reservations.

Clause negatived.

Proceedings on Election Petition.

Clause 34 (Time for presentation of election petitions, alleging illegal practice, 31 & 32 Vict. c., 125).

MR. MACFARLANE said, that the Committee had already agreed to a reduction of five days, and the result was that the number of days during which a Petition might be presented now stood at 39. The Attorney General knew that, under the present law, the time for petitioning was limited to 20 days; and he (Mr. Macfarlane) had not heard that any sufficient cause had been shown for doubling or even trebling that period. He would point out to the Attorney General that if the 21 days specified in the 1st sub-section of this clause were maintained, it would be possible for the person petitioned against to sit and vote for nearly two months in that House without having the right to do either the one or the other. He should, therefore, feel it his duty to press the Amendment he was about to propose, unless the Attorney General would give some sufficient reason for this enlargement of the time in which a Petition might be presented. He thought the proposal in the 1st sub-section was unreasonable, because Petitions were always based upon some act which had taken place at the election, and not upon anything connected with the question of accounts. He understood that if the expenses of an election exceeded the amount which was named in the Schedule, the seat of the candidate would be ipso facto lost. He asked that a reduction of the period of suspense during which a Petition might be sent in should take place, because he did not want to facilitate or assist those electoral Micawbers who were always on the watch for something to turn up against a candidate. Without detaining the Committee any longer, he begged to move that the number of days specified in the sub-section be reduced to seven.

Amendment proposed, in page 20, line 29, to leave out the word "twenty-one," and insert the word "seven."—(Mr. Macfarlane.)

MR. CROPPER said, he thought it would be better to reduce the number of days specified.

MR. WARTON said, it seemed to him they were departing from the existing rule, which required a Petition to be presented within a certain number of days of one definite starting point—namely, the day on which the candidate was returned. This system would be attended, in his opinion, with several curious and objectionable results. He, therefore, opposed the departure from the existing practice.

MR. CALLAN pointed out that in Ireland a Petition had to be presented within 28 days after the Return had been lodged in the hands of the Returning Officer. That system had been found to work satisfactorily, and, as far as he was aware, no complaint had ever been made against it. Why, then, did the Government propose to prolong this period of agony from 28 to 56 days? For his own part, he thought the proposed number of days too many. It might be alleged, in favour of the Government proposal, that the Petition might be dependent on the amount of the election expenses returned; but he thought the election agent would be a great fool who should make a Return of expenses upon which a Petition could be founded. If they gave the candidate an opportunity of making a Return before the Petition was lodged, they held out to him a great inducement for manufacturing a Return. He thought it better to keep to the period of 28 days, which had already worked well.

MR. RYLANDS said, this was not a question which required to be argued at very great length. He thought that while sufficient time should be given for presenting a Petition, hon. Members did not desire that it should be prolonged beyond what was absolutely necessary. If, to the 35 days already provided, they added seven days, as proposed by the hon. Member for Carlow (Mr. Macfarlane), there would result 43 days during which time a Petition might be presented. That was considerably more than the time at present allowed, and he should be glad if the Attorney General could see his way to agree to the suggestion.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he considered that the period of 43 days was unnecessarily long. Nevertheless, he hoped the Attorney General would agree to the Amendment of the hon. Member.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) pointed out that an offence affecting the election might occur on a false Return being made, and it was for that reason the Government took that offence as their starting point in the present case.

MR. LEWIS said, that it was evident that many hon. Members, having assisted the Government in making the Bill as binding and stringent as possible, now wanted to find some means of escaping from it. The seven days proposed by the hon. Member for Carlow would be insufficient, because longer time would be required for the examination of Returns and the consultation with solicitors and counsel in order to be assured that a Petition would lie. Therefore, he said, that if any useful alteration were to be made of the number of days specified in the sub-section, it would be necessary that at least 10 or 14 days should be allowed from the day on which the Returning Officer received the Return, within which a Petition might be presented.

MR. RAIKES said, as he read the clause, it related only to Petitions founded upon illegal practices, and he gathered that it was intended to leave the law with regard to corrupt practices in the same state as they found it.

MR. GORST pointed out that the time proposed was practically eight weeks, because it was exclusive of Sundays. If the Government would reduce this to seven weeks he thought they would be making an acceptable concession.

MR. ONSLOW said, that if, as his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) had pointed out, it were necessary, in the case of Irish elections, to send up to Dublin to examine accounts and consult solicitors and counsel, it would be so because a scrutiny was required by the unsuccessful candidate. He asked whether all those expenses were to come into the maximum fixed by the Schedule?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) pointed out that, under the existing law, a Petition on the ground of corrupt practices would have to be presented within 21 days after the election.

MR. MACFARLANE said, although he considered 42 days quite long enough for a Petition to be hanging over the head of a Member, yet he was entirely in the hands of the Attorney General, and as he had been asked to accept 14 days he was willing to do so.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 20, line 29, to leave out the word "twenty-one," and insert the word "fourteen."
—(Mr. Macfarlane.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. CALLAN said, he hoped he should get the assistance of the Attorney General and the President of the Local Government Board in moving the Amendment standing in the name of his hon. Friend the Member for Tipperary (Mr. Mayne). The next subsection said—

"If the election petition specifically alleges a payment of money, or some other act to have been made or done since the said day by the member or an agent of the member, or with the privity of the member or his election agent in pursuance or in furtherance of the illegal practice alleged in the petition, the petition may be presented at any time within twenty-eight days after the date of such payment or other act."

Now, if the acts referred to did not come to the knowledge of the Petitioner until after the time specified he would be precluded by the clause from presenting a Petition. But he thought that if any payment had been made, or act done, in deliberate contravention of the Act, that a Petition should be presented at any time, and not within 28 days after it came to the knowledge of the Petitioner. During his own candidature, he was in his sitting room at 12 o'clock on the night preceding the day of election; some sand was thrown up to the window; and a person whom he had never seen before came to the window and said—"Mr. Callan, you will certainly be beaten by a majority of 50; but if you will promise me £500, I promise you that you shall be returned by that majority." He did not, of course, yield to the temptation, and he was defeated by the exact majority named by this interesting stranger. He knew since then that £500 had been paid to this person to corrupt the electors of the borough, which was one of the most rotten in Ireland. Now, he asked, why he should be precluded from petitioning in that case after even a lapse of 12 months? The fact that the money had been paid did not reach his ears until six months afterwards. He saw no reason whatever for precluding him from presenting a Petition, because he could not get the necessary proof within the prescribed 28 days. The proposal of the Government was equivalent to placing a premium on the concealment of illegal practices for the time specified. He appealed to the Committee to say whether it was not giving an absolute bill of indemnity for any illegal practices that could be kept secret for 28 days after they were committed? For these reasons, he begged to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Mayne).

Amendment proposed, in page 20, line 38, to leave out the words "twenty-eight days," and insert the words "twelve months."—(Mr. Callan.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped the hon. Member for Louth would not press this Amendment. All that the hon. Member had stated with respect to corrupt practices was not touched by the clause. The law at present was that within 28 days after the election the Petition might be sent in. Some short Statute of Limitation was absolutely necessary, and the time fixed in the sub-section appeared to the Government to be reasonable.

MR. CALLAN said, it was professed by the Government that their wish was to put down corrupt and illegal practices by this Bill. But why did the Bill give an indemnity to a man guilty of illegal practices, provided he was able to conceal them for 28 days after he had committed them? He would abide by the Amendment he had moved, and he must say that it did not look very well for the pure intentions of the Government to place a premium on the concealment of illegal practices for 28 days.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 215; Noes 5: Majority 210.—(Div. List, No. 179.)

Amendment proposed, in page 21, line 5, after the word "section," to insert the word "first."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 35 (Withdrawal of election petition).

MR. H. H. FOWLER proposed to omit Section 4, considering the penalty too severe for what might be, under some circumstances, a trivial offence. He would not go into the matter now; but he hoped the Attorney General would, before Report, consider whether he could modify the penalty.

Amendment proposed, in page 21, line 40, to leave out Sub-section (4).—(Mr. H. H. Fowler.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section (4) stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, men were punished for misdemeanour, and it was therefore important, if possible, to stop this practice, which prevailed to a great extent in former times. The punishment proposed was a maximum punishment; but if the Amendment were withdrawn he would consider the matter.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, it might, no doubt, be advisable to mitigate this penalty, for if it was made too severe there would be great danger of another evil which was more serious than this—namely, arrangements before elections that no Petition should be presented on either side.

MR. ONSLOW suggested that after a Petition had been lodged it should be held to be the duty of the Petitioners to proceed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that was the law at present, for a Petition could not be withdrawn without the leave of the Judge, either for some special reason, or for want of sufficient evidence.

MR. LEWIS said, it was notorious that the law as it stood had been evaded. It had been evaded in the present Parliament. Cases were perfectly well known, and, therefore, what was the use of the Committee passing a clause of this most stringent and violent character—hard labour for withdrawal? The withdrawal of a Petition was not theft, and it was no offence in itself. The Committee had better not incumber the Report too much, for there were very many questions left for the Report. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton started hares, and immediately chopped their heads off. He did not understand the object of making suggestions, and then withdrawing them. This was a very important matter. He could remember the time when it was a common practice for Representatives of both sides to meet and withdraw Petitions against each other. That was within the past 25 years; but it was no longer legal. But were they going to send men to prison with hard labour for doing what Members of that House had done—namely, come to an understanding, and then announce the vacation of the seat? There should be some reasonable punishment; but nothing so stringent and violent as this. He should support the Amendment, unless the penalty was reduced to moderate dimensions; and if the Amendment was withdrawn he should then propose to reduce the punishment to simple imprisonment by striking out the words "with or without hard labour," and give an alternative of a fine of £1,000. He did not approve of the withdrawal of Petitions; but what he urged was that there ought to be some relation between the character of the offence and the extent of the punishment. Unless the Attorney General would modify the penalty he should support the Amendment.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he thought the hon. Member did not realize that the country was getting purer and purer every year in regard to elections. He would suggest to the Attorney General, if he reconsidered this matter upon Report, that he should go a little further. This clause only dealt with the withdrawal of Petitions; but surely the Attorney General was aware that very often there was a corrupt practice in regard to the withdrawal of a candidature. A candidate often came forward, and, on receiving his expenses, withdrew his candidature. He should be glad if the Attorney General would add something to deal with that sort of thing.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, that with regard to his starting hares and chopping their heads off, his object was to save time. He did not object to the principle of this sub-section at all, but simply to the excessive penalty it imposed on minor as well as major offences; and as the Attorney General had promised to consider the matter he thought it was the most practical course to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed, in page 22, lines 7 and 8, to leave out the words "with or without hard labour."—(Mr. Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was in the hands of the Committee in respect to this matter; but he would accept the Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. ONSLOW said, he had an Amendment to propose, and did not wish to occupy the time of the Committee; but he was dead against hurrying this Bill through, whatever the period of the Session, for it was one which might affect every Member, and ought, therefore, to have the most careful consideration. He thought the penalty under this clause a great deal too severe, and should move to reduce the term of imprisonment from 12 to 6 months.

Amendment proposed, in page 22, line 8, to leave out the word "twelve," and insert the word "six."—(Mr. Onslow.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'twelve' stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not think he was open to the charge of having rushed the Bill through Committee. With regard to the Amendment, he had already given way to what he thought was the reasonable proposition of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis); but he could not consent to minimize the punishment too much, and he hoped the Committee would allow him to adhere to the term in the clause.

Amendment negatived.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF wished to know why the Director of Public Prosecutions was to be appointed with the approval of the Attorney General? He thought that was a bad Proviso, for it would give a political colour to the whole matter. He would move the omission of that Proviso pro formd, in order to hear the explanation of the Attorney General.

Amendment proposed, in page 22, line 14, to leave out the words "appointed with the approval of the Attorney General."—(Sir H. Drummond Wolff.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that personally he should be glad if this duty did not devolve upon himself; but at present the Director of Public Prosecutions acted in all cases under his direction. There must be some sort of supervision, and by the method proposed there would be a double check on the appointment. The Director of Public Prosecutions would have the right of selection; and if the person selected were a fit and proper person the Attorney General would never object to him; but by this mode there would be a double check. At present the Election Commissioners were appointed by the Attorney General.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN agreed with the hon. Member that there was too much of this Attorney General law-making.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD said, he hoped the words would be retained, as they would provide Parliamentary responsibility.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he thought it very invidious for the Attorney General to have this power.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had now to appoint all the officials that went down to an election trial; and they were subject to the approval of Parliament.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 36 (Attendance of Director of public prosecutions on trial of election petition, and prosecution by him of offenders).

MR. H. B. SAMUELSON moved to insert in page 24, line 26, after "approve," the words—

"Provided always, That such barrister or solicitor shall not be connected by birth or residence, or in any other manner, with the constituency in which the election petition is being tried."

He proposed this in the interest of the public confidence in the officer sent to represent the Director of Public Prosecutions, and that he might be above a breath of suspicion; and hoped the Attorney General would either accept the Amendment, or provide some other safeguard against any doubt being entertained in the locality as to the perfect impartiality of the barrister or solicitor selected.

Amendment proposed,

In page 24, line 26, after the word "approve," to insert the words—"Provided always, That such barrister or solicitor shall not be connected by birth or residence, or in any other manner, with the constituency in which the election petition is being tried."—(Mr. H. B. Samuelson.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. LEWIS said, that when hon. Members proposed Amendments they should understand the construction of clauses. The words "connected in any other manner" would cover the whole range of the world's history, and the universal connection of mankind.

MR. H. B. SAMUELSON said, he should not object to the words "in any other manner" being withdrawn, if that would satisfy the hon. Member for Londonderry, who always appeared to think that if any other Member than himself proposed an Amendment he must have some interested motive; and that when bos locutusest—giving the first word in an American sense—when he had given his judgment upon the matter there was nothing more to be said. If the Attorney General thought nothing of this sort could be done he would withdraw the Amendment; but, at the same time, he thought some such Proviso should be inserted.

MR. CALLAN suggested that baptism certificates and vaccination certificates should be required; and said it was very refreshing to find the hon. Member rebuking the hon. Member for Londonderry, who probably knew more about the subject than all the hon. Members opposite, including the bumptious Member for Banbury.

MR. H. B. SAMUELSON expressed the hope that decency would be preserved in the debate; and he would ask the Chairman whether it was in Order to describe a Member as the "bumptious Member for Banbury?" The remark did not apply to him, because he did not represent Banbury; and entirely in the interests of Order he called the Chairman's attention to the remark.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member will, I am sure, feel the propriety of withdrawing the expression.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL asked whether it was Parliamentary to call the hon. Member for Londonderry a "boss."

THE CHAIRMAN: I am not called upon to give an opinion upon the word. I am not aware that it is an English word.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I am sure every one of us wishes to proceed as we have hitherto. I appeal to the hon. Member for Louth to withdraw the words he had used, which are liable to be misunderstood.

MR. CALLAN said, that when the hon. Member withdrew the offensive term he had applied to the hon. Member for Londonderry, he would withdraw his words, but not until then.

MR. LEWIS said, he did not feel in any way insulted; on the contrary, he regarded it as a highly classical allusion, of which a man might be proud.

[Sixteenth Night.]

MR. H. B. SAMUELSON said, he meant it in that sense.

MR. CALLAN said, he meant his observations in the same sense.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GIBSON moved to omit words in the clause, in order to protect localities from having all the expenses put upon them, if the Director of Prosecutions should ask a single question of a witness.

Amendment proposed, in page 24, line 36, to leave out all the words from "if" to "or" in line 38.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Amendment agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON said, the subject with which this clause dealt was one to which he had given some time and attention. The evident intention of this clause was the prevention of the suppression of evidence, which had often occurred in the past. That was a very intelligible object; but he thought the framer of the clause had hardly seen the whole bearing it would have on Election Petitions. If agreed to as it stood, it would have a great effect in discouraging Election Petitions; and as an Election Petition was an initial step to the full exposure of electoral impurity, any stumbling block in the way of a Petition must assist the extension of electoral impurity and illegalities. The reason why a defeated candidate petitioned against his rival was that he wanted the seat for himself, or desired another election, at which he might hope to gain the seat. They could not expect people to petition on the high moral ground of exposing electoral impurity; and it was certain that no Petitioner would take upon himself all the trouble and expense, and odium and wear and tear connected with a Petition, if he thought that so much electoral impurity would be exposed that a Commission would follow upon the Petition. He would wish to unseat his adversary, but not to show sufficient reason for the Commission reporting the prevalence of extensive corrupt practices. If it was thought likely that the Director of Prosecutions would produce evidence against the Petitioner and his friends, great pressure would be put upon the defeated candidate not to present a Petition; and so the clause would discourage bond fide Petitions. At the same time, he thought it was likely to encourage frivolous Petitions, because many persons, not having sufficient evidence themselves, would petition on the chance of the Director of Prosecutions discovering sufficient evidence to unseat the Member. Therefore, he thought the clause had better be omitted. Later on he should propose an Amendment to abolish what was at present a great discouragement to the production of evidence—namely, the fear of disfranchisement, as he believed that would be the best way of meeting the difficulty.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, this provision was founded on the recommendations of the Committee of 1875; but, in some respects, it did not go so far as those recommendations. It was pointed out by evidence before that Committee that one of the great evils was that, although evidence came out before an election tribunal showing that persons had been guilty of corrupt practices, in consequence of which a Member was unseated, the very people who had committed corrupt practices, as a rule, suffered no punishment. All their malpractices might be exposed, but they went entirely free; and it was felt by the Committee to be desirable to let all persons know that if an Election Petition came about there would probably be proceedings against everyone concerned. At all events, in making a clause of this kind they had acted upon the strong recommendations of the Committee, who went fully into the subject. He thought that the fear of what might happen to individuals who indulged in corrupt practices would be found to have a very beneficial result.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, his great hope was that the Government would persevere in the clause, adopting the provision of the Bill to the altered circumstances of the electoral system.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL said, that for a great part of the Session he had been engaged in one of the Standing Committees in the House, and on that Committee there had been constant allusions made to the Public Prosecutor.

Mr. Lewis

He was glad to know that the Attorney General had found some use for the Public Prosecutor; and he trusted that this official would, in future, do good and useful work.

MR. RYLANDS said, it appeared to him that this was one of the most valuable clauses of the Bill. They ought to take care, now that candidates were to be liable to such heavy penalties, that men who committed illegal offences, thus endangering the position of the candidate, should also be severely punished. What had been the state of affairs hitherto? Why, clearly that Election Judges had looked upon these inquiries as most disagreeable duties; they had sat, perhaps, for a day or two, then a case had been proved of corruption; agency had been accepted, by the Judge stating that he considered agency proved; and at once the counsel on each side put their heads together, and absolutely crushed inquiry, and although there had been persons far more guilty than the candidate they had got off scot free. That clause would be one which would bring under punishment a number of people who ought to be punished; and he trusted it would have a deterrent effect upon the people who, at election times, were only too prone to break the law.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 37 (Power to Election Court to order payment by county or borough or individual of costs of election petition).

MR. SALT moved the omission, pro forma, of Sub-section (2). The effect of this section would be that the Court might, if it thought fit, order a person found guilty of corrupt practices to pay the whole or any part of the costs of the proceedings before the Court. Now, under previous sections they knew that a man guilty of corrupt practices was liable to imprisonment and to fine, as well as to certain civil disabilities. That sub-section created another penalty to which he might be liable. He (Mr. Salt), not being a lawyer, was, perhaps, not a person very competent to understand the details of this matter; but it seemed to him that, in addition to suffering all the other penalties, a man might be condemned to pay the whole costs of an Election Petition. He did not know whether that was meant or not; but, certainly, it was a proper inference from the marginal note—namely—

“Power to Election Court to order payment by county or borough or individuals of costs of election petition.”

Of course, with regard to counties and boroughs, there were, no doubt, cases in which a community should be charged with the costs of the Petition. But, with regard to individuals, he thought ignorant persons like himself had a claim to know pretty clearly what was intended.

Amendment proposed, in page 25, to leave out Sub-section (2).—(Mr. Salt.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Amendment. In the case of a perfectly innocent candidate, it was strictly unfair that he should be called upon to bear the costs of proceedings occasioned by the corruption of a constituency in which he played not the slightest part whatever. Again, if a person, against the will of the candidate, corrupted a constituency, why should he not bear the costs of the inquiry, either wholly or in part? He thought many hon. Members would consider it very unjust that a poor candidate should pay thousands of pounds for that which he had endeavoured to prevent, while the man who committed the offence should not be required to pay a single farthing. Sub-section 2 was very simple. It simply provided that if a man should himself have committed an offence of a corrupt or an illegal practice he might be called upon by the Court to pay the costs of, or incidental to, any proceeding in respect of the said offence. It was only so far as this particular act was concerned that it was intended he should bear the costs of the inquiry.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. H. H. FOWLER proposed to add a few words to this clause to remedy a great grievance. He cordially agreed with the former part of the clause to which the Attorney General had just adverted; and he thought the Committee would quite understand the force of the Amendment he was now about to move, especially when he had troubled them with a few figures. The first case which he would bring under the notice of the Committee was one in which the Attorney General was involved, and even victimized. The Committee would be surprised to learn that the costs of the Taunton Petition amounted to no less than £9,822; and his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, although he had his costs allowed, was, nevertheless, compelled to put his hands in his pocket and pay out something like £2,000. At Stroud there were three or four contested elections within six months of one another. According to the Report of the Committee, the costs of the first Petition amounted to £5,144; and the costs of the second Petition were, as nearly as could be ascertained, £6,889; the costs of the third amounted to £12,000; and the costs of the fourth Petition were £5,155 on the one side, and £6,624 on the other, making a total of something like £12,000. What he proposed to do was to put an end to this scandal by providing that a man petitioning against an election, and alleging that corrupt practices had been committed, and the Member defending his seat should be placed on the same footing, as if an action had been brought in the Superior Court, and the costs should be taxed on the same scale. He did not think he need trouble the Committee with any further remarks on this point; and he would, therefore, content himself by moving to add at the end of the clause—

[Sixteenth Night.]

“(3.) The rules and regulations of the Supreme Court of Judicature with respect to costs to be allowed in actions, causes, and matters assigned to the Queen’s Bench Division of the High Court shall apply to the costs of petition and other proceedings under ‘The Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868,’ and under this Act, and the taxing officer shall not allow any costs, charges, or expenses that would not be allowed in an action in the Queen’s Bench Division on the higher scale.”

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he intended to ask the Attorney General a few questions on this matter; because, although they would all agree with the principle of the Amendment, he was not at all clear in his own mind as to the extent to which it was possible to carry it out. He had always heard, although he spoke from imperfect information, that one of the main reasons for excessive costs of Petitions was the change of venue; in fact, trial on the spot had proved more expensive than trial at Westminster. Why was this? Because of the enormous fees that it had been found necessary to pay for the experienced and able counsel who were engaged to support the Petition or defend the seat. His own impression was that there were many expenses which really depended upon the wish of both sides to the Petition to obtain the best possible professional assistance in the conduct of their case, and that, whatever rules they might make, that feeling would still guide the parties to an extent far greater than in the case of an ordinary suit in the Superior Court. If that be so, might not the Amendment result in this — that, although the taxed costs would be smaller than now, the costs beyond the taxed costs which would have to be met by the unfortunate person who was unjustly attacked, and in favour of whom costs might have been given, would be found greater than now? If this were so, the Amendment of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler) would be entirely defeated, and the future state of things would be worse than the past.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there was not the slightest doubt that in consequence of the change of venue the costs of election inquiries had increased very much. In the one case they had to bring witnesses to London, and in consequence of that fact fewer witnesses, no doubt, appeared. On the other hand, inasmuch as great interests were involved for the county, or the constituency, or for the borough in question, it was very natural the parties wished to have the best legal advice they could get. He knew no part of professional duty which required as great tact as the conducting of election inquiries. Take the case of a man whose honour was involved, and whose position in the House of Commons was at stake. He naturally got the best legal advice to be had, and, if he could, would secure the services of the most skilled attorney, and the most eminent counsel. These professional gentlemen had to break off the continuity of their professional practice in London; and in consequence of having to separate themselves from their ordinary practice, for weeks and sometimes for months, they would not undertake the support or defence of Election Petitions, unless they received extremely large fees. That would continue, do as they would. A solicitor would not leave his London business, and a counsel would say he would not go unless he was properly compensated. The client would, therefore, be deprived of the counsel's services, and, in all probability, would have to obtain inferior advice. [Cries of "Both sides!"] He admitted that both sides would, in such a case, have to put up with inferior advice; but it would be really leaving justice to take its chance. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler) seemed to be labouring under some mistake. At present the cost of an Election Petition were taxed under the Act of 1868. The Amendment would, no doubt, result in lessening the costs between party and party to some extent; but it could not prevent a client making a special arrangement, under which he would have to pay certain given sums for counsel, for instance. He believed the hon. Gentleman the Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory)—who represented the Law Society—had been consulted on this matter, and that he was of opinion that there was no objection to the Amendment. He (the Attorney General) was sure his Profession would be glad to make any sacrifice which would tend to lessen the extravagant cost of Election Petitions, and he thought that they might accept this Amendment as a step in the right direction.

MR. GREGORY said, he had had no opportunity of consulting his Colleagues in the Law Institution; but, personally, he approved of the Amendment. The Amendment would not interfere with the employment of the best counsel, as, no doubt, the taxing master would take a reasonable view of the Act, and allow higher than the usual fees for the counsel retained. The Amendment was certainly a step in the right direction, although it might not have any extensive operation.

MR. LEAMY said, he was glad the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was prepared to accept the Amendment. The hon. and learned Gentleman in his speech appeared to defend the charging of heavy fees by eminent counsel. Eminent counsel, of course, had a right to get as much as they could; but the Committee must recollect that one of the objects of this Bill was to cheapen elections. What would be the good of allowing a poor man to get elected cheaply, if as soon as he was elected a rich man could bring an action against him, and involve him in very heavy costs? He (Mr. Leamy) hoped that in future there would never be such a scandal as one Election Petition costing as much as £12,000.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF urged upon the Committee the necessity of taking this question into serious consideration. It would be frequently found that men would get together a few hundred pounds to enable them to pay the expenses of an election; but then a rich man, who, perhaps, had been beaten in the election itself, might bring a Petition against the successful candidate, drive him out of the field, and get elected himself. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) knew a gentleman who many years ago was elected by his fellow-citizens in a Cornish borough. He was most fairly elected; but a Petition was brought against him, and he afterwards stated in that House that he knew he would have succeeded in the Petition if he had gone before the Committee, but that he could not bear the expenses even of a successful Petition. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth (Mr. E. Clarke) had upon the Paper a clause which would be to restrict the power of Petitions; and he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) hoped that that clause might be favourably received by the Government. The case could be conceived of a rich man saying—"I will allow a poor man to get elected, but will bring a Petition against him, in which he will be unable to bear the costs." A poor man's friends might be willing to advance him a few hundred pounds necessary to contest a constituency; but he would not be able to get his friends to assist him in defending a Petition. He hoped the Attorney General would either propose some method himself, or would accept, more or less, the fresh clause the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Plymouth intended to bring on, by which the power of petitioning might be limited. He was convinced that, although they might have the best intentions in the world, without some such restricting clause their good intentions would be nullified.

[Sixteenth Night.]

MR. LEWIS questioned whether the Amendment would, in the least degree, affect one of the greatest items of expense in connection with Election Petitions—namely, the fees given to the eminent counsel who were retained. When the House of Commons surrendered its right to try Election Petitions, it had to make a choice between the convenient and less expensive trials up here, and the long weary trials in the locality concerned. Probably by trials in the constituency itself they arrived at the truth more easily; but great sacrifices were necessitated. Both sides at an Election Petition desired to retain the best counsel that could be got. Now, there was a Trades Union among the Members of the Bar; the late Sir Henry Jackson always described the Bar as a Trades Union. All the leading counsel who used to go to Election Petitions made a bargain amongst themselves that they would never go for less than 200 guineas for the first day, and a refresher of 50 guineas for every subsequent day. He (Mr. Lewis) would not say that that was an unreasonable arrangement to make amongst themselves; but he desired the Committee to understand the real difficulty in this matter. He (Mr. Lewis) had himself put an Amendment on the Paper to this clause. He believed the clause would turn out to be as impractical as many other parts of the Bill, and his Amendment was simply to test the opinion of the Committee upon the matter. He considered that it was no use supposing that they could narrow the costs of an Election Petition by this clause. The two greatest items of expense were counsel's fees and payment to witnesses. If this clause were passed, the solicitor who had to conduct the Petition would say to his client—"Do you wish to have Mr. Sergeant Buzfuz? Because, if you do, you will be required to pay him so-and-so." Whatever arrangement was come to between the counsel and client as to fees, no taxing master could touch. Now, with regard to witnesses. They were, by the Court of Queen's Bench scale, allowed so much a day; but a solicitor would say to his client—"Such and such a person cannot be depended upon, so you must allow me to be more liberal with them." If a client gave special instructions respecting certain witnesses, the taxing master could not interfere in the matter. There was no doubt that this Bill would leave the greatest anomaly and scandal behind—namely, the great cost of Election Petitions; and he did not see how they were going in any way to diminish this cost. Although he was prepared to support the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler), he could not but believe that its effect would be nil.

MR. H. H. FOWLER denied that counsels' fees were the largest items of expense in Election Petitions. For instance, in the Stroud case out of £5,155, the total costs of one of the parties, the counsel's fees amounted to £1,820. If a man engaged first-class men he must pay for them. What he (Mr. Fowler) proposed to do was to interfere with the unlimited discretion of election agents to employ whom they liked at enormous fees. Personally, he considered there were many members of the Junior Bar quite as competent to conduct Election Petitions as the most eminent counsel. He was fully persuaded the Amendment he proposed was a step in the right direction.

MR. STANTON said, it was quite true that the costs of the Petitions which were heard in his own borough (Stroud) were very excessive; but he could not see in what way they could have been reduced. Eminent counsel were engaged, and therefore eminent fees were paid. In Stroud the expenses of the witnesses, and the long time which the trial lasted, were two of the chief causes of the great expenditure. The expenses of witnesses in election trials were necessarily large, because it was impossible to know what course the proceedings might take; it was quite impossible to know in what order the witnesses would be called. Hon. Members who had had much to do with Petitions knew full well the way in which they were got up; it was well known how every minor act of bribery was sought after. It struck him that the only way to reduce the enormous expenditure in Election Petitions was to do a very simple thing, and that was not to allow anyone whose hands were not clean to reap advantage from a Petition. He believed that if the Bill contained some such provision a stop would be put to many Petitions. He felt that if in the cases at Stroud the Petitioner had known that his own conduot would have been inquired into by the Court, instead of there being four Petitions there would only have been one.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, there appeared to be no doubt that the Amendment went in the right direction. There did, however, exist considerable doubt as to how far it did go. The evidence given in the Stroud case went to show that the larger part of the costs consisted of something very like treating; and he could not see how, by the Amendment, this large item of expenditure would be stopped. He was informed that if one of the parties to the Petition gave written authority to the agent managing the case to incur certain expenses the taxing power of the Court would not be able to interfere.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, if a man chose to throw his money away it was purely his own fault.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, the great evil was that in the case of a Petition the rich man had an immense advantage over the poor man. They could not prevent the rich man engaging the best counsel; they could not properly deal with the expenditure at election trials in the spirit in which they wished to deal with it, unless the Government would endeavour to find some means by which the rich man should not be able, by the mere length of his purse, to put the poor man at a disadvantage. The Amendment might prevent an attorney getting too much money; but it would not prevent the rich man getting an advantage over the poor man.

MR. LEAMY said, the only way in which the rich and the poor man could in this matter be put on equal terms was to introduce a scale of fees for counsel. He was quite sure any proposition of the kind would meet with the most bitter opposition from Members of the Profession; but notwithstanding that, such a proposition would not be without precedent. In Bills for the extension of the jurisdiction of County Courts scales of fees were introduced, under which attorneys were allowed 10s., 15s., or 20s., as the case might be, for every case in which he appeared before the Judge. Why should not the same thing be done in this case? Why should it not be said that any barrister appearing before an Election Court should not be allowed to claim more than so many pounds a-day? That would prevent the rich man bringing down the best counsel from London, and paying him, say, £1,000 for his services, because the opponent, if he were called upon to pay the costs, would only have to pay the scale fees.

MR. GREGORY said, that if parties wished to go beyond any scale of fees fixed upon they could not be prevented from doing so.

MR. MACFARLANE said, it had been stated that the Bill was intended to destroy the power of the purse. It would certainly do that in regard to the election expenses; but if it failed to do so in respect to Election Petitions it would be of little use. The lament of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Fowler) was that at present Election Petitions resulted in great expenditure. The only remedy was to forbid the employment of solicitors and barristers in election trials. Let the candidates themselves fight the matter out before the Judges; let them dispense with all legal advice. This was only a desperate suggestion on his part; because he saw the lawyers could not agree among themselves as to what should be done.

SIR RAINALD KNIGHTLEY said, the only doubt there appeared to be was as to whether the Amendment would do a great deal of good or very little. Under the circumstances, the most rational course for the Committee to pursue would be to agree to the Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR remarked, that the practical effect of the Bill would be, on the one hand, to lessen the cost of an election; but, on the other, to increase materially the expense attending Petitions. He did not imagine that that was the intention of the Government in bringing forward the Bill, and he did not think that the Bill could be made satisfactory or perfect unless they agreed with the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite in regard to this question of the payment of costs. He was very strongly of opinion that unless they made the payment under an Election Petition the same as other legal payments in an action at law, they would not have Election Petitions conducted, so far as the expenses were concerned, upon a reasonable scale; and, in addition, it was most probable that the number of Petitions would be much greater than they otherwise would be. A case had been brought forward by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertford (Mr. A. J. Balfour) as to the scandalous treating which had taken place in the trial of an Election Petition. He thought that was a case in which the Public Prosecutor would have only done his duty if he had prosecuted the parties for treating, seeing that the Petition had arisen out of the election proceedings; but he presumed that there was no machinery by which the conduct of the parties could be brought under the notice of the Public Prosecutor. Nevertheless, the conduct of the two candidates who were having their case tried before an Election Judge was open to the gravest reprobation. It was clear that each was doing his utmost to bribe the witnesses to perjure themselves in the case. Both of the candidates, and their solicitors also, appeared to have acted in a highly corrupt manner in attempting to encourage perjury on the part of the witnesses on both sides. An inquiry ought to have taken place; and if the law was to be administered at all, it should be, as far as possible, administered in a temperate and impartial manner; and any attempt to prime witnesses with strong drink downstairs before they were brought in to give their evidence appeared to him to be a thorough burlesque upon justice; and he thought the Judge would have been justified in interfering in rather a high-handed manner, and in having the parties brought before him. As to the fees, he did not see why an account of them could not be delivered as well as the expenses. He knew there was a strong desire to secure the services of some barrister of eminence, whose name was often in the newspapers, and who had a large practice, although his (Mr. Biggar's) opinion was that the business would be much better done by a less known and cheaper man. He thought the Amendment went scarcely far enough, and that it should apply not only to the costs between party and party, but that no client should be able to contract himself out of the provisions of the Bill. If he did so, his conduct should be condemned, and any payment he made should be held to be a corrupt payment, especially if he paid anything beyond the taxed costs as between attorney and client.

Mr. Biggar

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

MR. M'COAN moved to add at the end of the clause—

"No Election Petition shall be lodged until an abstract of the evidence by which it is proposed to support it has been submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions, and his fiat thereon obtained."

He gathered that it was the feeling of the Committee to keep down the expenses as far as possible, and to prevent the prosecution of frivolous Petitions. He therefore proposed to add these words to the 4th sub-section of the clause. He thought they would meet the difficulty, and that they would certainly prevent frivolous Petitions. It might be objected that the Director of Public Prosecutions was acting as a subordinate, and was, therefore, to some extent, under the influence of the Attorney General for the time being, so that he might have a political bias; but he thought that objection would be met by the fact that, whether the fiat to prosecute was issued by the Public Prosecutor or the Attorney General, it would still be open to Parliamentary criticism, and there would, consequently, be an ample guarantee that nothing like a political job, whether Whig or Tory, would be perpetrated. He, therefore, submitted this Amendment to the consideration of the Committee.

Amendment proposed,

In page 35, at the end of the Clause, to add the words, "no Election Petition shall be lodged until an abstract of the evidence by which it is proposed to support it has been submitted to the Director of Public Prosecutions, and his fiat thereon obtained."—(Mr. M'Coan.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) remarked, that if the Committee saw what the Amendment really amounted to, he was satisfied they would be of opinion that it could not be accepted. In 1868 the House gave up its right to try its own Election Petitions to the Judges of the Superior Courts; but he did not think the House wished, at the present moment, to go further, and to give up the right to try Election Petitions to the Public Prosecutor. How would the Director of Public Prosecutions know whether the evidence upon which he was called to act was correct or not? Of course, it could only be developed as the inquiry went on.

MR. BIGGAR said, he thought there was a great deal more in the matter than the Attorney General seemed to think. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment had raised an important point in his opening speech—namely, whether the Public Prosecutor was an independent officer or not? If he (Mr. Biggar) remembered rightly, the present Public Prosecutor was a very independent gentleman indeed—a man who might be mistaken in his judgment, but a man who was always disposed to do what he thought for the best. He (Mr. Biggar) was of opinion that it was desirable to make applications of this nature to some such person as the Public Prosecutor, and for this reason—that one great cause of the excessive expense occasioned by the presentation of a Petition was that the person who lodged the Petition, whether it related to a borough or a county election, during the whole of its progress was continually looking around for evidence to enable him to get up his case. The result was that a very large amount of expense was incurred, and there was a considerable prolongation of the trial. All that expense would, in a great measure, be obviated if the person proposing to lodge a Petition had to make, before some preliminary tribunal, a statement of the case on which he proposed to found his Petition. It might turn out that there was no pretence of a case whatever; and, in that event, permission to go on with the Petition would be refused. He did not think, on the other hand, that any legal authority would be disposed to throw any unreasonable obstacle in the way of litigation. On the contrary, the Public Prosecutor would probably be very easily satisfied in regard to what was to be considered a prima facie case. But where there was no prima facie case, it would be unreasonable to allow a person to lodge a Petition against the candidate upon his own responsibility, his sole object being to crush his opponent by rendering him liable to pay excessive costs.

MR. LEAMY said, the sense of the Committee was against the proposal, and he hoped the hon. Member would not press it. At the same time, he

(Mr. Leamy) had a strong feeling that something ought to be done to prevent people from recklessly rushing into Court with Petitions. He would suggest that any person who filed a Petition and failed to sustain it, should be sent to gaol for six months with hard labour. The Petitioner would be attempting, to some extent, to interfere with the rights of the constituency, and would be bringing serious charges against another person. Therefore, in any case in which he failed to sustain his charge, he ought to be sent to gaol.

MR. M'COAN said, he had no wish to waste the time of the Committee, either by addressing it at any length or by pressing the Amendment to a Division; but, contrary to the judgment of the Attorney General, he was of opinion that the suggestion embodied in the Amendment was not so frivolous as the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think. The intention, at any rate, was good—namely, to supply some kind of counterpoise to the advantage which a rich man might have over a poor man. He thought it was worthy of consideration whether that object could not be achieved by some such Amendment as this; and he would be glad if the Attorney General would direct his attention to the matter, with the view of proposing some means by which this desirable end could be accomplished.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Miscellaneous.

Clause 38 (Engagement as agent of person previously found guilty of corrupt or illegal practice).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he wished to give an explanation with regard to this clause. He did not propose to carry the law any further than it was now carried by Clause 26, so far as it might be deemed to be expedient to make the candidate responsible for the acts of his agent. He did not think it right in the case of this clause to take the course which the Committee took in Clause 26, and he would move the omission of the clause altogether.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. RAIKES said, he had placed upon the Paper an Amendment to strike out this clause; but it would not be necessary, of course, to move it now. The Attorney General had omitted to state that there was one other important change which he had proposed to make in the law. At one time a disqualification attached to an agent who had been found guilty by a jury, and that was the only disqualification; but it was proposed by this clause, as it stood in the Bill, to extend that disqualification to any person actually reported by the Election Court or by an Election Commission. It was not a question between an agent and a sub-agent as to persons who might have been employed, and who had been found guilty of corrupt and illegal practices, but it applied to all persons who had been reported by an Election Judge. He thought it would have been extremely difficult to justify such a proposal. He was glad that the Attorney General did not intend to take that course, but that he was willing to accept the suggestion that the clause should be struck out of the Bill.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND said, there was one point of an important character in regard to the clause to which he wished to call the attention of the Attorney General. It had reference to engaging the services of a man who had just been unseated on Petition. The words were "a person personally engaged." They all knew that it was almost impossible to prove personal engagement. In his own (Mr. Dixon-Hartland's) case a candidate was unseated on Petition. He immediately went down to the borough, and introduced another candidate, and, in point of fact, was the main reason of the second candidate's return; but it was impossible to prove that he was in any way "personally engaged," and when he went into the box he actually swore there was no personal engagement between himself and the candidate he was successful in returning. When the Petition was over, and the candidate was unseated, within a short time after the result of the Petition was made known the former candidate, who had been instrumental in returning the second candidate, claimed £1,000 from the Gentleman he had succeeded in getting in, which sum that Gentleman refused to pay, on the ground that, although he was actually seated, he was only seated for a short time; whereupon this person issued a writ. He thought the point was an important one, and he trusted the Attorney General would consider it, in order to insert some provision in the Bill to guard against a similar case hereafter—namely, the use by a candidate of the services of a person who had just been unseated. It was a great evil that the moment a candidate was unseated he should be able to go down to the borough again, in order to nominate and actively support another person in securing the seat of which he had himself been deprived. He, therefore, hoped the clause would not be withdrawn at once, and he would move, in line 4, the insertion of words to carry out the object he had in view.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman cannot do that; I have already put the Question that Clause 38 stand part of the Bill.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND said, he had been speaking in opposition to the omission of the clause. He wanted it to stand part of the Bill, and not to be struck out.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot amend a clause after the Question has been put that it stand part of the Bill. The hon. Gentleman did not rise before I put the Question.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND said, he thought the Chairman was mistaken, and that he had risen before the Question was put.

MR. RAIKES said, the hon. Member was in error. He had himself preceded the hon. Member; but he (Mr. Raikes) did not rise until after the Question had been put that the Clause stand part of the Bill, and he had addressed the Committee upon that Question.

Clause struck out.

Clause 39 (Inquiry by Director of Public Prosecutions into alleged corrupt or illegal practices).

MR. GORST moved, in page 26, line 15, after "prosecutions," to insert "or his assistant." He wished to point out to the Committee that in the early stage of the Bill a Motion had been made by his right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke), and strongly supported by right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Front Opposition Bench, for the establishment of a summary tribunal for the purpose of dealing with offences against the election law at the time they were committed. The tribunal proposed by his right hon. Friend was a Court of Summary Jurisdiction, consisting of two Justices of the Peace. To that Court great objection was taken by the Attorney General, and a kind of challenge was thrown out by the hon. and learned Gentleman to his opponents. "Find me a tribunal," said the Attorney General, "and I will be quite ready to fall into your views, and see if anything of the kind can be done." He (Mr. Gorst) did not think that the Committee at that time noticed that the hon. and learned Gentleman had himself found a tribunal in a clause they were now coming to. The tribunal found by the Attorney General was a barrister specially appointed for the purpose of sitting in the town where the election was taking place, and punishing, by summary procedure, offences against the election law. He was not, however, going to discuss Clause 40 at the present moment; but he intended only to move now to add to the words "Director of Public Prosecutions" the words "or his assistant," meaning, thereby, somebody sent down by the Director of Public Prosecutions to prosecute offences against the election law by means of the summary tribunal which the learned Attorney General proposed to create. He thought that was a convenient Amendment upon which to inquire what the intentions of the Attorney General were respecting this tribunal; and he hoped the relevancy of the Amendment would be clearly understood. The Attorney General proposed to establish a local tribunal, and he (Mr. Gorst) was strongly in favour of a local tribunal; but he objected to the mode in which his hon. and learned Friend proposed to carry out that idea. It seemed to him something like shutting the door of the stable after the horse was stolen, to send down an official to conduct an inquiry six months after the election was over. He ought to be sent down at the time the election was going on. Apart from the question of expense, he did not see any difficulty in having a barrister, such as was described in Section 40, sent down to any borough where corrupt practices were taking place, and there would be no difficulty in having an assistant of the Public Prosecutor sent down also. There would then be a tribunal on the spot. The Public Prosecutor, or his representative, would be in the borough, and it would be his duty to see that the law was observed, and then they might have some prospect of seeing an election conducted legally, without anything in the nature of a violation of the provisions of the Statute. That was the reason why in foreign countries there was no such open violation of the law as that which characterized English elections. Abroad this sort of violation of the law was unknown. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen) had spoken of the manner in which elections were conducted at Breslau, and the hon. Member had drawn a contrast between the order and quiet which prevailed in an election at Breslau, and the disorder and illegality which characterized a similar proceeding in an English town. Why was that? It was because there was no officer in England to see that the law was observed. In Breslau, if a man were to commit any of the illegal acts which were over and over again committed at an election in Newcastle, or Leeds, he would have the Public Prosecutor down upon him, and would be sent to prison for openly violating the law; whereas in an English constituency there was nobody to see the law put in force, and no local tribunal to take cognizance of the offence. The consequence was that the law was frequently violated before the eyes of everybody. There was nobody to enforce it, and it was broken in a manner which was scandalous to their civilization. He therefore begged, for the purpose of raising the question whether there ought not to be a legal administration of the law, to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 26, line 15, after the word "prosecutions," to insert the words "or his assistant."—(Mr. Gorst.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sorry the hon. and learned Gentleman had moved the Amendment in the present clause. He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman misunderstood the object of the clause. It was quite correct to say that in an early part of the Bill his right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke) had raised a question as to a summary tribunal which should deal with offences under the Act on the spot. The view of the right hon. Gentleman was that there should be some tribunal so constituted that if a person was caught red-handed he might be tried at once and punished. But this clause had nothing to do with that question. While his hon. and learned Friend was looking for a Judge, he (the Attorney General), in this clause, was looking for a Prosecutor. If they pursued the subject now they would have to discuss it all over again upon the next clause, which appointed Special Commissioners to make an inquiry whether there was reason to believe that a considerable number of the electors of a county or borough had been guilty of some corrupt or illegal practice. The present clause raised the question of placing the prosecution of such persons in the hands of a public officer, and of not leaving it to private persons. It had nothing whatever to do with the tribunal, but simply with the institution of the prosecution.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he thought the misunderstanding was rather on the part of the Attorney General than of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), because the hon. and learned Gentleman was quite as much searching, not for a Judge, but for a Prosecutor. The object of his hon. and learned Friend was this—that they ought to have some summary tribunal for dealing with these matters; and in order that that summary tribunal might be of the greatest use, they ought to have a Public Prosecutor wherever it was required at an election. It was in order to make the summary tribunal the Attorney General was about to institute of some use, that his hon. and learned Friend proposed there should be power to prosecute before it, and they could not have that duty properly discharged unless they had a Prosecutor; so that his hon. and learned Friend was quite as much in search of a Public Prosecutor as of a Judge. The question of the Judge would come up further on.

MR. GORST remarked, that if the Attorney General would look at the consequential Amendments which appeared on the Paper, he would find that he (Mr. Gorst) was not open to the criticism to which he had been exposed. Among the Amendments, he proposed to add at the end of the clause the following words:—

“Upon the request of any candidate at an election the returning officer shall apply to the Director of Public Prosecutions to appoint an assistant to attend during the election in the county or borough at which such election is taking place, and it shall be the duty of the Director of Public Prosecutions to send forthwith such assistant, and to charge his remuneration and expenses to such returning officer. The returning officer shall be entitled to recover the sums so charged from the candidates, as part of the expenses of the election, in addition to the sums allowed to be charged under ‘The Parliamentary Elections (Returning Officers) Act, 1875.’”

This officer would go down and attend elections at the time they were taking place, and the officer so sent down would make all the necessary inquiries, and summon before the proper tribunal any person whom he might find offending against the law. As the Attorney General had placed the question of the Prosecutor first in Clause 39, and had left the tribunal over until they reached Clause 40, he (Mr. Gorst) was obliged, of course, to keep the same order. In this clause he proposed that there should be a Public Prosecutor, and when they reached Clause 40 he intended to propose that there should be a local tribunal. He wished to impress upon the Attorney General that there ought to be in every constituency in places where corrupt practices were known to taking place an officer of the law for the purpose of seeing that the law was observed, and for the purpose of putting the law in motion against any person, whoever he might be, who intended to break the law. He was quite certain that until that was done in some form or shape they might pass what clause they liked, but they would never put down corrupt practices at elections. The only way in which these sort of practices were to be put down was by having some person in the place in the position of a public officer whose duty it would be to watch the election.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) asked the hon. and learned Gentleman to postpone the consideration of the Amendment for the present. He should like to ask the Committee to consider what it was they were called upon to do by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman. They were really asked to send down a barrister to every election, and that meant a barrister of seven years' standing, so that they might probably have to send some 400 barristers of seven years' standing down to the different constituencies to watch the proceedings. That could not be done without incurring considerable expense. And what was the barrister to do when he reached the constituency? He would be a stranger to the constituency, and if he were sent down to detect bribery he would be the last man who would be able to do so. He would sit in the bar-room of an hotel all day long, and would have no information brought to him. Was he to act the part of a detective, or was he to act as the advocate of a detective if any case of bribery were found out? What was it that his hon. and learned Friend meant?

MR. GORST said, he did not see why the officer should be a barrister of seven years' standing.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) remarked, that he might be a solicitor; but, at present, he did not know what the duties were which this individual was to perform. If he was to institute a prosecution, he must be necessarily be a man connected with the Legal Profession, and therefore he must be a barrister or a solicitor. Did the hon. and learned Gentleman mean that he was to detect the crime, or that he was to prosecute the offender before the magistrates when the crime was detected? It was evident he was not to be the Judge and to preside over the tribunal, and therefore he must be a stranger to the town.

MR. GORST asked why he should be a stranger to the town?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) asked of what use, if a person was to be placed in a capacity to represent the public, would be the appointment of a local man, who would be certain to be a friend to one side, and under the influence of one side, and could not represent impartial justice as the Public Prosecutor would represent it? He did not think that the proposal was a practical one, or that it would do the slightest good. There could be no utility in sending a man down to a constituency who would know nobody, and who would be supplied with no information, and whose only alternative would be to sit in the bar-parlour of an hotel all day long. Of what assistance would such a man be in discovering or bringing to light cases of bribery?

MR. LEAMY saw a further objection to this Amendment. If the Public Prosecutor was only to send down his assistant, they would have that assistant roaming about one or two constituencies during the election; whereas in other constituencies, and perhaps those in which his presence was most required, there would be no public officer at all. He thought the Attorney General had shown conclusively that the gentleman appointed, whoever he might be, would spend the whole of the day in an hotel. Who was to come before him? The election would last only eight or nine hours; and suppose the police were to arrest a man, and bring him before this officer on a charge of bribery, or the commission of some other corrupt practice, unless they could show that the man had been receiving or paying money, it was very unlikely that the Public Prosecutor or his assistant would be able to do anything of himself. At the same time, he thought it would have a very good effect if the constituency thoroughly understood that there was a person who could seize on any man who was guilty of bribery, or of any other illegal act; and he (Mr. Leamy) intended to move a clause later on requiring the Returning Officer, as soon as he received a writ, to publish all the sections of this Bill which contained the punishment to be inflicted upon voters who were guilty of any of the corrupt or illegal practices set forth in the Bill. He thought that would have a most wholesome effect; and if an elector had staring him in the face the fact that if he was guilty of a certain offence he would be liable to a certain punishment he would not be so likely to commit it.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he entirely agreed with his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) that the establishment of a tribunal to act on the spot in certain cases would unquestionably be one of the best provisions which could be inserted in the Bill. Indeed, he believed it would do more to check corruption than anything else they could do. All the other provisions were of little significance in comparison with that; but, at the same time, he failed to see how the Amendment could accomplish that object. He understood his hon. and learned Friend to desire to appoint a Prosecutor without a tribunal to try the cases. No doubt a Public Prosecutor might be a useful officer; but he would be an expensive one, and might not be necessary, and unless they appointed a local Court he did not see what value the Amendment would have. In foreign countries a security for the purity of elections existed in the fact that alongside of all elections was a person engaged in watching that no illegal practices were committed. His opinion was, that if they adopted the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke) they would do more to put down corruption than anything else.

MR. LEWIS said, he objected to the clause as a whole, and also to the manner in which it was proposed to carry it out. What would be the position of the Director of Public Prosecutions if he were to go down to make inquiry in the way suggested? It was quite evident that he would become the mere depository of all the tittle-tattle of the place on one side or the other. What was the necessity of such a provision? As the Bill stood, they had given ample power for the presentation of Petitions, which was the only resort of persons who were discontented with an election. In the next clause they appointed Commissioners, and sent them down to the constituency at the instance of an aggrieved Petitioner who desired inquiry. They now proposed that, in order to check the corrupt practice which might have prevailed, an inquiry should be instituted by the Director of Public Prosecutions. It seemed to him (Mr. Lewis) that the real objection was to the clause itself. Although he could not support the Amendment of his hon. and learned Friend, he certainly could not support the clause. He would not inquire what the object of the next clause was; but, in regard to the present clause, he thought that its object had been misconceived by the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Cowen). The Public Prosecutor could not try anybody at all. He would be simply sent down to the constituency to see if he could pick up anybody and send him for trial, and he (Mr. Lewis) did not think that was a sort of thing they ought to sanction at all. They ought to rest quite content with the eagerness of political partizans, without sending down the Public Prosecutor.

MR. GORST said, he would ask the leave of the Committee to withdraw the Amendment, because he had been impressed by what hon. Members had said, that it was not necessary to have a Public Prosecutor without a local tribunal; and as the hon. and learned Attorney General had not yet provided a local tribunal, it was unnecessary to take up the time of the Committee by looking for a Public Prosecutor. There was one observation of the Attorney General which he desired to answer, in order to show that he was not as ignorant as the Attorney General seemed to suppose. He had never contemplated that the Public Prosecutor should send down a stranger. The Attorney General knew the Public Prosecutor better than he (Mr. Gorst) did; but the hon. and learned Gentleman seemed to think that he would appoint the worst man to represent him he could find. If the Public Prosecutor were a man of sense, he (Mr. Gorst) presumed that when he appointed an assistant he would look out for some independent and impartial solicitor in the constituency itself.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): How could you find him?

MR. GORST said, the hon. and learned Gentleman asked how they could find him? He (Mr. Gorst) would undertake to say that there was not a constituency in which they could not find a respectable solicitor who took no part in Party politics of any kind, and who would be perfectly adequate to exercise semi-judicial functions at the time of an election. That was the sort of man he would recommend; but as there was no use in searching for a Public Prosecutor, he would ask leave to withdraw the Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR desired to say a word before the Amendment was withdrawn. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) had asked why a barrister of seven years' standing should be sent down to a borough to listen to all the tittle-tattle of the place; and the hon.

and learned Gentleman asserted that the Public Prosecutor would be able to obtain no evidence which he could lay before any tribunal. Now, he (Mr. Biggar) contended, on the other hand, that witnesses would be taken before the representative of the Public Prosecutor, who would be in a position to give some substantial evidence upon which the Assistant Public Prosecutor would be able to set the law in motion, and have the case adjudicated upon at once. It therefore seemed to him that the Amendment was a feasible one, and he did not see why it should not be introduced.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN: Does the hon. and learned Gentleman move the other Amendments which stand in his name on the Paper?

MR. GORST: No.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

MR. LEWIS wished to call the attention of the Committee to the nature of clause. It said—

"Where information is given to the Director of Public Prosecutions that any corrupt or illegal practices have prevailed in reference to any election, it shall be his duty, subject to the regulations under the Prosecution of Offences Act, 1879, to make such inquiries and institute such prosecutions as the circumstances of the case appear to him to require."

Did the Attorney General really think that such a provision would answer any practical purpose in the interests of purity of election? It seemed to him (Mr. Lewis) to be wholly a mischievous and a useless provision.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, there were cases in which persons would go to the Public Prosecutor and his representative and say that wholesale bribery was going on, and that A, B, C, and D could give him conclusive proof of it. Directly he received such information the Public Prosecutor could put the law in motion; and he thought it would be better to leave the duty of entering upon the case to the Public Prosecutor, rather than to persons who might have been taking part in the election on one side or the other.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 40 (Special Commissioner for trial of persons charged with corrupt or illegal practices, or illegal payment, employment, or hiring).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, a great many representations had been made to him on the subject of this clause, which did not deal with a summary tribunal, but a tribunal to be appointed after the election on the representation of a certain number of electors. A great many Members on both sides of the House desired to see the tribunal sitting during the election. He was anxious to do all in his power to meet the views of those hon. Members, and would therefore take the matter into consideration, to see whether he could provide, not only an inquiry after, but, if possible, during the election. This clause was perfectly isolated from the rest of the Bill; therefore, under the circumstances, he should be prepared to strike it out, with the object of dealing with the matter at a later stage.

MR. GORST said, he intended to propose an Amendment to convert the Court from one which should sit after the election into one which should sit during the election; but, as he understood the matter, the Attorney General was going to take the whole subject into his consideration, with a view, if possible, of meeting the wishes of the Committee. He would not, therefore, move his Amendment at present; but he hoped he was right in supposing that the possibility of having a tribunal which should sit during an election would be considered by the Government with the desire of adopting such an arrangement if practicable.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN agreed with the postponement, but wished to say that they were postponing too many clauses. ["No, no!"] Well, if they were not postponing this clause they were striking it out, in order to bring up another one in its place, which was almost the same thing. ["No, no!"] Not necessarily, perhaps, but in all probability that was what they would do. He wished to warn the Committee against the danger of leaving too many questions to be discussed on the Report stage; and to suggest that, if they were not careful, the points at issue on Report would be as numerous and as troublesome as they had been in the Committee.

MR. RAIKES said, that if this clause was struck out now, he could only hope that it would re-appear. It appeared to him by far the most practical clause of the Bill. There was one point which, so far as he could judge, appeared to have escaped the attention of the Attorney General, and also the Members of the Committee, and he would make a suggestion to the hon. and learned Gentleman with regard to it. The clause in its present form provided for inquiry into corrupt or illegal practices, or illegal payment, employment, or hiring; but the Commissioner only had power under it to punish for corrupt practices. There was no provision in the clause for the punishment of illegal practices, or illegal payments, employment, or hiring; but in Sub-section 4, the Commissioner, on convicting a person for an illegal practice in connection with an election might, if he thought it expedient, let him off, awarding no other punishment than the incapacities that attached to such conviction. He did not know whether it was the intention of the Government that the Commissioner should not have power to punish for illegal payment, employment, or hiring; but, while he should prefer to limit the jurisdiction of the Commissioner to punishment for corrupt practices, he should be glad to see the clause re-appear. The omission he pointed out appeared to him to be a serious error in the drafting. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General might read the clause two or three times, but nowhere in it would he find provided punishment for illegal practices. There were two other points to which he wished to call attention, and to make proposals, one being in the spirit of the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Frome (Mr. H. B. Samuelson) at an earlier period. He (Mr. Raikes) was anxious that the person who held this Commission should be one who was not liable to the suspicion of political bias; and he, therefore, proposed that he should be a person who had not been a candidate at any election during the five years preceding his appointment. It seemed to him (Mr. Raikes) that it would be a very unsatisfactory element in such inquiry if, in considering cases where malpractices were charged against one side or the other, the person conducting the investigation were a person who had recently been a Member of the House, or a candidate for a seat in Parliament. Such a person would hardly be able to hear a case with that partiality which he ought to possess. He had known cases where Commissioners who had been candidates at elections, and who might have been extremely desirous of doing their duty in a most impartial manner, still had entirely failed to satisfy the constituency amongst whom they had sat that that was the case. The question then arose, how far these inquiries were to affect the status of Members of the House? The Bill, in the general clauses, provided elaborate machinery for the trial of Election Petitions; but, as he read this clause, it would be competent for a Commissioner to try a candidate or Member of the House six months after the election, and probably long after the time for petitioning had expired, and if he found him guilty thereby to void the seat and expose the Member to all the penalties of the Bill. It seemed to him (Mr. Raikes) that that, perhaps, was hardly intended; and he wished to put in words making a saving clause, to the effect that neither the candidate nor his principal agent should be liable to be tried by such Commission. If the other side wished to have a shot at a candidate or his principal agent, they had an opportunity in their power to lodge a Petition against the return; but if the clause passed in a form similar to that in which it now stood, it might give political opponents an opportunity of satisfying their vindictiveness or malignity. He mentioned these matters now because he was anxious that the Attorney General, who was going to bring in the clause in a new shape, should have them under his consideration, and might, therefore, make the section more workable and more practicable.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that if the right hon. Gentleman would turn to line 39, in Sub-section 2, he would find that for the purposes of this Act the Commissioner was to have all the powers of a Petty Sessional Court, in addition to the powers conferred by the measure. A Petty Sessional Court could try a case summarily, and impose summary punishment; therefore, the Commissioner would be able to act summarily. Then, again, a candidate need not subject himself to this jurisdiction unless he thought proper. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman's entire criticism of the clause altogether failed. He (the Attorney General) trusted that upon this subject there would be no misunderstanding. With regard to the tribunal, it would be remembered that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) had said that he would endeavour to find it; and he (the Attorney General) could only say that anything that came from the right hon. Gentleman would be received by him with every desire to meet his views if it were possible. He (the Attorney General) could not take upon himself fuller obligations in this matter.

MR. BOURKE said, that before they parted with this clause they ought to have a satisfactory understanding from the Attorney General as to whether or not it was to re-appear? Though the Attorney General proposed to withdraw the clause for the present, was it to appear in another shape? He did not understand that the hon. and learned Gentleman had pledged himself in the matter; on the contrary, though there seemed to be a general consensus of opinion that the principle laid down in the proposal of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke) was one the Committee ought to sanction, the Attorney General had not committed himself to that view. From what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman to-day it was clear that the Government did not look upon this proposal with any degree of favour. Therefore, he thought that before they passed away from the clause it would be well for the Committee to understand whether the Government really did intend to bring up any clause analogous to that proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Kent or not.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) was understood to say that the Government would take the point into consideration, with a view, if possible, of making some proposal with regard to it.

MR. ONSLOW said, that he had lately been thinking a great deal over this question, and it had suggested itself to his mind that this Court might safely be the local magistrates. The local magistrates desired to prevent bribery; it was their object that elections should be conducted decently, and in an orderly manner; and it certainly appeared to him that, unless they availed themselves of the local magistrates, they would be unable to obtain another local tribunal.

MR. GIBSON said, he thought that as his right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) was not present, he might say in his name that he thought the Attorney General had, on the whole, exercised a wise discretion in withdrawing this clause. There had been a great consensus of opinion in the House that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke) was quite right in suggesting to the Committee that it was desirable to have a summary tribunal to decide on the spot during the election, if possible, in the case of offences discovered as the election was going on; but such tribunal would not at all be provided by this clause. This clause would enable disgusted opponents — there were always people disgusted with the result after an election—to wait four, or five, or six months before taking any action, and then action might be taken just at the time when everybody was forgetting the animosities of the contest, and were making up their political differences. The effect of the clause would be to bring up the Attorney General and the Public Prosecutor into the county or borough, and to have the constituency again annoyed and disturbed when everybody wanted to forget and forgive. He was pleased, therefore, on the whole, that the clause had been withdrawn. He understood the Attorney General to say that he had no intention of presenting this clause again to the notice of the Committee, but that he would be prepared to give the fullest and most favourable consideration to any clause that might be presented from any part of the Committee. That might have reference to the real inquiry to be made on the spot while the election was being carried on. He (Mr. Gibson) understood that while the hon. and learned Gentleman would give that favourable consideration to Motions made on that (the Opposition) side of the House, he would endeavour himself to suggest, if he found it feasible, some clause that might have the effect of satisfying the demands which had been made.

[Sixteenth Night.]

He understood that the hon. and learned Gentleman did not pledge himself dogmatically that he would be able to do that, but that he would loyally endeavour, with the aid of Members of the Committee, to present such a clause for their acceptance.

MR. CALLAN said, he was sorry to find that the Attorney General had yielded to pressure and had withdrawn the clause, which he believed to be one of the most healthy sections of the Bill. At present, if a candidate was guilty of illegal or corrupt practices, there was no remedy against him, unless some interested party went and lodged a Petition, and, at the same time, lodged £1,000 as security for costs. And then what was everybody's became nobody's business—to preserve the electoral purity of the country. True it was that there was a Proviso that after an election, upon a Petition signed by two or more electors of the borough or county, the House might, if it so thought fit, if it were informed that a considerable number of electors had been guilty of corrupt practices, address the Crown to give effect to the representation, just as if it had been moved by a Report of the Election Judges. But how had that Proviso worked. It had been in force now more than 20 years, and had never yet been acted upon—in fact, it was practically a dead letter. Substantially, the only manner in which they could get at the corruption of a constituency was by means of an Election Petition; but an Election Petition could not be instituted, as he had said, unless there was some patriotic or interested party prepared to lodge £1,000 to cover any possible expense. That seemed to him to be a very undesirable method of securing an inquiry. He was not at all in favour of having an inquiry during an election. They could not send Public Prosecutors or barristers of 10 or 15 years' standing all over the country whilst an election was going on, and if they sent to one constituency they would have to send to all. The Attorney General, or the Public Prosecutor, whoever he might be, might be at the time looking after his own election, and they would not be able to send him all around the country. It was a kind of hodge-podge to think of being able to send him down to the constituencies to make inquiries at a General Election. In the future this might occur. After an election something might gradually ooze out about corrupt practices, and they might not have to try the candidate or the election agent, but some other person who might be guilty. He knew a case himself in which corrupt practices had extensively prevailed in a constituency. The evidence that was obtained was overwhelming of its kind, and a Petition was determined upon; but it so happened that the candidate who was defeated started for another constituency and obtained a seat, the result being that he abandoned the proceedings. The candidate, who was beaten in this case, had incontestible evidence of corrupt practices prevailing—in fact, sufficient to disfranchise the constituency; but yet he did not want, like Quintus Curtius, to throw himself into the breach and lodge £1,000 in Chancery which might never be returned to him; and, consequently, all these corrupt practices went by the board. If such a clause as this had been in force retribution would have followed quick upon the successful candidate who had been guilty of corrupt practices. He might not have lost his seat; but he would have been pilloried before the public, and would have suffered the punishment assigned to him. He must say that he knew a number of constituencies where, if this clause had been in operation, the evil practices of which the persons had been guilty would have been detected. He was sorry to find on this occasion great sympathy with the Front Opposition Bench and the Treasury Bench. No doubt, both of them would have been more or less affected, and to his mind it would have been more during the last Election, if this clause had been in operation. In fact, he believed that if there had been such a law as this when an appeal was last made to the constituencies, one-half of the Members of this House who escaped Election Petitions would subsequently have been got at and exposed for malpractices. And what would have happened at the last Election would happen at the next. He exceedingly regretted the abandonment of this clause, believing that in letting it go the Government were throwing a sop to corruptionists, and those who hoped to profit by corruption.

MR. BIGGAR said, he wished to make an observation with regard to this clause. In the early part of the Bill the Government had provided an innumerable quantity of offences; in fact, they had made it almost certain that every candidate must break the law in some particular or other. What had they done after that? They had taken very good care that no one should be prosecuted under the provisions of this Act unless, so far as he could see, an Election Petition was lodged. What was the result of that? Why, that the expense to the party lodging the Petition, who had to give a guarantee of £1,000, would be £4,000 or £5,000, and that was altogether beyond the capacity of a large proportion of those who were candidates for election, or who might be in the future. If a wealthy candidate was guilty of an offence, and his opponent was not a wealthy man, he would, in all probability, get off scot-free; whereas a poor candidate who might be guilty of some trifling act, which under the Bill would be illegal, might be overwhelmed by the force of a Petition brought against him by some well-to-do opponent. It was proposed in this clause that the Public Prosecutor should initiate a special tribunal to try the case if 10 electors in the constituency gave information and appealed to have the case tried. These 10 electors would be parties who were interested in having freedom and purity of election amongst the constituency to which they belonged; and, more than that, under the clause, if a delinquent was convicted he would be punished, and the constituency which was of a corrupt nature would have to pay the expenses of the proceedings, although, on the other hand, if these 10 gentlemen who appealed to the Public Prosecutor were proved to have made a vexatious complaint, they would have to pay the cost of the proceedings. It seemed to him that the clause might have been so improved as to render it acceptable; at any rate, he believed that this was one of the most desirable clauses of the Bill, providing, as it did, for a comparatively cheap tribunal to try these cases. If this clause was not inserted there would be no means of trying these cases, except through the action of an Election Petition, which was always a very expensive and most unsatisfactory method, and for the reason that if a man was very rich he could go to the expense of suborning witnesses; whilst a poor man must depend upon the justice of his case.

MR. CALLAN said, he had not spoken in the course of this debate, except upon subjects upon which he had some experience, and in which he felt deeply interested. It was a fact, that when an Election Petition was presented it was necessary for the Petitioner to lodge £1,000, and it was also necessary to charge the candidate, by himself or by his agent, with having been guilty of corrupt practices such as would invalidate the election. That was a sine quid non. Though they might prove that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed, if they could not bring home to the candidate, or his agent, the corrupt practices, the Petitioner would be mulcted not only in his own costs, but also in those of the candidate. The most difficult thing in the matter of an Election Petition was to bring the charge home to the candidate, though it was often very easy to prove that corrupt practices had extensively prevailed. At his own election, in Dundalk, in 1880, he was defeated. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes; he was defeated, but it was by corrupt practices. Treating was so extensive that he had it in his power at the election to bring home corrupt practices to upwards of 100 electors in that borough. He had his Petition prepared; but having obtained a seat within four days for his native county, why should he petition and risk £1,000? He felt sure, however, that he could have proved that corrupt practices extensively prevailed; but the difficulty would have been to have brought it home to the minds of the Judges that the candidate or his agent was implicated. If this clause had been in operation he could have got 10 electors to allege that corrupt practices extensively prevailed without difficulty, and thereupon he could have brought evidence to prove the case. He was not at all surprised at the Attorney General yielding in this case, not because of the objection taken from that (the Opposition) side of the House, but because it came from the eminent jurists below the Gangway. The objection to the clause, he believed, came from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) and the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler). Why did these hon. Members, who held themselves up as the only pure Members of the House, object to this clause? Why did the Attorney General yield to the request of his supporters to expunge the most important clause in the entire Bill, when by its agency he could bring home their guilt to erring candidates, and impose upon them the punishment they deserved? As he had said, if this clause had been in operation at the Dundalk Election he could have proved that upwards of 100 voters had obtained £5 or £10 each for their votes. Probably he could not have brought that home to the satisfaction of his opponent; but he felt sure that he could have brought home to the mind of an impartial investigator the fact that such corruption existed, and would have been able to have obtained the disfranchisement of the borough.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must remind the hon. Member of the new Rule relating to wearying the patience of the Committee.

MR. CALLAN said, he was not aware that wearying the patience of the Committee was an offence so long as he spoke pertinently to the point. He was fully alive to the fact that it was easy to weary the patience of Members below the Gangway when he referred, in the clear way he was doing, to their malpractices.

MR. BIGGAR said, he did not intend to prolong this discussion to any length; but he felt so strongly upon this particular clause that he should take the opportunity of dividing upon it.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 5; Noes 164: Majority 159.—(Div. List, No. 180.)

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Solicitor General.)

MR. ONSLOW said, that upon this Motion he wished to put a question to the Government. He did not know whether there was any truth in it, but he had heard from certain hon. Members that Her Majesty's Government intended to propose a series of Amendments on the next clause. Not one of them was down on the Paper; and really, on an important clause like this, affecting as it did a large and interesting trade, the Attorney General should give them some facilities for ascertaining what the Amendments were to be.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir FARRER HERSCHELL) said, the Government would take care to put the Amendments on the Paper, so that the Committee would have an opportunity of determining upon them before they were asked to discuss them.

Motion agreed to.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

The House suspended its Sitting at ten minutes before Seven of the clock.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

—20—

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PARLIAMENTARY FRANCHISE (EXTENSION TO WOMEN).

RESOLUTION.

MR. HUGH MASON, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the Parliamentary Franchise should be extended to women who possess the qualifications which entitle men to vote, and who in all matters of local government have the right of voting," said: Mr. Speaker, I must, in the first place, express my regret that the introduction of this Motion has not fallen in the present Parliament, as it did in the last Parliament, upon my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Courtney). I regret it for the sake of the House, and for the sake of the question itself. But, having accepted Office under the Government, a substitute has had to be found for my hon. Friend, and that substitute has been found in myself. In only one thing do I profess to equal my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury, and that is in my sincerity, and my earnestness in hoping that this question may be brought to-night to a successful issue. In all other respects I have to confess that I am very unequal to the task which has fallen upon me, as compared with my hon. Friend; but if the House will be so good as to grant me its indulgence for a little time only, I will endeavour to place my arguments before it as concisely and as clearly as it is possible for me to do. While I feel regret on the one hand, as I have just said, I have considerable encouragement on the other hand derived from the fact that the question I have undertaken to bring before the House is not a Party political question. There will be no irritable spirit of partizanship aroused on either side of the House by the discussion on this question. In former Parliaments, when this question was brought forward—for this is the first time in the present Parliament in which it has been introduced—many right hon. Gentlemen who now sit on the Treasury Bench were found to be warm supporters of the Motion I now propose, and many who sat on the Treasury Bench in the last Parliament have also proved themselves to be its warm supporters. The Motion has had the support on a previous occasion, and will have the support again to-night, of every section in this House—of Tories, Whigs, Radicals, the Fourth Party, Home Rulers, indeed, Members from every part of the House will be found amongst the ranks of those who support this Motion. On the eve of the introduction, many of us hope, of the new Reform Bill by the Government—not in this Session, but in the next Session—it does seem fitting that this question should be debated in the course of the present Session; for in my humble judgment a Reform Bill would be an incomplete measure, unless provision was made in it for granting Parliamentary votes to women ratepayers who are spinsters and widows. I wish to bring this phase of the question very clearly now before the House. An impression, I dare say, has gone abroad, and may exist in the minds of some hon. Gentlemen present, that my Motion covers a much wider field than I, for one, have any conception of. I repeat that the words of my Motion are intended to cover women ratepayers who are spinsters and widows. I have not the slightest sympathy with those who advocate the conferring of this vote upon married women, or upon women who are not ratepayers; and I, for one, would wash my hands of this question now and for ever, sooner than I would be a party, in any degree whatever, to conferring a vote upon any class of women, except the two classes I have named. Now, what does my Motion mean? It does not mean in any sense a degrading of the franchise, it does not mean the conferring of any fancy franchise which at present is unknown to the Constitution; but it simply means the giving of Parliamentary votes to those women who already possess votes for Municipal Councils, School Boards, Boards of Guardians, Overseers, Churchwardens, Surveyors of Parish Roads, and some other Bodies. And it does seem to me—I will not say illogical in the law, for in my opinion there is nothing logical in the British Constitution—it does seem to me a great act of injustice to the women who discharge the duties of citizenship, who pay rates and taxes, and in many other ways fulfil the obligations which are imposed upon them by the law; it does seem to me a great act of injustice that the voting power which they possess shall stop short of allowing them to vote for Members of the House of Commons. I am asked the question again and again—"Pray where do you mean to stop?" [Mr. WARTON: Hear, hear!] Well, at all events, I have a notion where I mean to stop. I do not mean to make Members of Parliament of women. [Mr. WARTON: Why not?] I do not mean to make them soldiers or sailors, or railway stokers, or colliers, or to give them occupations of that kind. But I invariably answer, when I am asked by a man where I mean to stop, having made those reservations, that I do not intend to go beyond the Throne. In this country we have had women as Monarchs wielding the sceptre, and discharging the highest functions of the State, wisely and conscientiously, and patriotically; and surely if women are competent to perform those high duties, in the way which I have described, they are worthy of having conferred on them votes which it is the object of my Resolution to confer. Now, I said women are in a very unjust position. We must either go backwards or forwards. We cannot possibly stand still. I am quite aware that some hon. Gentlemen have expressed their doubts and fears as to the consequence of conferring this vote upon women. They have said to me—"Do you wish to make them spouters upon every political platform in the country? Do you wish them to turn their backs upon their homes and their families, and to neglect the discharge of those important domestic duties for which they are highly qualified?" I have no fears whatever of that sort; and the way in which women have hitherto exercised the suffrage in the election of Town Councils, and other Bodies, I think ought to be accepted as complete evidence that they will not abuse or misuse the trust which some of us wish to put in their hands. Now, I hold an opinion that the qualification for giving a vote is very much more one of the heart than of the head. Though I do not at all agree with the people who say that women are intellectually or scientifically inferior to men. I will only ask those who take an interest in education to look at Girton and Newnham, and see the positions young women in those important educational institutions hold. I will also ask them to look at the Profession of Medicine, and ask them to recall the fact that women are making their mark in this important Profession, in which they will, in my opinion, continue to make their mark, thus showing that they are well qualified for the discharge not only of duties of this character, but of duties of an equally responsible kind in other vocations. Now, we are always told when a reform is sought that there is no demand for it on the part of those who will be benefited by it. Now, that cannot be said in regard to the women on this subject. For many years they have been very well organized. They have most ably conducted their organization; they have carried on with great ability a public journal, which many hon. Members, I know, read every month; and they have managed their organization with an amount of economy in funds which, I must say, puts to the blush many organizations conducted by men. And we are also told—I will not say whether there is any truth in it or not—that the Parliament of England never yields anything to reason or argument, but that it yields only to fears, and threats, and intimidation. Now, we have never seen the women resorting to threats or intimidation; but their organization, their agitation, has been conducted in the most Constitutional and the most lady-like manner—they have brought no stain whatever upon their sex, or upon the purity of their minds by using expressions or adopting means which would be a disgrace to themselves or to the question with which they are identified. We are told that if votes are granted to women they will simply become tools in the hands of the priests—that they will be the victims of the priests. I venture to think that even if that were true—which I deny—it is entirely beside the question. The question really is—Is it just to give them a vote? not—How will they use it; or, if they have it, will they become the tools of designing men? I will reply to an accusation of that kind by asking—"Do not we see men the victims of priests? Do not we hear a great deal about strong-minded women?" And I myself think, judging from the experience—the limited experience, perhaps, I may have had in that direction—that women are as little liable to be victimized by the priests as the men who make the accusations are. Now, I have been told in my own borough, by some of my best friends, to use their own emphatic language—"That if I succeed in achieving this reform for the women it will be at the risk of my seat, for the women will all turn Tories." It has been said to me—"You are giving yourself the greatest slap in the face that you could possibly receive at a future election." Now, that does not concern me in the slightest degree. What alone concerns me is not will the women be ungrateful—not whether, if they obtain the franchise, they will use it for the first time against myself and against the other hon. Gentlemen who will support my Motion to-night; but whether they are justly entitled to the vote. I recollect a memorable instance of a large body of men, in the shape of compound householders, proving very ungrateful. When the compound householder was enfranchised, mainly through the exertions of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. John Bright), at the very next election, which happened in a short time afterwards, my right hon. Friend, who then sat for Manchester, was turned out by the very compound householders whom he had laboured to enfranchise. Manchester has had its punishment since that day, for it has never recovered that proud political position which it then held in the estimation of the country. Now, take the illustration as to the qualifications of women in regard to the teaching of the young. My right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella), if he were here, would confirm what I am about to say in regard to the board schools at Saltaire. I went through those schools with my friend Mr. George Salt. I saw, in every class room, mixed classes of boys and girls; I saw that every teacher in every class room was a woman; and my friend (Mr. G. Salt) told me—if the House will pardon the expression—that the head master of the school was a woman, and that the managers found very much more progress made—not in education alone, but in good manners and in every respect which is important to the training of the young—under the teaching of women than they had formerly experienced under the teaching of men. As another illustration of the injustice sanctioned, by law with regard to women, may I mention the bribery which took place at the last General Election of 1880; and especially may I refer to the town of Macclesfield, which, I am sorry to say, is in the North of England, for there bribery prevailed to such an extent that more than half the voters were proved to have been bribed, and that not a few of them had received bribes from both sides. A Royal Commission was sent down. Many days were spent in the examination of the cases of bribery; the Members were unseated, and some of the lawyers who had been agents were imprisoned for the part they had taken in corrupting the electors, and many thousands of pounds were saddled upon the ratepayers of Macclesfield. Who paid those thousands of pounds? Did those corrupt men? No. In the town of Macclesfield there were registered electors 5,500, and there were women ratepayers to the number of 1,589. Those innocent women, being ratepayers and householders, had to pay a considerable portion of the charge which had been levied upon the town of Macclesfield for the bribery and corruption of the men. Is that not a great case of injustice sanctioned by the law? I am quite aware that the injustice falls upon the pure electors just as much as it falls upon the women; but then the pure electors or voters, at all events, had some compensation and some power which hitherto has been denied to the women. Now, there is another illustration which comes nearer home to myself. I have known in manufacturing towns, where I have resided all my life—I have known many cases of honest women having drunken and worthless husbands, who neglected their work, neglected the feeding and clothing of their families, neglected their families' education, and who by their vices had considerably shortened their own lives. I have known those men die; and I have seen their widows left with a number of small children, not one of them possibly able to work; I have seen those women, I will not say manfully, but heroically facing their distressed circumstances, working hard for their children, gradually clothing them, gradually bringing beds and fresh furniture into the houses, for in many cases the furniture in their former homes had been taken away to gratify the vices of their husbands. I have seen them pay their husbands' debts, keep a roof over the heads of themselves and families, educate their children, pay the rent regularly, and yet, because these persons are women, and incomparably superior in every respect to the worthless husbands they had lost a short while before, they are not allowed to give a vote, while the worthless husbands had been allowed that privilege. Will any person venture to tell me that if anyone should have been deprived of the vote, it should not have been the man who so neglected his family and duties, but the woman? Surely, under such circumstances, instead of being deprived of the vote, the woman who had proved herself fully competent to discharge all the duties of citizenship should have all the rights of a citizen conferred on her. Now, cases of this kind are continually coming up. The more I see of them, the more I am convinced that this question is a righteous question. The question is making progress. A great many of the Town Councils in the country, and in Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, have expressed their approval by Memorials and Petitions. The Town Councils of the cities of Manchester, Edinburgh, Newcastle-on-Tyne, Exeter, Huddersfield, and other towns have expressed their wish by Petitions to this House that the vote shall be no longer kept back from women who, I have already said, now possess the right to vote in many other cases. I do sincerely hope, that as regards the limitations of the question, I have made myself perfectly clear; and I hope that the present Government, in the course of the next Session of Parliament, when they bring on what many of us are expecting—namely, a great Reform Bill, will be bold enough to include in it the conferring of the franchise upon women who are qualified in the way I have stated. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I rise to second the Resolution which has been proposed by my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Mason); and I think that the fact of my doing so affords sufficient evidence that this is, in no sense of the word, a Party question. If other evidence of that were required, I could give it in the fact that, in the year 1866, Mr. Disraeli expressed himself on this important question in these words—

“A woman having property ought now to have a vote in the country in which she may hold Manorial Courts, and sometimes act as churchwarden.”

Now, Sir, those words are clear and definite enough, and they emanate from the late Head of the great Party to which I have the honour to belong. But, if we want still further evidence of how little this question is mixed up with Party considerations, we shall find it in the fact that, in the same year in which the late Mr. John Stuart Mill introduced this question of electoral reform—namely, in March, 1869, Mr. Disraeli said—

“What we desire to do is to give to everyone who is worthy of it a fair share in the government of the country by means of the elective franchise.”

I think there can be hardly any dispute that the word “everyone” includes women as well as men; and that, in the few words in which the great statesman expressed himself, he clearly showed that he considered it an act of injustice to withhold the privilege of the franchise from women. Sir, I should like to preface the few observations I wish to make, by asking the House to consider why the passing of this measure has been so long postponed? I venture to think that the reason may be, perhaps, the fact that those who sit with me on these Benches have sometimes considered the change too Radical, while some hon. Members on the other side of the House have considered the change too Conservative; so that, between the two considerations, the supporters of this question have found themselves on the horns of a dilemma. Those who are justly entitled to the privilege which they do not now enjoy are the sufferers by the diversity of opinion. Now, I admit that the argument of the hon. Gentlemen who sit below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House is a very plausible one. For, of course, it cannot be denied that the admission of women to the privilege of the franchise puts an end once and for ever to any question of manhood suffrage. But, still, I cannot help thinking that this will scarcely be an argument against it. I, however, do not propose to discuss the question this evening from the point of view of its possible advantages and disadvantages to the Party to which I belong, or to the Party opposite. All I wish to do is to state, I trust clearly and fairly, the arguments which weigh in my mind in favour of the Motion of the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne. Sir, it appears to me that one of the principal arguments why women have not been admitted to the exercise of the electoral franchise is, that the men who make the laws of this country are apt to confound the word “power” with the word “superiority.” It is undoubted that men, as the governing body of the country, and governing voice of the nation, have the power to withhold that franchise from women which they themselves enjoy; and is it not equally true that they are apt to find excuses for withholding that privilege, on the ground of supposed superiority, which exists, I am bound to say, purely in their own imagination? Let me, for a moment, consider the arguments which have been used against this measure. I may begin by saying that I was, indeed, delighted to hear from the hon. Gentleman who proposed this Motion that he did not intend to include married women within its scope. I am entirely of his opinion. I would simply grant the franchise to widows and spinsters; and I think, by so doing, both he and I would disarm, to a great extent, those hon. Members who urge, as an argument against this Resolution, that women would be departing from the province of their sex, would be called away from the duties which belong essentially to women, if married women were allowed to exercise the franchise, and thereby to be carried away by the heat and strife of Party politics. But what my hon. Friend proposes to do—and it is a proposition with which I entirely agree—is, that those women who have already a right to vote in municipal elections and school boards, where they can also sit, being widows and spinsters, should have a further extension of that privilege, and be enabled to vote for the persons they may think fit to represent them in the House of Commons. Sir, I am well aware that those who are opposed to this measure use as an argument against it an alleged inferiority of the reasoning powers of women and their inadequate education; too prone to adopt the view expressed by Shakespeare, when he said—

“I have no other than a woman’s reason;
I think him so, because I think him so.”

That argument, supposing it to hold good in the days of Shakespeare, supposing it to have held good in a period nearer to our own, cannot be used in the present day. The educational progress of women is, perhaps, greater than that of men; and the development of that educational progress has arisen mainly from the fact that many of those barriers, which were felt alike by men and women, have been removed. Women have now the advantage of going to the great Universities. Have they destroyed the character of those Universities? Certainly not. They have raised their own position; they have developed their own intelligence; they have shown that they are equally gifted with men. They have shown, now, they have the advantages they did not have formerly; that they are capable of engaging with men in a fair contest of educational warfare. If that be the case, surely it, in itself, speaks volumes in favour of the extension of the suffrage to women. We are apt to consider women by the light in which they were regarded in the days of our forefathers; we are apt to remember how the women of 100 years ago had not opportunities for education; but devoted such energies as they might possess to strumming on the spinnet, and exercising their culinary powers in making syllabubs and preserving fruits. All this is changed; it would be bad indeed if we were now obliged to substitute the simple maiden, in the shape of Clarissa Harlowe, for the intellectual giantess, George Eliot. As a matter of fact, these two examples illustrate the difference between the women of to-day and those of 100 years ago. And if we admit that women are intellectually superior to-day to what they were 100 years ago, why should we deprive them of the privilege which we enjoy ourselves? What possible argument can be used against it? Why should they not be allowed to express an opinion as to the men who are best fitted to represent them in Parliament? They have a stake in the country; they have intelligence to appreciate their duties and responsibilities to the State. What can possibly be urged against the extension of this privilege to them, which we, as men, hold and enjoy? Another argument which is used against the proposal is, that it is the thin edge of the wedge; that if we allow women to have votes for Members of Parliament, the time will not be far distant when they themselves will aspire to the position of occupying seats in the House. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE: Hear, hear!] My right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge cheers that idea. I myself should be the first to oppose anything of the sort, to oppose it strongly; and I am bound to say I do not think it in any way follows that, because a woman exercises her right to vote for a Member of Parliament, she would, as a natural sequitur, claim a right to sit in the House of Commons. I would remind my hon. Friend that, although beneficed clergymen have a right to vote, still they are not allowed to sit in this House; and, surely, the same power which gives and confers a right to vote to beneficed clergymen, and withholds from them the privilege of a seat in this House, could grant to women the right to vote subject to the same restriction; otherwise, it would follow that whatever might be the profession in which a woman might directly or indirectly engage, she would have the right to claim the highest posts in it. Take the case of the Army; would anyone say that, because a woman like Florence Nightingale devoted the best years of her life to alleviating pain on the field of battle, she would have the right to aspire to become a General in the field? Would anyone say that, because women have risked their lives at sea, like Grace Darling, and more recently like the brave women at the Mumbles Head, that those women may aspire to be Admirals of Her Majesty's Fleet? You might just as well say that, because women of the present day pass many weary hours in copying for law-stationers, they, therefore, may aspire to become Lord Chancellors. [An hon. MEMBER: They are lawyers in America.] I am reminded that women are lawyers in America; but it depends entirely whether clients choose to employ them. I do not see why they should not be lawyers here, if they choose. My right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge, very possibly, has in his mind's eye the case of Portia. Of course, the success of women in the Legal Profession entirely depends upon whether people are willing to employ them. I recollect that, some years ago, a similar objection was urged with the same persistency against women being allowed to enter the Profession of Medicine. At the present day, there are many ladies who follow with great success the Profession of Medicine. It is said that is unwomanly and unnatural. It is said that a woman should not be called in to attend a sick man. But they are called in to minister to their own sex, and called to great advantage. I well remember the time when the question was raised whether women were eligible for places on the School Board. I recollect a meeting being held to protest against women sitting upon the School Board, and I equally remember what has been the result. Who is more qualified than a woman to endeavour to educate the young; who more qualified than a woman to look after the training of infant minds? The women who have been elected to our school boards have proved, unquestionably, the fallacy of the arguments of those who opposed their election. All these things, however, do not in any way necessitate the election of women to this House. Government is carried on here, as in all countries, by the men of the country. And it does not follow at all that, if a woman is duly qualified, and holds similar qualifications to men, she should be debarred, because she is a woman, from exercising the privileges which attach to those qualifications. We know that in the course, probably, of this Parliament, a large measure of electoral reform will be introduced. Now, what is the nature of that reform? Broadly, it is to extend the franchise now existing in boroughs to labourers in the counties. We may assume that the labourers in counties are not as highly educated as men in the same walk of life in the boroughs. Still, it is intended to extend the franchise to those men; but, at the same time, to refuse to extend the franchise to those women who may be landowners in the country, and who may actually employ those men. Why is that? Simply because they are women. You give the vote to yokels, but you refuse it to the educated women, on whose bread they live. A greater absurdity can hardly be conceived. In point of fact, these women who own land are of a very considerable number. In England and Wales, according to the Return of owners of land in 1872, called The New Domesday Book, the number of women, who were landowners of one acre and upwards, was given as 37,806 out of 269,547, a proportion of one in seven. In Ireland the proportion is somewhat less; it is only one in eight; and if we assume the proportion of women - householders to men - householders to be the same in the non-municipal and the municipal areas, we arrive at a total of between 300,000 and 400,000 women, who, being householders rated for the relief of the poor, would be rightly entitled to this vote. These figures appear to me to speak for themselves. I believe the fact is not disputed that a very large proportion of women are landowners in this country. They have the same stake in the country as men, they pay the same rates, they have the same responsibilities, and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne pointed out, not only have they the same privileges in some respects, but they are subject to the same penalties. They have, in other matters, the same penalties without the privileges, as was shown by the hon. Member to be the case when they were called upon to contribute to the expenses of a recent Election Petition; but you withhold from them, on account of some inscrutable reason, the privilege which might, to some extent, outweigh this penalty. Well, Sir, I think that, in advancing these few arguments, I have shown that there is no just reason for withholding the suffrage from women, but that there is very great reason indeed for giving it to them. I consider that men enjoy the high honour of a seat in this House as the trustees of the people. Members have, in trust, the privileges and the rights of the people; and the system by which they are entrusted with those rights and privileges is based on the principle that those who have a stake in the country are those who are most anxious to preserve the integrity and the honour of the country. It has never been assumed that women are less loyal than men—in fact, history has shown us in this country, as in every other country, that women are loyal, patriotic, and self-sacrificing. Facts have shown us that they are educated and intelligent; and I wish, Sir, to know what possible reason there can be, in the face of the facts enumerated, why the British House of Commons should withhold from women privileges and rights to which they are, in my mind, equally entitled with men?

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, the Parliamentary Franchise should be extended to women who possess the qualifications which entitle men to vote, and who in all matters of local government have the right of voting,"—(Mr. Hugh Mason,) —instead thereof.

MR. E. A. LEATHAM: Mr. Speaker, my hon. Friend who made this Motion has just told us that the question is making progress. Now, I have watched the question in this House for many years, and I cannot congratulate my hon. Friend upon the fact that it grows any stronger as it grows older. When my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) had charge of it, and the hon. Member who followed him—I do not know whether I ought to say, in the championship, or in the chaperonship—it used to assume the robust proportions of a full-grown Bill. Then it sunk to the dimensions of a Tuesday's Motion—and a Tuesday's Motion which was always coming on, and did not. And latterly it has dwindled down to the lowest form which a Motion can take, to be a Motion at all; I mean a Friday's Motion on going into Committee of Supply. Nor can I remember a single question which has taken so feeble a hold of its sponsors. They are, at best, biennials. They flourish for a couple of years, and then they disappear. Now, why is this? Is it because hon. Gentlemen do not like to be thoroughly refuted more than twice? What has become of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, who used to advocate this question with marked ability? He has abdicated long ago. It will be the turn of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Mason) to abdicate next year. But, although the faces of the advocates of women's suffrage in this House are always changing, there is no change in their expression. They all come up smiling. Nothing can exceed the cheerful confidence with which they ask us why we refuse to make women the political equals of men? Just as though it were the most natural thing in the world to do so. The simplicity is positively touching with which my hon. Friend invites us to ignore the universal practice of mankind in all countries and in all ages. I see that doubts were thrown upon my Radicalism by a daily organ of the Press this morning, because I oppose this Motion. But I venture to think that the man who turns his back upon the immemorial experience of mankind is much more than a Radical—he is a Nihilist. Now, my hon. Friend has taken great pains to prove to us that this Motion has no reference to the votes of married women. I differ from him. I speak under correction, for there are many lawyers in this House; but I maintain that if this Motion were embodied in a Bill, it would admit married women, qualifying under the Married Women's Property Act, to the franchise. And, whatever my hon. Friend may say, many of his supporters are anxious to extend the franchise in that direction. It was only this morning that I received, through the post, a printed letter signed by Mrs. Bright, in which this view was put forward with considerable eloquence and force. And reference was made to a measure which some time ago was introduced in this House, and which we are informed by the writer of the letter was "carefully drawn so as to include married women." Now, Sir, but for the protestations of my hon. Friend, I should have supposed that this Motion was "carefully drawn so as to include married women." But whether this Motion goes this length or not, so far as it goes it is based upon the principle of the political equality of the sexes, or it is based upon nothing. And let my hon. Friend consider a few of the things which he has to do before he is entitled to proclaim this principle. In the first place, he has to repeal no inconsiderable portions of the law of the land. This clearly decrees the subordination of the sex, at all events in marriage—and marriage is the normal state of woman—for Miss Becker, who knows this question if anybody does, declares that—

"Every woman regards marriage either from the side of experience or of expectation."

And the subordination of the sex in marriage is based upon the declarations of Holy Writ. My hon. Friend, therefore, before he has his way, must expunge certain well-known passages of Scripture. But when he has revised the Scriptures, and amended the law of the land, he will only have reached the beginning of his task. He must proceed to revolutionize the pursuits of woman. These are not at all political, but eminently domestic. It is the pursuits of man which take him away from his home—the robust life of the street and the Forum; the only life, remember, which qualifies for politics. Is woman prepared to join in the rude tussle of the streets? Is she to become more and more masculine every year? Human nature revolts from the idea, and, most of all, that womanly nature which is both the safeguard and the glory of the sex, and which I believe to be invincible. Before my hon. Friend has any right to come down to this House with his unpretending Resolution in his hand, he has to perform one of the labours of Hercules—he has to convince and convert women. For women—I speak of the sex—do not ask for the franchise. This is an undoubted fact; and we see letters in the newspapers from indignant ladies bemoaning the apathy of their sex. What I would ask my hon. Friend, then, is this. Is this franchise of England so cheap and mean a thing that it is to be flung, not to those who ask for it, not to those who will prize it, but to those who sit aloof—surprised, annoyed, amazed, that so many generations of Englishwomen should have lived amongst us, and yet that any man should be so ignorant of their tastes, and wishes, and hopes, as to start up in his place in Parliament and demand for them an ambition which they resent, and a character which they scorn. But no doubt my hon. Friend will say that he does not propose to enfranchise the sex, but only a woman here and there—a few spinsters and widows of a certain standing. Yes; but, so far as he goes, he bases his proposal upon the political equality of the sexes; and the fact that he only proposes to enfranchise one woman in 40, and precisely those women who are the least representative of the sex, only shows how illogical his proposal is. In America, which is the home and birth-place of this movement, the women who agitate this question are the logical superiors of my hon. Friend. They demand that women should sit in Congress. They demand the enfranchisement of half the American race, and they naturally speak of sex as an accident, and of marriage as a superstition. But my hon. Friend does none of these things. He does not demand the enfranchisement of half the English people. He does not ask that women shall be admitted to this House. He still clings to marriage as a Divine institution; and he thinks that when a woman is married she should renounce politics and await the nursery. He has told us to-night that if it were proposed to enfranchise married women he would at once wash his hands of the whole question. And he calls this namby-pamby wishy-washy advocacy of Woman's Rights the removal of the electoral disabilities of women. And why are we to enfranchise these women? It cannot be because, as we used to be told, questions affecting woman cannot otherwise be solved fairly by this House; because we have just passed a Married Woman's Property Act, and thus removed the grievance of the sex. And it cannot be because women are taxpayers, because we are no longer living under the Plantagenets; and taxation and representation have long ago shaken hands and parted. In these days of indirect taxation, the man who, for his means, makes the most munificent contribution to the Exchequer is probably the habitual drunkard, of whom my hon. Friend has just spoken, and who has no vote at all. And it cannot be because they are ratepayers, for why should a municipal obligation, already recompensed in kind, confer an Imperial right with which it has nothing to do? And it cannot be because they are owners of property. If property be the basis of the franchise, and the possession of an acre is to give the vote, surely the possession of 10,000 acres ought to give 10,000 votes! The fact is, that none of these things give the vote. They are simply restrictions, and restrictions of the most arbitrary kind, devised from time to time, in order to secure, if possible, the independence of the voter. The suffrage has always been a manhood suffrage in this country; but a manhood suffrage limited to men who were free. Every free and independent man voted in ancient times—the freeman in his borough, the freeholder in his county—and, latterly, when Parliament found that in its desire to enfranchise it had stepped beyond the area of independence, what did it do? It brought up the independence of the voter by giving him the Ballot. What is essential is that every voter should be a man, and that every man who votes should be free. But my hon. Friend jumps to the conclusion that it is the restriction which is the qualification, and he thus overturns the immemorial franchise of the country. But my hon. Friend says—"You have broken through the principle of sex already in the municipalities." I know it, and deplore it. But because we have made one mistake, the consequences of which may be trivial, is that any reason why we should make a second and much more serious mistake, the consequences of which may be enormous? The municipal franchise was given to women by a few words slipped into the Municipal Franchise Act at 1 or 2 o'clock in the morning, when everybody was asleep. The whole question is better understood now; and I venture to think that my hon. Friend will not catch the House napping a second time. "But," says my hon. Friend, "you have broken through the principle of sex again. You have given the School Board franchise to women." Unfortunately for my hon.

Friend, this is not a case in point at all. You were of opinion that women should sit upon school boards, in order to superintend the education of girls, just as they sit upon any other committee which regulates matters specially affecting their own sex. And, having decided to give them the right of being voted for, you were bound to give them the right of voting. For the right of voting implies the right of being voted for. But my hon. Friend does not propose that women should be returned to this House; therefore he has no right to propose that they should vote. So the very illustration by which my hon. Friend proposes to bolster up his argument demolishes it. Sir, I do not think that I need say much more. My hon. Friend, and those who act with him, are fond of posing as the friends of woman. It is they who are to elevate and ennoble the sex. I am one of those who think that the true woman—pure, faithful, modest, and shrinking from all undue publicity—is noble enough already. Let her aspire to fill the high place to which Revelation and the respect of all good men entitle her, and she will never have cause to sigh because she is forbidden to dabble in the mire of a political election.

MR. INDERWICK: I propose to say a few words in opposition to the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne. My hon. Friend has said that this is not a Party question in the sense of being a Party political question, and he has said that on previous occasions expressions were used, which, to say the least of it, were not complimentary to women. I can assure my hon. Friend and the House that, as far as I am concerned, they will not hear a word from me which can be considered in any way offensive or disrespectful to the women who are connected with this movement or their friends. It is a question, undoubtedly, of a serious political character, which must be discussed fairly and properly; and if we agree to the principle, I must express my opinion that if the political franchise ought to be granted to women we ought to grant it to them, not grudgingly or with a sparing hand, but with the same free and open hand that we should grant it to men. I would desire, as little as possible, to say anything which may appear disagreeable to any persons who are connected with this movement. But, after all, the question is not whether we should desire to extend to women what in men every Member of this House must admit to be the legitimate object of an honourable ambition; but we have to consider whether in granting this franchise, whether in taking this step, which is an uprooting of the ancient landmarks and institutions of the country, whether in adopting a policy which has been repudiated by every civilized nation in the world, we shall be doing that which is for the advantage and benefit of this country, in whose prosperity and advance we are all so much interested. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne has brought before the House this particular Resolution. I confess, with my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham), I had some difficulty in coming to the conclusion whether he intended his proposal to extend to women generally, or whether he intended it simply to be extended to women who in matters of local government have a right to vote—that is to say, whether he intended that women generally who have the qualification should vote everywhere, or whether he proposed to extend the franchise only to those women who are now entitled to vote in municipal boroughs. I understand my hon. Friend means to restrict his Motion to women who are entitled to vote in municipal boroughs; and then I should like to ask my hon. Friend, and his Friends who support him in his proposal, why are Members for boroughs to have the privilege of having women amongst their constituents, and why is not the privilege to be extended to counties where women have the qualification? I do not want to be too critical.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: I am sure my hon. and learned Friend will not wish to misunderstand me. I wish to extend the privilege equally to the counties.

MR. INDERWICK: I quite understood from what my hon. Friend opposite said that that was his view; but I was simply referring to the words of the Resolution which gives to the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne a very limited and restricted application. Some objection is usually taken—and I dare say it will be taken by someone to-night—that we are taking what you call the limited and restricted privilege which is proposed, and upon that discussing the general principle of the political enfranchisement of women. It is not competent for my hon. Friend to bring before the House a proposal of a very limited character—it may be limited to the very smallest degree to which it can be limited—with the view of obtaining the assent of the House, and, if that proposal is based on a broad principle, to say we are not justified in discussing to the fullest extent the question of the principle upon which the proposal is made. My hon. Friends have brought before the House what I consider to be a fancy franchise. It may suit some of them to say that that is all they desire; but we know perfectly well that it is not what their clients desire—it is not what is desired by the women who are associated with this movement. We know perfectly well, from what is stated elsewhere, and from what one hears from Members of this House, that the foundation of this proposal is not a limited franchise of this kind, but a general franchise of women who have property and pay rates. That being so, the question we have to discuss—and the question I propose, with the permission of the House, to say a few words upon—is the question of whether, under any circumstances whatever, it is desirable in the interests of this country that the political franchise should be extended to women? With regard to the argument that is brought forward about women voting at municipal elections, and having a right to discuss the mode in which the money is spent in these municipal boroughs, if that argument is based on the ground that the money so spent is contributed to by them, and is expended in respect of their property amongst others in these municipalities, then the sort of proposal which should have been made to the House would be that they should have the right to vote for Members of Parliament, so long as the duty of these Members was confined to voting on the expenditure of public money. But we know perfectly well that the House is not always in Committee of Supply, and is not always voting away the money of widows and spinsters. There are other important obligations on Members of Parliament, with regard to which also women must have a right, if they are to have a right at all. I do not know whether the House entirely appreciates the magnitude of the question now under consideration. According to the Census in the year 1881, there were in this country 17,000,000 men from whom the electorate is taken. I do not know exactly what the number of electors is at this moment, but it is some millions; and it is proposed, by extending the franchise in counties, to increase that number very considerably. With regard to the women, according to the last Census, there were 18,000,000 women; and that is the body of persons from whom the future electorate, as it is proposed here, is to be chosen. That electorate is limited exceedingly now by my hon. Friend; but it would never bear that limitation if the principle were once adopted. If this proposal is, in fact, adopted by the House, the result will be that the House will commit itself to the principle of the political enfranchisement of women; and, having committed itself to that principle, there is no reason and no argument that I can understand for stopping short at the point at which the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne now says he is prepared to stop short. If I am not much mistaken, there are other Members in this House who will probably vote for my hon. Friend's proposal, who would be ready now to stand up in the House and advocate a greater extension. [Cheers.] The cheers of my hon. Friends say that that is so; and they show that what we are really practically discussing now is not the limited proposal of my hon. Friend, but the great question whether women, for political purposes, are to stand on the same basis as men? One of the great arguments in favour of my hon. Friend's proposal is the fact that women enjoy the municipal franchise. If the House will permit me, I should like to say how it is that they enjoy that franchise. It is generally suggested, and stated in the House, that women obtained that franchise under the Act of 1869. To a certain extent that is correct; but it is not the whole of the statement. The fact is this—that in some Corporations—in fact, in most Corporations of the country before the Reform Act of 1835—women, who were the wives and daughters of freemen, had certain privileges. They could make freemen of their husbands; and widows of freemen, on marrying again, had also the same privileges. In certain circumstances, these women at one time, and for many years, had a right to vote at the municipal contests. When the Municipal Reform Bill was introduced in 1835, and passed with the general assent of both sides of the House, that franchise was taken away from the women. It was not passed over without debate. It was debated in this House to this extent—that, on Report of the Bill, one hon. Member proposed that the word "male" should extend to "female," and said there were numbers of women who might be disqualified, principally, I believe, in the City of Bath, which has always, from the oldest days, been celebrated for a considerable number of widows and spinsters; and he made a proposal that a clause should be inserted to that effect. There was no debate on the Motion. Nobody supported it but the hon. Member; a Division was taken, and it was rejected by a majority of 66. The matter there ended; and in that Bill of 1835 the municipal franchise which existed in the hands of women was swept away by the general consent of both sides of the House. Then this state of things happened. The Local Government Board have the power to grant certain Charters to new Corporations, and in granting these Charters they gave power to women being rate-payers in the municipalities to vote; and as these Corporations increased this anomaly occurred—that there were, in certain parts of the country, certain Corporations where women were permitted to vote, and certain Corporations where they were not permitted to vote. The Government of the day thought it desirable that they should be put on the same footing, so that the anomaly might be done away with, and a Bill was brought in for that purpose in 1869, 35 years after the Municipal Reform Act. It passed through this House without any debate whatever. I have looked through Hansard for 1869, and I do not find that there was a single line of debate in this House with reference to that Bill. My hon. Friend says there was. He may have been in the House at the time; but so inconsiderable was the debate, if any, which took place, that not one line of it appears in Hansard. There was a debate on it in the House of Lords, and, as far as I can judge, it occupied the space of about 10 minutes. One noble Lord made some objection to the Bill. The Earl of Kimberley, expressly guarding himself against committing the House to the general principle of women's suffrage, pointed out the anomalies of the system; and thereupon Earl Cairns stated, in a few words, the reason why the franchise should be granted. Earl Cairns said that as an unmarried woman could dispose of her property, and deal with it in any way she thought proper, he did not know why she should not have a voice in saying how that property should be lighted, and how it should be watched, and have a voice in controlling municipal expenditure to which that property contributed. It is clear the reason for granting that franchise to women in municipal boroughs who had property in them was to enable them to have a voice in regulating that expenditure to which they contributed in respect of that property. When the Bill was passed no reference was made to Scotland or to Ireland. Certain hon. Members from Scotland who took an interest in this question were told that the women of Scotland did not care about the municipal franchise, or they would have called for a Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow (Dr. Cameron), who exercises some inscrutable influence over the ballot box, immediately balloted for a day, and brought in a Bill to extend the municipal franchise to women in Scotland, arguing that, it having been granted in England, there was no reason why it should not be granted in Scotland, and thus succeeded in getting rid of the argument which was thrown at him with regard to Scottish women. I venture to express the opinion that had it not been for the question of woman's suffrage being agitated throughout the country at the time, we should not have heard a word of the Scottish Woman's Municipal Franchise Bill. Under the circumstances, I ask the House how can it be said that the House has committed itself to the political franchise of women in passing that Bill without opposition? None of the arguments upon which this question is upheld are new, as I have said. We have had an argument from the hon. Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry De Worms) which is not a new one, and, indeed, it cannot be expected that throughout the debate there can be anything new; because the subject has been so long and so often before Parliament and the country that it is impossible to say anything new upon it; yet it is, of course, desirable that when a question of this kind is brought forward it should be debated, and we cannot give our votes altogether without speech. The hon. Member said the higher education of women, which qualified them for holding certain positions, likewise qualified them to exercise a political vote. They do hold certain quasi-public offices, which they have held by right immemorial and by Act of Parliament, and he says there is no reason why you should not go a step further and give them a right of voting for Members of Parliament. He gave as an instance that women might be churchwardens and overseers, and I will add to that, they may be parish constables, and they may even be High Sheriffs, which, under certain circumstances, might entail the office of public executioner, and one or two other offices a woman may hold; but I think these offices were allowed them in the past as much for the opportunity of extorting fines from them as for anything else; and if we find, as a matter of fact, that they never do hold such offices, what are we to think? It is one of the stock arguments that the Sovereign power can be held by a woman, and I do not say it is not a fair argument; but the power of the Sovereign is so bound down by Constitutional limits, that it is very little power that can be exercised by the Crown. Now, there is one reason brought forward why we should give the franchise to women. It is this—there are, it is said, as many—in fact, more—women in the country than men, and, therefore, they have as many or more social interests than men; and, inasmuch as Parliamentary control is in the hands of men, men are likely to be unfavourably disposed towards women, and to treat them unequally in legislation, dealing with their property and their social position. That is the statement made; and I should very much like to see whether, in the result, women have suffered any substantial injustice under the law of this country. I will first take the case of women of property. Can any hon. Member now, in this year 1883, say that any woman in the country has not absolute control over her own property? She has. It was a misfortune discreditable to this country that for many years she had not that control. It was discussed by a Parliament of men, and a reform was brought about. It was not obtained suddenly; it has been done gradually and with due consideration; and we have the result that, at the present time, it is impossible to say that any woman is not sufficiently protected in her property. And I will venture to say that women of the upper classes were fairly and reasonably protected before; for it has been the habit of this country, from time immemorial, when property was left to women, to make such arrangements by settlements that women had a great protection for their property, and this was not sufficiently recognized at the time of the debates in this House. It is said, apart from this, that there are legal disabilities attaching to women in regard to the devolution of property by death or otherwise. Let us see how that is. If a man dies possessed of personal estate and leaves no will, then his heirs, men and women, share alike; but if he holds real estate, then the eldest son takes the real estate to the prejudice of the rest of the family. But it prejudices the brothers quite as much as the sisters; it is not a sinister prejudice against women; it is the position of the heir-at-law, a position which, however, in my opinion, ought to be altered. My view is that in devolution of property in cases of intestacy, real property should go in the same way as personal property. But after all this is not a large question, for very little property descends in that way. We know it has been debated from time to time in the House; and, no doubt, if any hon. Member brings in a Bill bearing on the case, it will receive very careful consideration, and probably arrive at a second reading. And now let me take the personal protection of women. Our laws are very stringent even now for the protection of young women, and the other House have recently passed a measure to increase the protection for young women. In addition to that, there are provisions by which protection is thrown over women who work in factories and mines that they shall not be employed beyond their powers. And there is another principle in our law which must not be left out of sight. If a man and wife are joined together in the consummation of a crime, the fact of their acting together does not acquit the woman of the crime, but it absolves her from the penalty. This is a kindly and merciful provision of our law from time immemorial, and must not be left out of view in considering the effect of legislation on the position of women. Now, under the Married Women's Property Act, there is power to the husband or wife to prosecute each other for theft. Objection was made in both Houses that this clause was not expedient or desirable in the interest of married persons. Now, I cannot exactly vouch for the correctness of it; but I read in the papers a return of the number of convictions of married persons under the Act of stealing from one another, and out of 15 such convictions, in 14 cases they were women, and in one case a man. If that is so, it only shows that, to some extent, a mistake was made in removing the protection which before that time had proved of a kindly nature. The hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne has referred to the question of married women; there has always been a difficulty how to deal with them in relation to this matter, and the difficulty has never been met in a reasonable, or even a plausible, manner. Why, if you give the franchise to women at all, should you, under such circumstances, exclude married women? Some supporters of the proposal do not want to exclude them; but my hon. Friend says nothing would induce him to admit them to the franchise, and the general impression is that they should not be admitted. Why? Is it on account of property? Certainly not, for if a married woman can hold property, can own a house, and she and her husband occupy it, there is no reason why she should not have a vote on account of property for which she pays rates and taxes. It is her own property, with which she is as free to deal as if she had been a single woman, and yet my hon. Friend says he would not admit a married woman to the franchise! They say you must not invade the sanctity of the hearth and home. Well; but all married women do not live with their husbands; some have husbands serving their country, or fulfilling duties abroad, some are apart under directions of the Court, some under deeds of separation. Many wives live apart from their husbands, just as single women might, occupying their own house, living upon their own money; but you say you would not give a vote to these married women. Why not? If marriage is not a disqualification to men, why should it be to women? Here a difficulty arises, and my hon. Friends are discussing it among themselves, some saying—"Let them have it;" and others saying—"Under no circumstances whatever." Let me put this suggestion to the House, and ask how you would deal with it. We heard a few years ago a good deal about fagot votes; it means that a man may give to a friend, or a person in whom he has confidence, a cottage and a piece of land to qualify him for a vote. Now, under an existing statute recently passed, a man may assign a cottage or house to his wife, and by this means make his wife a fagot voter; and if he agrees with his wife he will have two votes, and if not he will be disfranchised. It may be right or it may not; but if allowed, there will be an addition to fagot voters far beyond any now existing in any county in England. I bring forward these matters to show the House how this question is surrounded by difficulties. As to a seat in this House, so far as I am personally concerned, if I had to choose between two evils, I would very much rather see one of the intelligent women connected with this movement sitting in the House and taking part in the debates than I would consent to give the franchise to the whole of the sisterhood. But this is not the view of my hon. Friends, for they stand up and say, under no circumstances would they allow women a seat in the House; and I must say it is exceedingly ungenerous of my hon. Friends to say—"We will accept your votes at the poll, but we will not give you ours in return." I have alluded to these matters of difficulty; but I do not say that because there are difficulties a proposal should be rejected or passed over. It is the duty of statesmen to get over difficulties, or to go round if they cannot get over, if the object is desirable. But when you find a question of this kind surrounded with difficulties—when, from whatever point of view it is regarded, some obstacle stands in the way—then I think the House must say, as I now say, although I know I shall not get much assent from my hon. Friends near me, this is a question not within the range of practical politics. There is one matter which I believe presses on the minds of hon. Members, and is supposed to have originated with the late Lord Beaconsfield—it is the argument that female suffrage is the best, if not the only, effectual barrier to an ever-increasing Democracy. It is said that as we go on the franchise cannot be raised; it must be lowered; and we shall go lower until we get to men of bad and revolutionary passions, and we shall be tempted to make overtures to them, and to deal with them in a way not for the interest of the country, and we shall find the franchise of women a check and a control upon that, and the anticipated evils may thus be met. I admit this is an agreeable and a seductive argument; but it is founded on a fallacy. If you admit the principle of political franchise for women, you must treat them on the same footing as if they were men; and as you lower the franchise to men, so must you lower it to women; and how, then, are you to control or oppose the bad passions of a low class of men by adding to them, as you must, the bad passions of a low class of women? Do you think, if you consider the class of persons to whom you would give the franchise—greatly extended, as it must be in course of time—that the House would not come to a right conclusion if they decided that it is not desirable to extend the franchise in the way now proposed? I shall, of course, vote against this proposal. I believe, myself, that extending the political franchise to women would be a calamity to this country. It will add thousands, if not tens of thousands, to that now too numerous class of electors who never know their own minds from time to time, and who are swayed by the sentiment of the moment; and we know, from the great revolutions of political feeling which are increasing in the country, that it is this class of electors that renders the task of government more and more difficult, because they impede a continuous policy so desirable, if not necessary, in legislation and in the conduct of foreign affairs. There are many of my Friends who I know are interested in this movement, and I feel that in giving my vote I shall be helping to deprive them of an opportunity of political triumph; but, at the same time, I am satisfied that to adopt this principle would not be for the permanent advantage either of the country or of the sex on whose behalf it is proposed.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I had not intended to take part in this debate; but the observations of the hon. and learned Member who has just sat down induce me to say a few words, not on behalf of the proposal of the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne—for I have not heard the exact tenour of his Motion—but in support of the general principle of admitting women to the franchise. Now, the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Inderwick) concluded a speech of considerable interest by a statement that the main objection he had to this proposal was that it would increase the class of fluctuating political opinion in the country. Now, in that view I do not for a moment agree. I do not believe it would increase the amount of fluctuating political opinion. I differ from the hon. and learned Gentleman; and I think the views of women on the great social and economical and moral questions of the day, which are really of more importance than the so-called political questions, are far more stable than those of men. I cannot but think the hon. and learned Member must have been somewhat unfortunate in his experience—I do not say it in a derogatory sense—he must have been somewhat unfortunate with regard to those women whose views he has had an opportunity of learning. So far as I have had the advantage of hearing the opinions of women on any definite subject, I have found them devoted—continually, consistently, permanently devoted—to what I may describe as the reformation of the human race. [Laughter.] I must beg the hon. and learned Member for Colchester (Mr. Willis) to restrain himself. Women are devoted to the cause of temperance, to the cause of morality; they are devoted to the improvement of the condition of the poor, and with more or less, though not quite equal, intelligence to the cause of education. They are a refining and elevating influence in all the social relations of life. These are my general reasons for differing from the hon. and learned Member's statement. But I have a special reason for supporting this Resolution to-night, which is, as far as lies in my power, to remove from the question of women's suffrage the stigma of being represented entirely by a section of the House, in which I am sure, as a rule, women take a very small amount of interest. It appears to me this question can be regarded from several aspects. If you regard it from a logical point of view, it is clear nothing can be said against it; it is absolutely impossible to avoid recognizing the claim of women to the franchise. In almost every other sphere of life they possess rights and exercise onerous duties on a full equality with men. Women are allowed to occupy the most distinguished position in the State; the illustrious Lady who has ruled over these Realms with so much advantage for 40 years discharges functions far more important than any it is proposed to bestow on women by the Motion of the hon. Member. To the amplest extent they hold and administer property; they can be guardians and executors. You allow women to enjoy the municipal suffrage, and you allow them to take part in all the more important and difficult functions of life; they are now allowed to enter upon the Medical Profession, and with general benefit. It is perfectly clear that, from a logical standpoint, you cannot possibly refuse them the Parliamentary franchise. I admit there is some difficulty about proceeding to a further stage and giving them a seat in this House. I am quite prepared to allow that the position of a lady of great ability, and possibly of great attractions, as Prime Minister, might occasionally be open to some objections that must occur to any hon. Member. But I do not think an argument of this sort is worth much; it is the reductio ad absurdum; and we need not consider it. This is only a stage of progress. It does not follow that because we confer on women the Parliamentary suffrage that they would be admitted to that Bench—though, at the same time, I am free to confess they would adorn it very much more than some of its present occupants. Then there is the sentimental point of view. What can be said against it from that point? We are told it will be a horrible thing to divide families and give rise to divergence of view between husband and wife—they would surely fall out over the exercise of the franchise. Well, I think that a very considerable amount of divergence of view exists occasionally at present, and I do not think it would be very dangerously increased by giving women the franchise. The world would not be happier or more rational if all husbands and wives held a dull consensus of view upon every subject. But there is another reason that can be urged in support of the Motion which I have rather suggested than stated definitely. It is obvious that to confer the suffrage on women is essentially a Conservative measure. ["Oh, oh!"] The principle of Conservatism is to defend and secure all that is good and stable in our social and political Constitution. Women are devoted to the same objects, and therefore they must prove a Conservative force in the State. A quotation was made from a remark of a very great and illustrious man, now no more, by the hon. and learned Member who spoke last. He quoted an expression of the late Lord Beaconsfield in favour of this extension of the suffrage; and, if I had any doubt about it before, that quotation would be sufficient to induce me to view the question with favour. I therefore urge this last as an additional reason why hon. Members on this side should support the Motion. I feel I have supported the cause very inadequately; for I had no intention of intruding myself on the House when I came down; but I have given a few reasons why I think the suffrage should be extended to women, and, with the permission of the House, I will sum them up. It cannot be denied to them from a logical standpoint; there is nothing of real weight, from a sentimental point of view, to induce us to refuse the franchise; and it would be a Conservative measure, which has had the recommendation of the greatest statesman of this century.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE: I am sorry that the House should be so empty; but we all know that those who generally may be expected to be seen here are engaged at present in an amusement which is thought to be more congruous to the portion of the human race in whose favour you are called upon to-night to legislate than to Senators. I was rather amused at the refreshing and candid speech of my hon. Friend who has just sat down. After a few observations about fluctuating political opinion, and so on, he candidly confessed that he voted for this measure because he thought it was a Conservative one. Well, I own, Sir—and I think the House will believe in my sincerity—that, deep as my political convictions may be, I desire on this matter to vote without any regard to the chance of success, on one side or the other, of the Bill, treated as an electioneering measure. There is something even deeper and nearer to the heart than Party politics, and that is the politics of patriotism and of nature; and I believe that to these politics belongs this question of the enfranchisement of that half of the world which no doubt are quite equal to us—very likely much superior to us—but who are different from us, that difference being the eternal one, which, in spite of sentimental theorists, will exist to the end of the world. I say that the consideration of this enfranchisement belongs not to Party, but to patriotic considerations; and, belonging as it does to patriotic and to natural politics, it is found to exclude the project from the category of healthy and possible innovations. Well, and what are the reasons for it? I have been amused to-night at the vagueness of the arguments which have been urged, and which are not more vague than the premisses on which they are based are far-reaching. The female guardians, the female householder—these form the pretext; and all the arguments tending to the emancipation of the woman—whether householder, whether freeholder, whether married or single—are based on these phenomena, though the Married Women's Property Act in the Statute Book destroys the limitation on which the hon. Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Mason) insisted with such candour and sincerity. I cannot really believe that this proposal, if it were carried, would not go beyond the limited class for whom it in this House and for this night appeals. I cannot for one instant believe in the comfortable predictions which have been adventured. It is, and it always has been, a question not of the female ratepayer, but of the woman. I appeal to the pamphlet which on a former occasion I quoted, I believe, rather largely in this House. I do not mean to quote it to-day, though there are some passages in it which might be instructive and diverting to those who have not read it before—it was the opinions of 100 women of intellect and of ability, and some of them of conspicuous position, brought together by the Women's Suffrage Society. If this pamphlet happens to have been sent round again on the present occasion, I very much commend it to those who have not read it, to see what are the prospects, the expectations, and the arguments brought forward by those who really are at the bottom of the agitation, and who do not, like my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry De Worms), dally about the question with the tips of their fingers. It is really worth while to consider what the state of affairs now is. We have heard in various directions that there is in the air, somewhere or nowhere, a very large scheme for the enlargement of the franchise—great masses of people will be brought in who have not hitherto enjoyed the vote; and upon that scheme, as if it were a parasite hanging on to it, we are asked to engraft the enfranchisement of women. Well, now, what is that but universal suffrage, and universal suffrage in a sense in which no one has ever openly announced it? My hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich ventured a remark which puzzled me at the time, and I have not yet quite made out whether it was an argument, as it came from his mouth, or a joke—if a joke it was rather a good one, if an argument not so good—but it was to the effect that this enfranchisement of women would at least get rid of manhood suffrage. It would get rid of manhood suffrage, for it would become manhood and womanhood suffrage; it would be like the gentleman engaged in the shoe trade, who trumped his neighbour's advertisement, Mons conscia recti, by the superior announcement, Men's and women's conscia recti. When it was objected that this legislation would expose us to see women in Parliament, the question was gravely asked—Why should we not see women in Parliament? The hon. Member for Eye (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) drew a very pretty and picturesque picture of a Prime Minister on that Bench who is to come to some strange, mysterious fate—I suppose it was marrying the Leader of the Opposition and forming a Coalition Government. But depend upon it, if we have women admitted to the franchise the claim for them to be in Parliament simply follows as a matter of course. Do we not see that on the Benches of that mimic Parliament which plays so conspicuous, and on many occasions, I have no doubt, a very useful part—the London School Board—there are lady members on that, and would not the argument be very strong indeed from that fact that there could be no objection to their sitting here? It is a subject on which, of course, one can draw a great many amusing pictures; but really it is almost sickening, in a matter of this sort, in which the interest of the country, in which the peace of Europe, in which the happiness of those vast Colonies—that vast Indian Empire that belongs to us—in which the whole of the future of the world is concerned, to have to deal with grotesque propositions like this—propositions grotesque in themselves, but full of grave evils for those for whom the future of humanity, for whom the true mission of the world is not a matter of political calculation, not a matter of cynical amusement in the articles and paragraphs of current journalism, but is the source of very grave and serious thought. To bring forward a suggestion like this one at the eve of a possible Reform Bill, at a time when opinions are seething and agitating, at a time when all kinds of—I must use a phrase which is, perhaps, not Parliamentary, but which must come out in this debate—at a time which is the reign of omnipotent “fads,” to bring forward the idea of enfranchising that charming portion of mankind, whose influence is so beneficent because it is felt, not seen, is one of the most preposterous and, at the same time, one of the most revolutionary suggestions that could possibly be agitated.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has urged upon the House that this subject should be treated as a very serious business and entirely upon an argumentative basis; but he has allowed his uncontrollable sense of humour to triumph over his logical aspirations; and he has favoured us with one of his very amusing, but, so far as I am concerned, I must say, not very convincing speeches. I have no wish to deal with this question as a joke, either for or against women. The question—whatever the decision of the House may be to-night, or, perhaps, two or three Sessions hence—is a question which, sooner or later, will have to be faced; and I think that in coming to a decision to-night, we should see whether there is any sound logical reason for this proposal, and whether there is any sound logical reason against it. Now, the two hon. Members—my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) and the hon. and learned Member for Rye (Mr. Inderwick)—seemed to me, in their very able and interesting speeches, never to touch the principle on which the franchise in this country is based; whether it be right or wrong, the franchise in this country has been for centuries past, and to-day certainly is, co-existent with either the ownership or the occupation of property. The English Constitution recognizes no question of fitness, as far as intellectual qualification is concerned—the English Constitution, in conferring the franchise, recognizes no principle of social position, of intellectual fitness, or of moral culture. The franchise in this country is given in counties to the owners or occupiers of real property, and is given in boroughs to the occupiers of real property. Of course, no one will suppose that I am overlooking the fact that persons disqualified by the commission of crime are excluded; what I say is, excluding that obvious disqualification, that whether the voter be immoral or moral, whether he be good or bad, if he owns property, and discharges the obligations of the State in respect of that property, the law of the land confers upon him the right to vote in the selection of Representatives in Parliament. That is the principle of the English Constitution. Now, we have admitted in our Constitution a class of owners and occupiers of property of the female sex; and it rests upon those who object to their being entitled to all the advantages, so to speak, of property, to show why they should not enjoy them. It has been put to-night—“Why should women have the franchise?” I rather put it—“Why should they not?” Why should not a spinster, or a widow, a woman discharging all the obligations of the State, paying all the required taxes to the State—why should she not enjoy the right of her unit voice, as far as directing the policy of the State is concerned? We have two contradictory theories from the Benches opposite in reference to this question—first, the theory of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rye; and, secondly, the theory of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope). The hon. and learned Member for Rye stated that women were entitled to the municipal franchise simply and solely because Municipal Councils spend money, and rates are paid by women. As a matter of fact, the duties of Town Councils are not confined to spending money. Their function is the local administration of the whole of the affairs of the borough, and year by year Parliament is extending, and enlarging and elevating, the duties which are confided to our various Town Councils. The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down drew an appalling picture of the politics of Europe being involved in the exercise of this franchise, and held out the prospect of some great national decision, which might be fraught with divers consequences to the Empires of the world being controlled to some extent by female voices. I am quite willing to meet him upon that ground. He must first tell us that women, quâ women, are morally and intellectually inferior to men. I deny that proposition. We were told we were asking for political equality. I say, prove the moral and intellectual inequality—I say, take any question of the politics of this country or Europe, whether it be a question of peace or war; and I say that the opinion of the intelligent woman is just as good as the opinion of an unintelligent man, and a great deal better. The interests which control the decisions of Parliaments affect women quite as much as men. They have, in respect of their personal feeling as well as in respect of their property, a large stake in the prosperity and progress of the country; and unless you can show that there is a public danger from entrusting them with the ordinary consequences of the ownership of their property, I think that the onus probandi rests with the opponents of the Motion rather than with those who advocate it. I am not going to weary the House with a long speech on this question; I want to put the syllogism, so to speak, as shortly and as concisely as I can. Taxation and representation go together; women are taxed; women ought to be represented. There is no public danger in allowing women to enjoy that representation. Now, I know what the answer to me will be—that under the Married Women's Property Act of last year, married women are put into the position of the absolute ownership of their own property, and that, therefore, they ought to be entitled to be put on the same footing as single women. The position of married women is this. A woman by marrying has, deliberately, with her eyes open, surrendered certain advantages—if you like, certain privileges—which would belong to her as a single woman, and she, as a married woman, has no right to complain of the consequences of her marriage. This appeal that is made to Parliament is not made on behalf of married women. Married women are content to leave these interests in the hands of their husbands; and I believe that to introduce a question of political differences into the home would be a step of very grave public danger and disadvantage, and I, for one, should strenuously oppose it. It is not for that that my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne is pleading to-night. It is proposed to extend the franchise to women who, equally with men, are separate, individual owners of property, who discharge all the duties of property, and who, therefore, claim all the rights of property. One word more. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) referred to the legislation in which women are concerned, and said that that legislation had full attention in this House, and that everything they could desire was carried out. I very much doubt that proposition. I think there are a large number of instances in which this House neglects and overlooks questions in which women have the deepest interest, an interest affecting themselves personally, affecting the happiness and progress of their children as well as of themselves. It is because I believe that the extension of this franchise would not be a political danger, but a political benefit; I believe not in its Conservatism or in its Radicalism, but I cannot ignore the historical fact that the influence of women for the last 50 years of the country has, on the whole, been on the side of progress, on the side of the good and true; and therefore I should be glad to see women brought within the pale of the Constitution.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the hon. Member had ended his remarks with a political watchword—Progress. He was afraid that in his dull Constitutionalism he should be obliged to answer that by the question, “Whither?” His objection to this proposal was that it struck at one, and not the least, of the remaining Constitutional foundations of the franchise. While he was listening to the eloquent Member for Greenwich (Baron Henry De Worms) he said to himself—“Has the Semitic race forgotten the difference between a man and a woman?” He was not aware that the unenfranchised women of this country had ever been treated as slaves. He was the surviving collector of the majority that carried the Ten Hours' Act for the protection of women and children in their labour. If anything were said in derogation of women, he would ask—“Have we not a Queen?” We were not afraid of placing women in the highest position when we believed that they had an hereditary right to fill that position. But he had to look to society. He had to look to the constituencies as a whole, and to bear in mind that politics involved a mental, and, too often, a moral, sometimes a physical, warfare; he should no more think of voting for the embodiment of battalions of Amazons, because we had a Queen, than he should of voting for the enfranchisement of women as such. Let hon. Members consider the weight to be attached to the arguments about property as the basis of qualification for the franchise. He (Mr. Newdegate) asserted that, according to the Constitutional history of this country, there was a condition antecedent to the occupation or possession of property, and that condition was fitness. He had seen an hon. Member expelled from that House because he was not of sound mind. He was not fit. Bankrupts were not fit. Women were not fit. Priests were not fit. The Leader of the Irish Members, though nominally a Protestant, was inaugurated, he might say appointed, by a Roman Catholic Archbishop. He could understand his Irish neighbours' reason for advocating the extension of the franchise to women. He believed the priests had too much influence over the men in Ireland, and they would have still more influence with the women. Hon. Members must forgive his having accepted a French teacher—M. Michelet—on this subject. The experience of France had not been wasted upon him. It could not be shown that this House, elected by men only, had neglected the interests of English, Scotch, or Irish women. Had it not years ago passed the Ten Hours' Act for the protection of women and children of the labouring classes? It had also more recently passed Acts giving women more command over property. There was not a particle of evidence that Parliament had become so unmanly; that it knew not how to respect, as their forefathers respected, the position and the privileges of women. He thought sometimes that some hon. Gentlemen opposite had taken their views of the rights of man from the writings of Tom Paine. He was not prepared to accept that kind of teaching with respect to the supposed rights of women, which, he believed, would involve most serious evils. He, moreover, trusted that the men of England felt, as the men of the United States had felt, that the enfranchisement of women might make them more negligent than they had been of the due position and privileges of women.

MR. JACOB BRIGHT: The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, during his long career in this House, has always been advocating failing causes. I have been present at almost every debate that has taken place on this question, and I have always noticed that the matter most dwelt upon has been the question of married and unmarried women. Those who are most concerned about married women with Parliamentary qualifications may be satisfied, I think, with the declaration of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Mason); but, at the same time, I have never concealed my opinion on this subject, or that of the Women's Suffrage Associations throughout the Kingdom. It is true that these Associations have been founded by men and women who take a far more unassailable position than the line adopted by my hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne. Their principle is electoral equality, and when they say that, they mean that any qualification established by Parliament which gives a vote to a man should give a vote to a woman, and they do not ask the question whether she is married or unmarried. What gives prominence to this question at the present moment is the fact that in the next Session of Parliament the Government will endeavour to extend the franchise. Those of us in favour of the Motion before the House strongly object that the franchise should be extended as it has hitherto been extended. We say that if you have household suffrage it should be real household suffrage, and that those houses where women are at the head should not be passed over as if there were no human beings there with rights to defend, or with interests to protect. It is said, and I think it is true, that something like one house in seven has a woman at its head. Who are these women? One may be a woman of property, another may be eminent in art or literature, another will be a benevolent woman acting as a ministering angel to the poor and needy around her, and others will be persons in humble life, working year by year to maintain their families. The question we put is this—Why are these houses to be passed over? I do not think that question has been answered to-night in a manner to satisfy the people of this country; certainly not in a manner to satisfy those excluded from the franchise. This evening, in the Lobby, a distinguished Member of the House came to me to speak on the subject. He said—“You know I have always been opposed to you.” I said—“Yes; I know. How is it you always oppose this measure?” “Well,” he said, “there is only one reason why anybody can oppose it. I oppose the giving of the franchise to a woman because she is a woman.” I said—“Do you think that reason will long suffice to maintain their exclusion?” He said—“I doubt if it will.” Sir, I doubt myself whether that reason will long hold good. My hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Leatham) has another reason. When I look at his Amendment I see he tell us that, from time immemorial, only men have voted. But, Sir, women have recently discovered that from time immemorial they have suffered from their exclusion. I ask my hon. Friend to answer them when they make that declaration. Women are said to be ignorant. If the measure indicated were to pass, undoubtedly a considerable number of ignorant women would be enfranchised—women almost as ignorant as the men enfranchised. I think it will be in the recollection of the House that when the Ballot Act was passed we took considerable pains to legislate to enable ignorant men to vote. It appears that on this side of the House this measure is opposed because it is regarded as a Conservative measure. Of course, action of that sort is inconsistent with Liberal principles. We do not desire to exclude people from the ballot box even if they are Conservatives. We, surely, on this side of the House, do not intend to say we will admit only those who assist our Party. There is one thing anybody can see with regard to women. No one can accuse them of leading disorderly or criminal lives; nobody can accuse them of drunkenness. If there were as little drunkenness amongst men as there is amongst women, if there were as little crime amongst men as there is amongst women, we should want fewer policemen, fewer prisons, and there would be less burdens and rates on the people. We hear in this House a good deal about Radicalism, more especially from these Benches. That term has never had any great charm for me, and for this reason—that I have often found it dissociated from ideas of justice. A remarkable speech was made in Birmingham the other day by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. I read that speech with much interest. It was read with great pleasure by extreme politicians in this country. I heard men say it was one of the best utterances of the gospel of Radicalism. That may be true; but I have my doubts whether it was an adequate expression of the gospel of Justice. The right hon. Gentleman took a prophetic view of what may happen some years hence. He told us that every person not a criminal and not a pauper was to have a vote, provided that person was of the masculine gender. There was no suggestion that for all time to come a woman should have any Constitutional influence over those who made the laws which she is called upon to obey. The right hon. Gentleman advocated, as I understand, that Members of this House should be paid for their services. Six hundred and fifty salaries are to be added to the present expenditure. He did not tell us from what fund this was to come. I do not know that there is any public fund to which women do not contribute their portion; and I doubt whether it would be just to tax women for services in this House in regard to which they cannot have the least control. Reference has been made to the old maxim that taxation and representation should go together; but my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield treats that principle with something like contempt when it comes from the mouths of women. But there are other and greater reasons than those involved in the question of taxation why women should have some influence in the House. This House sometimes passes laws which apply to women only. It sometimes inflicts grievous penalties upon women which would be intolerable to men. It interferes with the labour of women, perhaps sometimes advantageously to them; but at other times with considerable danger to their interests. Supposing some Assembly were to legislate for men over which men had not the least control. I undertake to say there would not be one man in 1,000,000 who would not see the monstrous injustice of such a state of things. It is somewhat comic that the "time immemorial" argument should be relied upon on these Benches. Many things have existed from time immemorial. The Established Church and the political position of Bishops have existed from the remotest times; and I should like to know, if the hon. Member for Huddersfield were to stand up and recommend important changes in these respects, what he would say if the argument of "time immemorial" came from the opposite Benches? If we had always adhered to what had been consecrated by time, instead of now being the foremost nation in the world, we should probably be a group of painted savages. The hon. Members for Huddersfield and North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) have told us women can get what they want without the franchise. That used to be said of working men; but since they have had a vote Members in every part of this House have had a generosity and sympathy and courage with regard to all matters affecting working men which they never had before. Precisely the same effect would follow if you gave women the franchise. I admit that women have gained much without the franchise, and I will tell the House when that gain began. It began with the introduction of the question of women's suffrage to the House, and the gain has been mainly due to the awakening intelligence of women on political questions, owing to the widespread agitation and the demand for women's suffrage. They have gained without the franchise municipal votes, school board votes, the right to sit on school boards, the magnificent Act of last year—an Act which ought to confer lasting fame on the present Lord Chancellor—I mean the Married Women's Property Act. And, owing to the untiring energy of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld), they have succeeded in inflicting a blow on an Act of Parliament more unjust to women than any which has ever been passed—a blow from which that Act will never recover. These things they have gained without the franchise. But who will tell me that they would not have gained them sooner, with less heart-breaking labour, if they had had the political franchise? I contend that to declare women incapacitated to vote, whatever property they may have, whatever may be their intellect and their character, and yet to declare men capable of voting, however wanting they may be in the qualifications to which I have referred, is to degrade women in their own estimation and in the estimation of everyone else. To give the franchise to men is to raise and to strengthen them. It would have the same effect upon women. Universally, to possess political influence is to command respect, and if women were more respected they would be less open to injury of every kind. We are going to enfranchise the farm labourer. Why, I ask, should we not also enfranchise the farmer? I believe it has already been shown by the hon. Member who moved the Resolution (Mr. Mason) that a very large number of women are farmers—as many as 10 per cent of the farmers in England and Wales being women employing farm labourers. If we are going to enfranchise the labourers, is it right that the women who employ them, who pay their wages, and who have all the responsibility of the enterprize on their shoulders, should be treated as political cyphers? Again, one-seventh part of all the persons holding land of one acre and upwards are women. On what ground can we refuse to give them a vote? Five per cent of the lay patronage of the Church of England is in the hands of women. Those women have a right to appoint the spiritual pastors of large and small parishes, and yet they are not allowed to perform the very humble function of giving a vote for a Member of Parliament. There is no greater delusion than to imagine that a high qualification is necessary in order to give such a vote. The instincts of the people, as a rule, enable them to decide which is the ablest or the most trustworthy candidate. In conclusion, I shall merely say that clever speeches, from whatever side of this House they come, will not subdue this agitation. In spite of what my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield says, indications come to me which show that this agitation grows because women believe that its object is just; for God has planted the passion for justice in every human heart—and not less in the hearts of women than of men.

MR. RAIKES: I desire to detain the House only a short time; but I am bound to say that it is difficult to abstain from offering some observations in reply to hon. Members who have advocated this Motion. I was particularly struck with what fell from the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who laid great stress on the restricted objects of the Motion, and disclaimed, for himself and his Friends, any attempt to bring about the universal enfranchisement of women which has been alluded to. The hon. Member pointed out that the Motion is one which extends only to women who possess the necessary qualifications—that is to say, that this question comes before the House to-night, as it has done on one or two former occasions, merely as a question of the enfranchisement of those women—widows and spinsters—who happen already to possess the franchise in local matters. I would venture to remind my hon. Friend that this year that position has become something of an anachronism. A very important measure was passed last Session; and when this House deliberately set itself to the abolition of the ancient relations of husband and wife with regard to the possession of property it took a new departure, which we cannot ignore in considering this question. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) has not dwelt quite so much as he might have been expected to do on that wider view of the question with which he might have concerned himself. It was only to-day that I received, as I presume other hon. Members had done, a printed letter which has been signed and circulated by a lady who has taken great interest in this question, and who is treasurer of the Manchester Association for promoting the enfranchisement of women. In that letter, the writer argues with considerable logical force the case of the general enfranchisement of females, as compared with the partial enfranchisement contemplated by the present proposal. I cannot refuse full assent to the arguments I have seen in that letter. If we agree that women are to be equally entitled with men to the benefit of the franchise, it is impossible logically to refuse the franchise to that large number of women who are living in matrimony, and who have had that experience and knowledge of life, and of the affairs of life, which the position of a wife and mother must necessarily bring. Anything, therefore, more unjust, ungenerous, and indefensible than the exclusion of wives from such a proposal is hardly to be thought of; and I certainly shall do what I can to secure that the married women of this country shall not be ignored in the bestowal of the franchise, if it is to be conferred on women at all. There is another point on which I would briefly touch. Hon. Members, in their anxiety to minimize this enormous change, have told the House that women do not desire seats in this Chamber. This seems to me a more unreasonable limitation than the other. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton has told us that an enlightened woman is at least as qualified for the franchise as an unenlightened man. We are always reading about enlightened women, and hearing much that is said with respect to women on account of their intellectual qualifications. I should be sorry if anything I am about to say should be considered disrespectful to any members of that sex. I think, however, there is much more argument in favour of their sitting in this House than for the enfranchisement of the whole sex, in order that they might vote for the Members of this House. There is no doubt that many women are quite as well qualified for seats in this House as many hon.

Members; and no one can deny that there have been, and are, numerous examples of women of great intellectual capacity, and of high cultivation and attainments, who have specific and peculiar knowledge of many questions on which their opinions are entitled to the highest respect. This is, as far as it goes, an argument in favour of their sitting in this House; but I cannot see that it constitutes a valid reason for flooding the register with all the 95 or 96 per cent of other women, who have not the time or the qualifications for the study of political questions. I venture to call attention to what I think the illogicality of the two limitations I have referred to. If we are going seriously to deal with this question, we must be prepared to face it as a whole, and either to enfranchise women generally or to leave it alone. Much has been said as to the importance of the claims of women to direct representation. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) has said that the working men have been able to exercise greater influence on this House since they have had the franchise than before. The hon. Member, however, rather spoilt his argument by what he said in reference to the position of women as regards recent legislation in this House. But I would point out that those who argue from this point of view are arguing from a position unfortunately too common, particularly among those who hold advanced opinions—namely, that nobody can have any interests unless they are antagonistic to those of others; and that, therefore, it is necessary that those interests should be guarded by direct representation. I do not believe this. I believe it is from the calm judgment of the collective community that we get at the best opinions, and that it is not necessary to look to a particular class to vindicate the rights it claims. With regard to women, this idea appears to be a greater delusion than in the case of any other class. I believe that the interests of women, so far from being antagonistic to those of the men among whom they live, are indissolubly bound up with those of the other sex. I believe it is absolutely impossible for any man, who is qualified to take his seat in this House, not to be largely governed by considerations of what is due to women, who so greatly contribute to the happiness of the country; and I do appeal to the House to consider this matter, not so much with regard to questions of foreign politics, or of peace or war, or even as to whether or not the clergy of all denominations may not have or exercise undue influence; but I do press my opposition to this proposal on grounds which I shall always oppose it upon, as long as I have a seat in this House, and which lead me to believe that anything more injurious to the women of this country could not be conceived than a scheme which proposes to put an Imperial, or, at least, a Parliamentary imprimatur on doctrines which lead to the unsexing of women and putting them on a false equality with men. Far be it from me, or anyone in this House, to speak of or dwell upon the general physical and mental inferiority on the part of women. I fully and freely recognize their great moral superiority in other respects. But we are endangering the moral superiority of women if we tell them that their duty in life is not that duty it has hitherto been conceived to be—not that simple round of daily domestic life in which a woman's days are passed. If we are going to detach women from those duties, which reconcile her to the sphere in which her lot is cast, and to ask her to turn her attention to political affairs, to study the columns of the political magazines and daily newspapers, in order to arrive at conclusions on questions which otherwise she could but imperfectly understand, and to expose her to the annoyances which appertain to political and public action; to bring her from that place in which she is so happy, and where she contributes so much to the happiness of the other sex, in order to make her a bad copy of man, the day, I trust, will be long distant when such a result will be achieved. I regret to find that a class of modern politicians is to be found on the public platforms of the country doing that than which nothing could be more unworthy their position in society. When I see men of great gifts, of high aspirations, and noble example, such as the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright), who can find nothing better to do than to go about from place to place to try and catch the cheers of poor, unreflecting, and thoughtless women, by uttering conventional platitudes which they may fully believe, but which are sterile of any good for the country, and exciting an agitation out of which no definite result can be achieved; or when I see their female colleagues ascend those platforms and make public speeches—I wish to speak with all due respect of those ladies and of their public aims and aspirations, and even their ambition—I must say that these things cause to me, and to many people in this country who do not belong to this House, and who are not active politicians, something of a feeling of pain, in the presence of a public scandal which we grieve to witness, especially when I see that this is done at the expense of that sex which we all honour and revere. I apologize to the House for having so long intruded on its attention; but I trust I have explained that, so far from deprecating the well-recognized merits of women, I rather desire to preserve that safe and honourable seclusion which is given to them by nature and sanctioned by Revelation, which up to the present time has been respected by the law of England, and will, I trust, in the future, continue to be respected and protected by that law.

MR. COURTNEY: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Raikes), who has just spoken, and also his Colleague in the representation of that University (Mr. Beresford Hope), have insisted that if we granted the franchise to women, we must, in logic, go still further and admit women to this House. Those two speeches are equally remarkable, whether regarded as coming from Members of the Conservative Party, or as the expositions of opinion proceeding from Members having a constituency consisting to the extent of more than one-half of clergymen. But I believe that both—I am certain that one of them—have voted for the Bill which proposes to prevent even unbeneficed clergymen from sitting in this House. The right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken (Mr. Raikes) has added some remarkable observations with regard to the position and character of women. He began his speech by saying that it was impossible to accede to this proposition, because if it were acceded it must go much further.

MR. RAIKES: The hon. Gentleman has misconceived what I have stated. I did not rest my objection to the proposal on that ground; but I said it appeared to me that those who do not accept the wider view which I have referred to are illogical.

MR. COURTNEY: At any rate, the right hon. Gentleman has said that if we accept one proposal we must accept the other. With regard to what I have said as to the constituency of the two right hon. Gentlemen whose speeches I have referred to, I would ask, do they intend to disfranchise the unbeneficed clergymen, because that is the logical deduction to be made from what they have said. With regard to this matter of logic, which requires that women should give a vote in the limited form proposed, as votes are already given to the Universities, I am bound to say it is a strictly moderate proposition. It is based on the following grounds:—We have already given to spinsters and widows, possessed of certain qualifications as to property or occupation, the privilege of voting for Town Councils, Boards of Guardians, and School Boards. We have laid down the principle that, so far as regards these public functions, sex is no disqualification. Marriage remains a disqualification, but sex does not; and the proposition laid down by the hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) is that as far as we have already gone in local matters we should now go in Parliamentary matters. This is, I think, a strictly moderate and a Conservative proposition. It goes on that principle of politics which we all respect, since it proceeds from experience. We have tried it, and what are the results? Are they beneficial, or are they the reverse? Are they advantageous, whether as regards the constitution of the Boards so elected or the character of the women who form part of the constituency? If they have been beneficial, they are in favour of our going further. No one has said they have produced injurious effects in either direction. On those, then, who oppose the extension of the principle that has been so far successful, the burden is thrown of showing the ineligibility of women for the Parliamentary franchise. I can conceive one reason why hon. Members may refuse to give votes for women being Members of this House. They themselves might be affected by the change. This is, however, a very small reason indeed; and I should like to know what is the real explanation of this singular anomaly—that hon. Members are ready to give women votes at elections in which those hon. Members are not directly concerned, and yet they refuse them in cases where they are so concerned? I confess I should have thought that one of the most hazardous things possible was the giving women votes at elections for Boards of Guardians, except, perhaps, making them eligible for seats on the school boards. One would have thought that the enfranchisement of women in respect of Boards of Guardians might have tended to thwart the operation of the Poor Law; yet, as a matter of fact, a totally different result has been witnessed; and so successful has been the experiment of admitting women, and so strictly and faithfully have they endeavoured to carry out the operations of the Poor Law, that the Local Government Board has used its power of nominating women as Guardians where they have not been elected. If we take the case of elections to the school boards, I ask, is there a single thing that is of more importance to the nation than the education of the Democracy of the future? And yet we give women votes for school boards, and allow them to be elected as members of those boards, because they have to do with the education of girls. In making women capable of sitting on school boards we have supplied them with a strong argument in favour of this Motion, for the work of the school boards far transcends in importance the ordinary questions that come before us at General Elections. Let me point out this with respect to the alleged injurious influence of public life upon the female nature. You find women engaged in the elections for Boards of Guardians, the elections for School Boards, and the elections for Town Councils—the first taking place yearly, the second once in three years, the third yearly; but the General Parliamentary Election, the effect of which is to be so injurious on the character of women, comes on the average only once in five years. But it is said, if you do give women this vote in the restricted form proposed by my hon. Friend, you must go further and give votes to married women too. ["No!"] That is the sort of logic that we have heard over and over again. If you give the £10 householder a vote you must give every householder a vote. If you give every householder a vote, you must give every man a vote. If you give every man a vote, you must give every woman a vote, and so on. Principles of abstract political reasoning are, perhaps, not dealt with by any political Party in this country; but these are principles which I am most surprised to hear from Members of the Conservative Party. I proceed on the lines of experience. [Laughter.] I do not catch the secret explanation of the laughter which is now excited. You have women as electors in local affairs, women who are widows and spinsters and possess the qualifications required by law. Proceeding on that line, I ask why the same class of women, possessing the same qualifications, should run any danger by becoming Parliamentary electors? It is, I dare say, possible that my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Jacob Bright) desires to see the franchise extended to married as well as to single women. It is just possible that married women may ultimately demand the franchise too; but that change certainly will not be introduced till after much discussion and deliberation, and with many safeguards. I can see great reasons against it; but I utterly repudiate a line of opposing argument which is unworthy of any person educated in the political history of this country. That line of argument is this. You shall not confer the franchise upon persons who have proved their fitness for it, because you might possibly raise hereafter the question of conferring it upon persons in a different position, and against whose admission there are special and powerful arguments. Sir, the present proposal is, as I said before, simple, moderate, and Conservative; and let me remind hon. Members on the opposite Benches that the proposition received the approval of Lord Beaconsfield, who voted for it again and again. It also received the approbation of another man who was long known in this House, who sat on the Conservative side, and who was most justly respected by every Member. I refer to him not only on account of his position and authority, but because he became a convert to the cause after once opposing it; and he was a man whom certainly no one would suspect of any mawkish sentiment or weak feeling. I refer to Mr. Henley, who sat in the House for years; and after opposing this proposal for three or four years, rose in his place one day and said—

"I have been voting on this question; I have been watching what has been done; I have observed how women have voted for Local Councils and Boards of Guardians; and I have come to the conclusion that both as regards themselves and the bodies for which they have voted the change is beneficial, politic, and much to be desired."

At this hour I will not detain the House much longer. But I must say a word or two in answer to the latter portion of the speech of the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge. The right hon. Gentleman protested, in vigorous and powerful language, against the degradation of women which would ensue when some of them were called upon to discharge public functions upon political occasions. And he discoursed also, in still more vehement language, upon what I think he regarded—though his language was uncertain—as the degradation of those ladies, especially, who appear in public to advocate the claims of their sex. Sir, I altogether take issue with the right hon. Gentleman upon those points. I protest that so far from degrading her the bringing of women into contact with the ideas of public life, with the conceptions of national progress, with the development of national character, with the elevation of the people, and with the relation of this nation to other nations, just supplies that want which is necessary for herself, and, still more, which is necessary for her as the companion of man. If you want to have a heroic woman—[Laughter.—]—if you want a woman with public spirit, one who shall be the companion and help-mate of the ideal English citizen, you must have a woman who shall understand and sympathize with the ideals and the pains and the life of her husband. I have, on former occasions, expressed in this House what I believe to be a fact—that in too many cases the husband is pulled down from the position which he would occupy, and the aims he would pursue, and from the ideals which he would seek to realize by the scantiness of education, by the limitation of motives, and by the restriction of feelings and ideas in his wife. Unless you develop in woman a power of sympathizing with and supporting man in the developments of political life, you will not only secure a stunted woman, but you will also be punished by finding in her society little of that which will elevate you and her. You will have to reach to another ideal, and you will find society fall away from the standard that you desire to reach; and the national life, instead of becoming richer and fuller in successive years, will become more and more impoverished, poor, and petty. It is said that there are women who do not want the franchise. It is one of the strong points of the opposition that some women do not desire it. I often find that objection brought forward; but I doubt whether it is true. This is a question on which you may get any evidence you like, according to the point you desire to make. Just as you desire the answer you may find it; but the practical experience of political life, so far as it goes, shows that women do exercise municipal functions just as freely, largely, and jealously as men. Those women who tell you in society, as many of them will, that they do not want votes, are, I find, mixed up in politics very zealously; but the politics they pursue are the petty politics of personal relations, instead of the politics of national progress and national development.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): I have almost to apologize to the House for intruding now. I have to apologize to the House because I have so often expressed my opinion on this question; and I am only prompted to do so again because I feel so earnestly and sincerely on it, and I shall give a most earnest vote against this Motion. I am glad to think that the mask is at last thrown off. To-night, for the first time, we know the real intention of the supporters of this Motion. For years they have expressed one view to the public, while their object, and their aim, and their purpose has been a different one. They have told us that their object has been to give a vote to unmarried women only, and by that representation they have secured support. Sir, to-night it is useless for them to tell us that. Add to this Motion the legislation of last Session, and it will be seen that the vote is to be given to every married woman as well. [Mr. HUGH MASON: No.] Let the hon. Mover of the Resolution make his declaration if he likes. It was worth nothing except the word that he gave. He meant, no doubt, what he said; but let this Resolution pass into a Bill, and let the Property Qualification Act, 1882, remain unrepealed, and every holder of a freehold in the country became a voter. Let there be no mistake about this. If this Resolution is drafted into a Bill, and the legislation of 1882 remains unrepealed, you will give a vote to the married woman in the county and deny it in the borough. The husband in the county may enfranchise his wife. Every husband who has the means will have the right to confer a 40s. freehold on his wife, and he can then either ask her to vote with him or against him. Let hon. Members who are about to record their votes understand that this would be the legal result of a successful issue to this Resolution. Now, in that is a plain issue. If you tell me that the difference would be nothing as regards women between the county and the borough franchise, what do you say to the illogical difference between giving a married woman a vote in the county but not in the borough? Notwithstanding what my hon. Friend has said about mysterious qualifications, I want to know what you are going to do about this Property Qualification Act in the case of married women? My hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), who has given a most unsound definition of political rights, has said that occupation and ownership should always be represented. According to that view, every house that holds a man has a vote, and not every man who holds a house. Occupation and ownership are to be represented. What does that mean? In a borough a man who pays no rent, but only promises to pay, has a vote. The man who owns a whole town is not entitled to vote; and that is what he calls the representation of occupation and ownership. My hon. Friend says, in effect, that fitness has nothing to do with the right to vote. Does he not know that property qualification is only held to be an evidence of fitness? A short time ago it was thought that no person below a £10 qualification should be allowed to vote. The hon. Member's proposition is that mere ownership, or occupation, or the payment of taxation, gives a right to vote; but the man who has lived 20 years in a house managing the property is not allowed to vote, and why? Why do not you allow them to vote? Because they are not fit. You do not allow persons of weak mind to vote. It is because they are not fit. The hon. Member for Wolverhampton said—"Why not give the franchise to woman, when she is willing to discharge all the obligations to the State?" But is she able to do so? Ought not a person who claims the rights of citizenship to be able to fulfil all its burdens? What is the first duty of a citizen? It is to defend the country in time of war. ["Oh!"] It is a principle which has been recognized in every State from the earliest times. Will she do that? There is another duty of citizenship—to assist in the suppression of internal commotion. Will woman take part in that? Will she be a special constable? Will you make of woman a Justice of the Peace? Will you make her a jurymen? Will you allow her to be a Bishop? I will not say that the office of a Bishop represents the greatest degree of unfitness for women; but I might mention different offices, none of which they could fulfil. I would ask my hon. Friend, Would he allow women to sit in this House? ["No!"] Why not? Does not fitness come in there? [Mr. H. H. FOWLER: No.] The hon. Member for Wolverhampton says distinctly "No;" and there we have a distinct test of inequality between men and women. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury is an old opponent of mine on this subject, and I am sure he will not object if I reply to some of his remarks. He said that both the right hon. Members for Cambridge University opposed women's suffrage on the ground that women could not sit in the House, and yet many of their constituents were clergymen, who could be voters, but were not eligible for election to Parliament. Yes; that is true; but a clergyman is not disqualified. It is his office that disqualifies him. Take off his robe, and take him away from his office, where he is supposed to exercise spiritual duties, which he cannot exercise if he becomes a Member of Parliament, and then that man may come into this House. I have one word more to say to my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary. But the woman to whom you are asked to give the vote—and yet exclude her from this House—is excluded by virtue of her being a woman, a condition she never changes.

The Attorney General

He has made an eloquent, and I know sincere, appeal on behalf of giving votes to women, with the object of raising them up. I should like to translate his views and put them explicitly before the House, in order that you may understand the persons for whom he so earnestly asks for the franchise. These were his own words, expressed to this House on a former occasion—

"The narrowness of woman's range of ideas is absolutely deleterious in its effect. Our earliest lessons are received from them. Are they not often lessons that we have afterwards to unlearn with great difficulty? We often find a difficulty in freeing ourselves from them, and in emancipating ourselves from the errors of our earliest days."

Those are the women upon whom my hon. Friend proposes to confer the franchise. What does my hon. Friend say with regard to married life?

"Again, of those who enter into the marriage relations of life, how constantly does it happen that the man's freedom of intellect is a thing unto himself, that he is incapable of imparting to the woman, with whom so much of his life is spent, any conception of the range of his thought? He does not find in her any companionship; but, on the contrary, a drag upon his aspirations."

Now, Sir, I understand it is by giving women the franchise that my hon. Friend now seeks to lift them from this condition of weak-minded error. I say that is a proposition of very serious aspect. What period of probation are these women to go through before they arrive at the ideal of my hon. Friend? [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh; but if I have quoted my hon. Friend correctly, where is his answer to the question? If you are going to put these unfit women into the rights of citizenship, are we to sacrifice the interests of this country in the hope that they will improve? I believe that my hon. Friend has approached the subject from a different point of view to that taken by most men. I differ from him even more in his premisses than in his conclusions. If hon. Members look back to the lessons of their earliest years, they will not find anything to lead them to agree with my hon. Friend. The difference is that we did not wish those lessons to be political, and, because they were not political, they were valuable. My hon. Friend wishes the mother and the wife to become a politician; but he makes a great mistake in thinking that the public life will make women virtuous, rather than the private life by which they have made so many men good. Now, Sir, one word more in answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton. What qualifies a man for admission to this House? Have not men experience of all professions? Do we not one and all bring to bear something of a peculiar and particular knowledge? Cannot my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, and others in the same Profession, enlighten us respecting the law? Do not commercial men tell us their views upon trade and commerce? Do not military men give us their experience of armies and of war? To any one of these subjects can woman contribute any experience? She can tell us, no doubt, of her great experience of domestic life; but, unhappily for us, that is not a subject with which we have to deal here. It is useful on school boards, but not in Parliament. When we had to deal with great questions of peace and war, what would result if women took part in politics? We should find them timid in time of panic and violent in time of outbreak. I believe that if a war were proposed for restoring the temporal power of the Pope every woman in France would support it. Whom do you think were the most earnest for war when France went into her unhappy conflict with Germany? Why, the women. If they have to decide questions like these, I am afraid the goodness of their nature will stand them in little stead. We shall have the impulses of hearts rather than the reasoning of minds. I am told to-night that the supporters of this Motion have a majority in the House, and that there is to be a great victory for them. Well, Sir, they may, from accidental circumstances and great importunity, have secured for this time a majority; but it will be a very fleeting one. It is easy enough to bring down a few devoted followers in support of a movement which has been well canvassed; but let this once be found a serious question, and there will be deserters on one side and recruits on the other. I am certain of this—that we have forces still in reserve. The women of England have never yet really expressed their opinion upon this question. Were it not for that class of women who are happy in gazing upon, and being gazed upon by crowds, there would be no demand at all for women's suffrage. Those who represent the real feminine feeling of the country do not go to public meetings. The voice of the mob is heard, and the clamour of their loud cry is supposed to represent the voice of the women of England. To-night we, as men of different political Parties, express our view; but there is a class in the country that does not often speak, and yet it has at times determined the state of Parties; I mean those men who take but little heed of political life, who find their happiness at home, and who wish to see this country well governed, and who believe that upon the stability of their homes depends the greatness and prosperity of the country. When once they know that from those homes you seriously mean to take the women who are their light and happiness, they will denounce this measure as an influence that can add nothing to the happiness and the strength of any man's domestic life, and that will bring within the action of public men a source of weakness and of impulse detrimental to the very best interests of this country.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Hervey Bruce.)

MR. TOMLINSON said, this was a very important Bill, and it was desirable to know what view the country took of it. In many parts, and especially in Lancashire, there was a strong feeling with regard to it; the belief being that it would bring a number of people who were not natives of England on the poor rates, without their having previously given any benefit to this part of the country. Several Members who wished to discuss the measure were not here, and he therefore moved the Adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Tomlinson.)

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, the Bill was not new to the House, and had only been snuffed out earlier in the Session by a technical error.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE opposed the Motion, regarding the hour as one when a Bill of this sort might be discussed. If it were discussed upon its merits, the Government would support the second reading; but, no doubt, there would be Amendments moved from various quarters in Committee.

MR. RAMSAY objected to a measure of this kind being passed through at the instance of a private Member. It was not right that the Government should say they would support the Bill, and not accept the responsibility of bringing the measure before the country. He gladly supported the Motion. He had sat upon a Committee which inquired into this subject, and the Bill did not carry out what he thought was the intention of that Committee.

MR. O. H. JAMES said, he hoped the House would not agree to the Bill, for it interfered with a law which had worked very well. He should vote for the Motion.

CHURCH OF ENGLAND (COLONIES)— PUBLIC WORSHIP AT HONG KONG.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will accede to the petition of the inhabitants of Hong Kong praying for the retention of the grant for the maintenance of the public worship of the Church of England? The noble Lord said, that a Petition had been presented to the Governor of Hong Kong, on the 24th of March last, by Mr. Johnson, a Member of the Council. In presenting it, he said that it was numerously signed by the inhabitants of Hong Kong, of all classes and creeds, against the proposal made by the Secretary of State to abrogate the grant for the maintenance of the public service of the Church of England. If it had not been more numerously signed by the Chinese, it was not because signatures were not to be obtained, but because it was deemed unnecessary, in the presence of the statement which was made by the Governor's Predecessor, in a despatch to the Secretary of State, that the Chinese were almost unanimous in favour of the maintenance of the grant. Mr. Johnson went on to support the Petition individually, and because he thought the grant should be continued in the interests of the public, and that its abrogation would be a breach of virtual contract made with the members of the Civil Service. If the Chinese wished for the maintenance of the grant, it must be for one of these three reasons. They did so, perhaps, out of gratitude to the late Governor, Sir John Pope Hennessy, who had treated their community with liberality; or else they might think the grant was so insignificant in amount that it was not worth while to cavil at it. This was likely enough, as the last mail announced that receipts at Hong Kong had exceeded the estimates by $102,000. There was another reason, as to which he (Lord Stanley of Alderley) had consulted the Chinese Embassy; and he had been informed there that, without knowing any of the facts of the case or the particular circumstances, it was thought highly probable that the Chinese had, as stated by the late Governor, been in favour of the grant, because the precepts of Confucius enjoined on them harmony towards their English fellow-citizens. In conclusion, he thought that many of Her Majesty's subjects would rejoice if Her Majesty's Ministers would give more attention to those grave injustices, respecting which serious complaint was so often ineffectually made, instead of disturbing existing arrangements for the purpose of remedying ideal, imaginary, and impalpable injustices of which no one had complained.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY, in supporting the prayer of the Petition, said, that if a grant of this nature, so small in itself, were withdrawn, it must be either for some reason of Imperial policy, or on account of pressure from Hong Kong. It could scarcely be on a ground of Imperial policy, because the withdrawal was in contradiction to that policy as adopted in other places; and from Hong Kong there had not only been no pressure in favour of the withdrawal, but there had been pressure in the opposite direction. Moreover, there had been a representation made in favour of the grant being continued by Sir John Pope Hennessy, who was himself a Roman Catholic, by Mr. Johnson, and by various Civil Servants as an act of justice. The Chinese also approved it: It did not appear to him to be wise, when they found small communities of Englishmen surrounded by Native populations, to withdraw from them the means of celebrating public worship. The amount of the grant was small, but it carried with it the recognition of Christianity, to the frank profession of which politicians were ready to admit that the greatness of England was largely due. In the case of Singapore, when a similar proposal was made for withdrawing the grant, the Colonial Office was quite willing to be approached, and to continue the grant for the reasons he had alleged. He hoped that, on the present occasion also, the Colonial Office would see fit to reconsider the withdrawal of so small a grant, which involved so large an issue, and might come to the determination that it should not be taken away. In such a community as Hong Kong, it was not desirable to withdraw, in the name of the British Government, the means for supplying public Christian worship.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had received, some weeks ago, the Memorial to which the most rev. Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) had alluded, and had considered it with all due deference, coming, as it did, from a very considerable number of respectable persons. But he had come to the conclusion that he could not adopt a different course to that which was taken by his noble Friend and Predecessor (the Earl of Kimberley) two years ago. The facts of the case were very simple. In round numbers, the population of Hong Kong was 160,000, of which 8,000 were Europeans, and of these not all were members of the Church of England; the remaining 152,000 consisting of Natives, who were almost entirely non-Christian. That was to say, the Natives stood to the Europeans in the proportion of 19 to one; and, under such circumstances, it did seem to him not to be consistent with justice to throw the burden of maintaining the worship of the Established Church of England upon those who did not even profess the Christian religion. We did not give anything towards the worship of the Native population, and he could not see that it was consistent with justice to call upon them to maintain ours. He saw no reason why it should not maintain itself. He had no means of stating the numbers of the various Christian Denominations; but, whatever the numbers were, the argument was the same. If those who belonged to the Church of England were numerous, they were able to pay for their own worship; if they were few, that was a reason the more for not giving them an exceptional position. The European community was well-to-do, and some of its members were extremely wealthy. The real argument of the Memorialists was that it would throw disgrace upon the Christian religion, in the eyes of the Natives, were the State to withdraw its aid to religion. That was an argument in which he did not agree. He did not think they would make religion more popular amongst the Natives by compelling them to maintain a religion in which they did not believe, whether they would or not. He thought the question was mainly a financial one, and that the way the members of the Church of England in Hong Kong could best do credit to their mode of worship, and show their attachment to their Church, was by showing their willingness to maintain it by paying the expense of providing public worship out of their own pockets. He might add that the withdrawal of the grant would not take place until a vacancy occurred in the chaplaincy; but he could not hold out any prospect that the Government would reverse the decision already arrived at on the question.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he thought the answer of the noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Derby) most unsatisfactory. It seemed as if this were the first step in disestablishment and disendowment of the Church, though it took place in a remote quarter of the globe. It would be felt that the Government of the country repudiating the Church would have a very prejudicial effect upon our position in the East.

RAILWAYS (INDIA)—GRAIN RATES.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY asked the Secretary of State for India, What steps have been taken by the Government of India towards reducing the grain rates on the railways from Rajputana to Bombay; and also for improving the accommodation for third and fourth class passengers? The noble Lord said, that he believed that the noble Earl the Secretary of State for India (the Earl of Kimberley) would be able to announce that the rates for grain had been reduced on the Rajputana Malwa Railway; but the Bombay Chamber of Commerce had not been able to obtain a reduction from the Great Indian Peninsula Railway; and, last winter, there were great complaints as to the quantity of wheat that was blocked up in the interior of India. As the Great Indian Peninsula Railway was one of the lines the interest of which was guaranteed, the Government had a Representative on the Board of Directors, and could bring pressure to bear upon that Company, and prevent its throwing away a large amount of traffic, and, at the same time, checking the development of wheat cultivation in Rajputana, and also in the Deccan. With regard to the very defective accommodation for third and fourth-class passengers, he had seen it stated, since he brought the subject before the House last year, that one Railway Company—the Great Indian Peninsula, he believed—had increased the allowance of luggage for these passengers; but the chief complaint was respecting the bad accommodation at the stations, and he hoped that the Secretary of State would be willing to inform the House that he would invite the attention of the Indian Government to this matter.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in reply, said, that both the Government at home and the Indian Government were sensible of the great importance of the question of facilitating the increase of commerce on the Indian Railways by a reasonable reduction of the grain rates, leaving only a justifiable margin in the way of profit. With regard to the Question, he was glad to be able to inform his noble Friend (Lord Stanley of Alderley) that the rate for wheat between Delhi and Bombay by the Rajputana and Bombay and Baroda Railways was reduced, in May last, from about  $\frac{1}{2}d.$  per ton per mile to  $\frac{3}{4}d.$ , reducing the charge per ton for the whole distance from £1 18s.  $3\frac{1}{4}d.$  to £1 11s.  $2d.$  The action of the Indian Government in this direction would be extended to other railways. He could also state that the Government had considered, and were considering, the rates charged for third and fourth-class passengers, with a view to reduce them to the lowest amount possible, and orders had been issued with the view of increasing their comfort and convenience, though he was, as yet, unable to afford any specific information on the subject.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—THE MILITIA AND MILITIA RESERVE.

RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS, in rising to move—

“That having regard to the present defective military organization, and to the great importance of the Militia force, it is essential that the Militia be forthwith recruited up to their established strength; and that the ‘Militia Reserve’ should, as intended by its originator the late General Peel, and as recommended by the Militia Committee of 1877, be borne in excess of the Militia establishment,” said, that, about five years ago, he had the honour to meet His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, who stopped him in the street, and asked him why it was that he now publicly took so little interest in Army matters? His answer was very short. He said—“Sir, I am waiting for the disaster.” He was convinced, from the experience he had on the subject, that nothing short of a national disaster would induce officials on either side of the House, or would induce either House of Parliament, or the nation, to look this question steadily in the face. It was true they had disasters; they had had Isandlana, Majuba, and Majuba; but these disasters were of a partial character, and occurred in distant lands. They were not disasters like Sadowa and Sedan, which went home to the heart of a nation, and forced the Austrian and French Governments to reform their military systems, and establish them on some surer foundation. Besides, in this country, they had had a successful campaign in Egypt, and there was great danger of their relapsing into false security. Now, the result of our Army reforms was that, in the endeavour to secure a second line, they had sacrificed the first, and their recruiting system had, in a great measure of late, broken down. It had been admitted by the Secretary of State for War, in "another place," although for years they had heard of nothing but the creation of a second line, that our present system had broken down, and that now the Colours must be the first consideration. He (the Earl of Wemyss) was told that the noble and gallant Lord who recently commanded in Egypt (Lord Wolseley) had said, before the Channel Tunnel Committee, that it would be impossible for this country to put more than 20,000 men into line. He would like to ask him whether, in that calculation, he had omitted the Irish regiments, in whom, it seemed, from a recent speech of his, he did not put much trust, so long as they were officered by Englishmen? In bringing this matter forward, he did not ask their Lordships to listen to any crude opinions of his own, but to the views of those who were entitled to speak with authority upon this subject. No one was entitled to speak with more authority than General Sir Lintorn Simmons, by whom an article on the critical state of the British Army had recently appeared in the last number of The Nineteenth Century. He said—

"It may be confidently asserted that the whole Army at home, after the departure of the Expedition to Egypt, was in a lamentable condition. At the present moment, when the troops have been for the most part withdrawn from Egypt, we find but little improvement. Men are daily quitting the ranks, and returning to civil life as Reserve men, so utterly dissatisfied that they will not accept the bribes that have been offered them in the shape of bounty to continue with the Colours."

He further pointed out that in India the small Force which we keep there as the backbone of our power to govern 250,000,000 people would be reduced by a number equivalent to five out of 50 battalions, allotted for its defence; and by one out of nine regiments of Cavalry. The Army at home was more than 8,000 under its appointed strength, and was daily dwindling away; so that, unless some extraordinary measures were taken to recruit it, there would be a deficiency of between 15,000 and 20,000 men, which would be increased to between 25,000 and 30,000 next year—

"Young soldiers yearly purchase their discharges, or desert, while many break down under training, and return to their homes without pension, to drag out a miserable existence and earn their living as best they can."

With regard to the waste taking place in the Army, he said—

"Out of 186,469 enlisted during eight years, 47,648—one-fourth—disappeared before the end of the year succeeding that in which they enlisted; and 54,993 before the end of the second year, with an average of a little more than ten months' service."

The cost of these men to the country, without any return, Sir Lintorn Simmons estimated at £3,150,000. He continued—

"If the present policy continues, the battalions at home in their normal state will be composed to a great extent of inefficient lads; and, to have a force of 9,157 British Infantry, such as fought at Tel-el-Kebir, the men of which averaged 25 years four months old, had served five and a-half years, and of whom less than 900 were under 21 years of age—or even a force of half that size, we shall invariably be compelled to have recourse to the Reserve."

The conclusion at which Sir Lintorn Simmons arrived was—

"That the outflow of men from the Army must be stopped without delay, not merely by temporary measures, such as have been adopted, but by endeavouring to make men contented in and with the Service, and thus to prevent the waste which is ruining the Army, by scattering broadcast over the country a dissatisfied body of men, who, to the number of at least 150,000, exclusive of 34,000 Reserve men, have gone back to civil life since 1870, and who, almost without exception, may be assumed to be living agencies operating energetically and actively as checks to the blandishments of recruiters."

Their Lordships should seriously consider the present state of the battalions. The figures showed to what a low position they were reduced, particularly when they took out of the calculation the men under 20 years of age. That their Lordships might form some idea of the present state of the battalions on home service, he would tell them what was the Field State upon the Queen's birthday parade at Aldershot this year:—There were eight battalions on parade, with a rank-and-file Establishment varying from a maximum of 950 to a minimum of 520. Two of the eight had a rank-and-file Establishment of 520. They were the 1st Scottish Rifles, which paraded with 160 rank and file, and the 2nd King's Shropshire Regiment, which paraded with 136 rank and file. Practically, therefore, a rank-and-file Establishment of 520 might be calculated to put about 150 rank and file into line. Of these, about one-fourth would be under 20. If this fourth were deducted, they got 113 rank and file as the proper fighting strength of a regiment at home on a 520 rank-and-file Establishment. At the present time, out of 72 battalions for service at home, 48 were on an Establishment of 520 rank and file each, making 7,200 rank and file for the fighting line, or 5,400 men after deducting all under 20 years of age. Next, he would ask their Lordships to look at the condition of the Militia, because occupying as it did a central position between the Volunteers and the Reserves on the one hand, and the Regular Army on the other, it constituted a very important part of our military system, which it was impossible to over-estimate, and it was of the highest importance that it should be kept in as effective a condition as possible. What was the state of the Militia at the present moment? Its Establishment was 128,069 men, and there were enrolled 104,431 men, so that 23,638 men were wanting. But, if those under 19 years of age, 15,904, were deducted, and those who had been struck off or were absent, 6,942, and those in the Militia Reserve of the Army, 26,692, the number of men enrolled was only 54,893. Then a deduction of one-fifth must be made for casualties, and if a further reduction were made by leaving the 7,327 Artillery out of consideration, only 36,638 Infantry Militia rank and file above the age of 19 were left for the Three Kingdoms. He thought their Lordships would say that that was not a satisfactory state of things, and that the Militia ought, at any rate, to be recruited up to its Establishment. The Militia was the backbone of our military system, and it was impossible to exaggerate its value. He wished to point out that the Militia Reserve was not a Reserve for Militia, as many persons supposed, but that it should properly be called the Militia Army Reserve. There were four ways in which the Militia could aid in recruiting the Army. Whole regiments could volunteer for service in the Army; companies could so volunteer; while individuals could volunteer for the Regular Army, and could also apply to form part of the Army Militia Reserve. The Militia Establishment was not merely short this year; it was always more or less short; and it had not, for many years, had its full complement of men. In 1872, it wanted 25,344 men; in 1875, 28,116; in 1880, 10,851; and now 23,638 were wanted. It appeared to him, however, that the Militia Reserve was really almost the only thing upon which they could congratulate themselves. Turning to the Army Reserve, strange as it might appear, he saw that it contained, when taken on January 1, 1883, 4,478 fewer men than it contained on the same date in 1873. In 1870, too, there were 4,478 men less than in 1867 ready for immediate service. They had heard that long service was now to be tried. But it was to be tried in a way which would prevent it from succeeding. A man who should enlist for a second term of service would not be given his £36 of deferred pay until the end of his second term, instead of at the close of the first term. That being so, it would not be wonderful if men should elect to take £36 down, in preference to engaging for a fresh period of service. The Army Reserve was organized upon the recommendation of a Commission of Inquiry, who pointed to the Militia as the best quarter from which to obtain men for the Army. General Peel, in 1869, said—

“The Commission on Recruiting state with great truth that our real Army of Reserve is the Militia, and that it is in that quarter that we shall have eventually to look for our Reserve, and they consider it advisable to raise the Militia to its full number—that is, to 120,000 men. The present strength of the Militia is about 90,000 men, and the difference between that and 120,000 would constitute the Army of Reserve. Every regiment that contributed a certain quota to the Army of Reserve I would allow to be raised to its full strength; so that you would have the Militia regiments exactly in the same state as before, and would have the additional men of the Army of Reserve. My proposal is to limit the Army of Reserve to one-fourth of the present Establishment, and for this reason—I do not want to break up the Militia regiments.”

In the opinion of General Peel, it was not desirable to lessen the strength of the Militia by withdrawing from it the 26,000 men who formed the Militia Reserve, and who were the best trained men in the Militia, without at once filling up vacancies thus caused, and keeping battalions up to their full strength. He would ask their Lordships to listen to what the Militia Commission of 1867 said with regard to the Militia Reserve. They said—

“It is to our Militia that we must look for the solid Constitutional Reserve of the country, and we would earnestly recommend that more attention should be given to its organization, and that its numbers should be maintained up to the full legal quota.”

He invited their Lordships by their vote, therefore, to declare, as the Commission of 1867 recommended, that the Militia should be recruited up to its full strength. He held in his hand the Report of the Militia Committee of 1877. That was a Departmental Committee of Inquiry, appointed by the War Office on account of the reduced numbers of the Militia. And how did they deal with it? Paragraph 104 of their Report recommended, not that the Militia should be recruited up to its full strength, but that it should be given a Peace Establishment, reducing it to 75 men per company, exclusive of the Staff. That was worse than what was done by the Irishman whose blanket was too short, and who, in order to lengthen it, cut off a piece from the top and sewed it on the bottom; whereas here the War Office Committee recommended to cut a piece off altogether. But there was happily a recommendation of that Committee which he (the Earl of Wemyss) trusted would commend itself to their Lordships, and which, as proposed in his Resolution, was to the effect that the Militia Reserve should be borne in excess of its Establishment, for it said—

“The present arrangement by which the Militia Reserve is borne on the strength of Militia Battalions to the amount of 25 per cent, while liable to be withdrawn from it at any moment, is open to great objection, and we consider that the Militia Reserve men should be borne as supernumeraries on the roll of their regiments.”

That was practically part of the Resolution which he was about to submit. He was certain, from his experience in “another House,” that figures were never palatable; but without figures he could not have proved his case. He asked their Lordships to look at the Resolution simply from a patriotic point of view, and to cast all questions of Party aside. It was not a question at all of Party, for every Party in the State was equally interested in the condition of the Militia. He thought he had shown a state of things, both as regarded the Army and Militia, that he ventured to say could not exist in any other country in Europe. Nay, more, it could not exist in Japan; for he had seen that the Japanese had organized themselves in fear of China on the German system, that they maintained an Army of 40,000 men, capable of expansion to 300,000, and that they were improving their Commissariat and their Transport. As regarded our Commissariat and Transport, he wished the noble and gallant Lord (Lord Wolseley) were present, to speak of them as they had been tried. He (the Earl of Wemyss) held that, at present, the state of the Army was a very serious one. This was not a question of “bloated armaments,” or of rivaling Foreign Powers, or of fulfilling Treaty obligations, such as led the Secretary of State, in 1870, to come down and ask for an increase of 20,000 men, and it was six months before they could get 10,000. In the present state of our Army and Militia, it became a question of the security of our Colonies and of the Indian Empire. When our battalions at home were little more than depôts, as he had pointed out, it became a question also of the safety of this country, for who could rely for safety on our Fleet? No; our first line of defence was insufficient; it was known to be so. There were noble Lords in that House, and others conversant with naval affairs in “another place,” who were constantly telling us that our iron-clads were insufficient in number; that our armaments were deficient, and that other nations were taking rapid strides in advance. But the state of our Army was a very old story, and dated a very long period back. In 1658, these words were used by Cromwell, and he would ask their Lordships to observe how he spoke of “the silver streak”—

“I beseech you, consider a little. I beseech you, consider how things do co-operate. Should it happen that, as contrivances stand, you should not be able to vindicate yourselves against all whomsoever. I name no one State upon this head. Judge you where you are. You have accounted yourselves happy in being environed with a great ditch from all the world beside. Truly, you will not be able to keep your ditch, nor your shipping, unless you turn your ships and shipping into troops of horse and companies of foot, and fight and defend yourselves on terra firma. And, these things stated, liberavi animam meam, and if there be no danger in all this, I am satisfied. I have told you. You will judge if there is no danger. If you shall think we may discourse of all things at pleasure, and that it is a time of sleep, and ease, and rest, without any due sense of these things, I have this comfort to God-ward. I have told you of it."

He ventured, again, to ask their Lordships to throw all Party considerations aside, and to vote independently on this Resolution. If they believed the state of things which he had described to be true, he invited their Lordships to declare with regard to the Militia, at least—as they had power and influence in that matter—that such a state of things was dangerous to the interests of the country, and should no longer be permitted to continue. He begged to move the Resolution which stood in his name.

Moved to resolve—

"That having regard to the present defective military organization and to the great importance of the Militia force, it is essential that the Militia be forthwith recruited up to their established strength; and that the 'Militia Reserve' should, as intended by its originator the late General Peel, and as recommended by the Militia Committee of 1877, be borne in excess of the Militia establishment."—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD: My Lords, I support the Resolution proposed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Wemyss). The Government has shown such indifference to the representations that have been made to them as to the deficiencies of the Regular Army, that, possibly, they may have some scheme to render the Auxiliary Forces efficient, which they only await such an occasion as this to announce. As to the defective military organization, which is the preface of this Notice, it has been so recently noticed that it is only necessary for me to remind the Department charged with the military administration, that, even if recruits at once offered to fill the vacancies now existing and the vacancies immediately expected—said, in round numbers, to be 15,000—there would not then be an Army, but only the materials from which to construct an Army in 18 months or two years. A small party of recruits placed in a trained regiment will become soldiers in a comparatively short time—three or four months; but a large number of recruits, thrown into a battalion of young men little more advanced than themselves, require more time to acquire a steady formation. And the Line being in this unsatisfactory state, numerically, as known to most people, except the War Office, we turn to the Auxiliary Forces to see what dependence can be placed upon them. I do not here speak of the Volunteers, except to say that, having once been amongst those who doubted the stability of the Institution, and the constancy of those who originated it, my doubts have long disappeared, and I recognize the Volunteer Force as an essential element of the national strength. But the connection of the Militia with the Line brings it more directly under our notice, and we can hardly say, from what we know, that the deficiency of the Line is compensated for by the satisfactory condition of the Militia. Both are much below par, and no energetic steps appear to be in progress to bring them up to the mark. We know that there are some admirable regiments, very fairly complete in numbers, assembling for training frequently under great difficulties, with a spirit that does them honour; but when we look at the total, and those painful figures "wanting to complete" and "absent from training," we feel how much remains to be done. It must be remembered that, considering the requirements of an Empire that is in every part of the world, and in many parts of the world subject to aggression, the Military Establishments are on a very low scale; and if every man voted by Parliament were an effective soldier, there would not be a man too many. What must then be our reflections when we find our responsibilities daily increasing, and our means of meeting those responsibilities daily diminishing? The case of the Militia has been put upon the deficiency of the Army, as a reason why this Force should be recruited to its full strength; but even if the Army were complete, as it sometimes appears to be on paper, the necessity exists that the Militia should be complete also. The Militia Reserve is, perhaps, not the best possible Service for a Reserve; but it was the best that offered at the moment, at a time when an Army Reserve, good as far as it went, was only forming by dribblets; and I am quite aware that General Peel's hope was that the Militia Service would, in time, become so popular that a future Minister would be able to add this Reserve to the original number of the Militia; and certainly there is good ground for the opinion that such a Reserve would at least equal the Army Reserve of the present system, which I do not undervalue, but which, I say, draws from the ranks prematurely men whose services can ill be spared from their regiments. I do not follow the noble Earl (the Earl of Wemyss) through the details of the statement that he has made, nor do I enter upon minor details as to terms of training, payment of bounties, part-worn clothing, and such points, upon which Militia officers, of whom several are present, are more competent to speak than myself; but I add my testimony to that of the noble Earl, that much more serious attention is required to the whole subject of the Militia Forces, and I say that the War Office cannot continue to look on, with a light heart, at the defects in both Army and Militia that have been pressed upon their Notice.

LORD TRURO, said, that nothing, in his opinion, was more marvellous than the stolid indifference of the public on this question, except, perhaps, the fact that the noble Marquess at the head of the War Office should have had to express his surprise that the Representatives of the people in "another place" seemed to think that the subject might be discussed as well in their absence as in their presence. Now, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Weymss) had spoken of the numbers of the Army, the state of the Army, and the difficulties of recruiting. The numbers of the Army were certainly very unsatisfactory in spite of the Return, which showed that there were 431 men above the Establishment. That Return omitted to point out that 11,133 men were taken from the Army Reserve, and that 7,784 of them were returned to the Army, after the campaign in Egypt. The fact, therefore, was that, instead of an excess, there was an actual diminution of 3,329 men. Nor did the discipline of the Force seem more satisfactory than its numbers; for the last annual Return showed that 969 men were reported drunk on duty, and 800 drunk off duty. One word as to the Militia. In 1881, the Establishment voted, including officers, was 139,501 men. The numbers below that Establishment were 11,633. The money voted was £1,191,259, and the surplus beyond the requirements of the year was consequently £104,697. In 1882, the Establishment voted was 139,293; the number below the Establishment was 20,592; the money that was voted was £1,189,297, leaving a surplus of £212,715. In 1883, the Establishment voted was 142,874; up to the month of February, the actual was 3,581 below the Establishment; and the money voted was £1,314,392, or £92,866 above the amount required. Including the three years from 1881 up to the 1st of February, 1883, there was a deficiency of the numbers necessary to complete the Establishment voted of 35,806 men, and in the three years the surplus of money voted for the Militia was £410,278. He was not sufficiently conversant with the financial arrangements of the Army to know what became of the surplus of money voted; but it seemed to him strange that we should be voting a larger Vote every year with a diminution in the number of recruits for the Militia. That so large a sum of money should remain unaccounted for was, he thought, a circumstance highly unsatisfactory. He had always understood that the object of the Militia Reserve was to serve as a feeder to the Army; but, if that were so, he did not understand a suggestion by the Inspector General, that men should be re-enlisted for home service only, when, if they were to be of any service to the Army, they must be willing to go abroad. To propose that the Militia Reserve should be recruited from men who re-enlisted with the condition that they should not serve abroad, was to treat the Militia in a manner that was not originally contemplated.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, that he wished to say a few words in support of the Motion. He agreed with much that had been said by the noble Earl (the Earl of Wemyss) about the defective organization of the Army, and the great deficiency in the numbers of the Militia, and considered that, to a great extent, the noble Earl had proved his case. It was lamentable that the regiments at our great camp at Aldershot were in so wretched a state that they were not able to have a decent field day on the Queen's Birthday. It was not a sufficient answer to say that the recruits were drilled at the depôts, for there were regiments at Aldershot that could not get recruits. The 3rd Rifle Brigade could not muster more than 200 on parade, and had no recruits. With regard to the Militia, it must be recollected by all that it was the old Constitutional Force of the country. During the Crimean War it gave 30,000 or 40,000 men to the Line, and its regiments garrisoned the Mediterranean stations. Since then the Force had been greatly improved, and most of the officers had gone through the School of Instruction, and had passed the examination for promotion. It had been shown that not only the present Government, but those who had preceded them, had not sufficiently encouraged the Militia, and the reason was not far to seek. When the short-service system was introduced Lord Cardwell had stated that he hoped we should soon have a Reserve of 80,000 men; but the lamentable fact was that we had but 25,000 or 30,000 men in that Reserve. Lord Cardwell anticipated that the First Class Reserve would be so large that he could abolish the Militia Reserve, and that was a most unfortunate expectation. General Peel was too far-seeing not to perceive that, under voluntary enlistment, we could not have a large Reserve, and his expectations had proved true. The Militia was really tested by the numbers that came up for inspection, excluding, of course, the Irish Militia; and he found that, last year, in England and Scotland, only 80,000 men came up, 7,000 being absent without leave, who were practically gone, while 3,000 were absent with leave. The waste in the Militia, too, was as bad as the waste in the Army. In a year there were 18,000 discharges, and 6,942 desertions, the only satisfactory fact being that 3,000 joined the Army. This waste, amounting to 30,000 a-year, was too little thought of at the War Office. It would be far better to limit recruiting a little than to have the enormous losses which we had by desertion and fraudulent enlistment in the Army and in the Militia. He thought those offences were looked upon too favourably by the War Office, and that the time had come when the mawkish sensibility with which they were looked upon should be cast off, and that they should be seriously dealt with. Some system of marking, such as vaccination, should be adopted. While dealing with these evils at great length, the Resolution of the noble Earl did not indicate any remedy, it did not say how the result desired was to be effected, and how men were to be obtained. That, no doubt, was the most important part of the whole question; but we were not yet, however, in such a state as to be obliged to resort to the ballot. If the supporters of the Resolution offered suggestions, they would not probably have much value in the War Office, which had full information at its disposal; but it might be well if the War Office would consult more than they did the colonels of regiments. He was glad to find that there had been a small increase in the re-enrolment of the men. This was, after all, a question of money, and inducements should be offered to men who had served their time and were willing to enrol again. As to the practice, introduced a year ago, of drilling recruits on enrolment, he was of opinion that the sooner it was abolished the better. It ought not to be left optional, but should be entirely swept away. The Inspector General of Recruiting, in his Reports, said it was quite impossible that the two systems should go on together. Moreover, the Government must, by this time, be aware that great dissatisfaction had been produced in the Militia by the loss of the 10s. With regard to the Militia Reserve, he could not help thinking that it would not be a bad plan to allow a certain percentage of married men to join it. Above all, it was necessary to keep up the Militia to its full quota, and not to be careless about its numbers, simply because we put a weak faith in the First Class Army Reserve. In conclusion, he expressed his belief that, in the main, his noble Friend's suggestions and Motion deserved their Lordships' serious attention, and he hoped they would be carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government.

LORD WAVENEY said, that, in his opinion, a great deal of the present difficulty had been caused because the old traditions of the Militia had been disregarded. The constant changes and the transferring Militiamen from one corps to another destroyed their feeling of regimental duty. They were, at that moment, discussing a problem which was initiated in the public Press some 40 years ago by the greatest soldier of England, when there was an expectation of a hostile invasion of England, or attempts at military insult from the other side of the Channel. Since then there had been many changes. The Militia had been called out, and they had become, he might say, the Army of England. He thought the Government were entitled to credit for making the change by which Militia battalions could, by volunteering, be employed by the Regular troops. He would suggest that that system should be extended, and that a battalion of Militia might, with its own consent, be entitled, with its officers, to pass to the front. He was glad that the Militia had been brought within the reach of our military system; but he hoped that in any further changes greater inducements would be held out to men to join the Service.

THE EARL OF SANDWICH said, that, in his opinion, if they gave every soldier a free kit and free rations, they would have no difficulty in obtaining a fair body of troops. He thought, however, that the absence of comfort in the barracks was a greater cause of the failure of recruiting and of the absence of contentment in the ranks than even the pay. Again, many soldiers entered the Army expecting to have a jolly life; but when they found that half their time was taken up with drill, and the remainder with musketry and other instruction, they got disgusted. With regard to recruiting, a great deal depended on the zeal and perseverance of officers, some of whom, under like circumstances, were far more successful than others. He hoped that the long-service system would be adopted, for he thought that when the men got the long-service pension they would have a contented and happy soldiery. The present administration of the Army was most unsatisfactory, the reason being that it could not be learned properly within the walls of the War Office. The Ministers who went to the War Office had to depend for their information upon the officials of the Department, among whom there ought to be a flow of promotion as well as elsewhere. The Army Estimates amounted to about £16,000,000; and of that sum it appeared that only £2,000,000 were given to the private soldiers, £14,000,000 going in other ways; so that the rank and file of the Service had not got much above a tithe of the money that was intended for them. He had no objection to give rewards to the noble Lord and the noble and gallant Admiral who served in Egypt; but why could not some be given to gallant privates too? Why did not the Government do these things in a liberal spirit, and not go on making changes which caused officers and men to be discontented? With regard to the territorial system, he thought that £3,500,000 had been ill-spent upon that system. He could show the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War (the Earl of Morley) the tremendous cost of the dépôt barracks; he could show him that at a dépôt there were a colonel, a major, four captains, four subalterns, and no end of staff, and only 50 men. How absurd that was! They should return to the old company system. With regard to the Militia training, he hoped it was not true that they were this year not to be trained at their old quarters. Directly they took the regiments away from the quarters to which they had been used for years, they could not get recruits. He was glad that the noble Marquess had returned to the War Office. The noble Marquess, he believed, wished to do away with some of the changes that had been made which had not succeeded; at any rate, he hoped that was his feeling. The old system was the best; and if the noble Marquess was guided by what he gathered, not merely from the officials of the War Office, but throughout the Service, he would benefit the country and earn the thanks of the Army.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, he was strongly of opinion that the Militia ought to be recruited so as to be kept up to its full and efficient strength. The question was asked, what was the cause of the difficulty in recruiting the Militia? It was very simple. The Militiaman used formerly to be enrolled for five years' service, and he received 10s. on enrolment, and £6 at the end of his five years' training. Now, however, he was called upon to serve for six years, with exactly the same amount of bounty as when he served for five years. That, of course, produced dissatisfaction. There was also dissatisfaction because he did not receive 10s. on enrolment. That 10s. was what the men looked to most, for they used to receive it in winter, that being the time when most of them enlisted, employment being scarce; and it helped them to get through the long months of winter. The proportion of men formerly who did not come up for training in the regiment with which he had the honour to be connected was small. There was another system which caused great dissatisfaction, and which was much disliked by the men, and that was that immediately after enrolment the new recruits were sent to headquarters, where there was insufficient accommodation, and nothing for them to fill up their time with, to undergo 63 days' training and drill. Nothing deterred men so much from enlisting as this arrangement; and, in his opinion, the old system of training was much better. Another source of complaint on the part of the Militia was the large amount of fatigue duty put upon them as compared with the men of the Line. Then, again, there were no arms for them. With regard to arms, the Militia were always kept some years behind the Line, for while the Line were supplied with the most improved arms, such as the Martini-Henry, the Militia were provided with inferior rifles which had been superseded, as the Snider; the result being that, when the men passed into the Line, they had put into their hands rifles for which entirely different drill and different fighting were required. If they wanted to make the Militia efficient, why not supply them with the arms they would have to use if they joined the Line? Then, with regard to musketry instruction, the Militiaman had only 10 rounds of ball cartridge served out to him, which were wholly insufficient to teach him how to load his gun, much less to make him a good shot. Again, the fact ought to be recognized that the men did not like the territorial system. They knew the regiments by their numbers, but not by their new names; and the men liked to join particular regiments, and would not go into the Army at all, if they were to be drafted wherever ordered. It was also very important, in order to keep Militia regiments efficient, that they should have commissioned and non-commissioned officers of their own, and not merely have officers lent them from their depôts. He would not detain the House longer; but ventured to submit these points to the consideration of the Government.

THE MARQUESS OF HERTFORD said, he most earnestly supported the arguments which his noble Friend upon the Cross Benches (the Earl of Wemyss) had so ably placed before their Lordships. He (the Marquess of Hertford) thought the Militia, the old Constitutional Force of the country, had been very much neglected. The position of the Militia, even under the scheme of Lord Cardwell, begun in 1872, had been almost entirely left out of the question, for very few, if any, of the details of that scheme as regarded the Militia had been carried out at all. He would recall to remembrance that—

"1. All Line Battalions at home to be raised to war strength, the 50 Expeditionary Battalions being first considered, by calling up Army Reserve men to the Colours, supplementing the deficiency, if any, by Militia Reserve and volunteers from Militia Battalions.

"2. In each of the 50 districts required to furnish Expeditionary Battalions, embody both Militia Battalions.

"3. In each of the remaining districts embody one Militia Battalion.

"4. Complete each Depôt Centre to a full Battalion to serve as a training Battalion for recruits.

"5. Complete all embodied Militia Battalions to war strength.

"6. Make all enlistments during the war for general service in the Line and Militia Battalions of any Brigade district."

Not one of those things had been done. When the short-service system was first introduced, having been for several years adjutant to a battalion of the Guards, he (the Marquess of Hertford) wrote to a large number of officers who had risen from the ranks, and who, he thought, were therefore practical men, and asked them their opinions on the subject of recruiting. In reply, almost every one of them said they were opposed to short service, and predicted precisely what had happened with regard to that and to the Reserve. These letters he had sent to Lord Cardwell at the time, and were returned. No attention was paid to the opinions of regimental officers. A few days since a man who had completed his service with the Colours and passed into the Reserve wrote that, after beginning life by learning the trade of an engine-fitter, he entered the Service; and he now stated that having left the Reserve he was unable to find work except as a mechanic at low wages, and that he was now earning 13s. or 14s. a-week less than he would have done had he continued in his former trade; he had nothing to fall back upon but poverty and the workhouse. He went on to say that he would have been ready and willing to serve his country for 21 years with the prospect of a pension as a provision for his old age. That showed how short service acted in many cases. He thought the Government would act wisely if, with a view to a return to the old system, so far as could be effected, they were to call together again the Committee known as Lord Airey's Committee. The Members of that Committee knew what had taken place during the past 12 years, and would not recommend anything impracticable. He would also suggest that the Militia Reserve ought to be our principal Reserve; and that, as regarded the Army Reserve, if it was really necessary to maintain it, means should be adopted by the Government to enable men to find work readily, when they left the Colours to go into the Reserve, by keeping a register of employers who would be willing to give such men the employment they desired. He hoped, however, that it might turn out to be unnecessary, and that the Government would go back to long service with pensions. They should also increase the pay of the men, such increase to depend upon good conduct only; and he would suggest, in particular, that the pay of non-commissioned officers should be so treated. He would also have deserters marked with the letter D, or in some other way, for desertion, so as to prevent them from fraudulently enlisting in other regiments; and he hoped the Government would be able to see their way, so that those men whom it might be desirable to keep with the Colours should be given half the deferred pay and six weeks' furlough at the expiration of the first term of service, the remaining half of the pay being placed in a savings' bank until the completion of the second term of service; that all Reserve men with good characters should be taken back into the ranks; that officers should be appointed to address meetings in recruiting districts for the purpose of explaining the advantages of service in the Army, instead of leaving it to the recruiting sergeants only. The Secretary of State for War should surround himself with more regimental officers and fewer civilians; for under the Government of the Duke of Wellington, when the Army was far more economically managed, his Grace's Military Administration consisted of no less than 10 distinguished officers—all of them in Parliament—whereas there were now only three military officers, including the Commander-in-Chief.

VISCOUNT BURY said, that he had been in great hope that his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Morley) would have addressed their Lordships earlier in the evening. He must confess that the Motion of his noble Friend (the Earl of Wemyss) placed him in a dilemma, for he (Viscount Bury) agreed with him that the ranks of the Militia were not full; that it was hardly in an efficient state as regarded discipline; and that the Army, in the matter of recruiting, was even in a more unsatisfactory state than the Militia. But, on the other hand, they must consider the effect of passing the noble Earl's Motion. The fact was that the men would not come. As it had been already explained by more than one speaker, there were grievances and inconveniences connected with the Militia which deterred men from entering into that branch of the Service. Under those circumstances, and taking those things into consideration, to pass such an abstract Resolution as that before the House would effect no good; for it would commit the House to nothing, and therefore could have no effect, for the men would not come any the more simply because that House had declared the desirability of filling the ranks. It would not remove the grievances which existed, and therefore could not have the result of making men join the Militia. It would, in fact, partake of the nature of a brutum fulmen; and he hoped, therefore, that his noble Friend would not ask their Lordships to divide. As to the second part of the Resolution, it was of little use to deal with that until they got the ranks full. At the same time, he quite recognized the fact that the debate which had taken place was a most instructive one. It was plain from it that many military authorities in that House agreed that the present state of the Army was extremely unsatisfactory. Their Lordships must also recognize the fact that, 12 years after the change made by Lord Cardwell, they were actually in a worse condition than they were at that time. There was no doubt that, before the introduction of that scheme, it was impossible to fill up the ranks of the Army, and that the recruits were not sufficient for its ordinary wants. Lord Cardwell, therefore, brought forward an elaborate scheme, from which he anticipated great results. They had since passed through 12 years under that scheme, and had spent millions of money, and yet were no better off than they were before. They must, therefore, now agree that the time had come for acknowledging that the scheme for which they sacrificed so much had been a failure, and that they ought to try an entirely new departure. Lord Cardwell's scheme was divided into two parts, one constructive, and the other destructive. Wherever Lord Cardwell destroyed, he destroyed for good and all; he destroyed the old Army, and buried its bones. But the constructive part of his scheme had entirely failed, and they had no Army now, as they had no Army then. The noble Marquess who had just spoken (the Marquess of Hertford) suggested that they should revive the Committee over which Lord Airey presided. That Committee had made a very useful Report, and offered some very valuable suggestions; but, up to that day, those suggestions had never been fairly taken into consideration. They were told that the Report would be laid upon the Table; but their Lordships all knew how it was delayed until Mr. Childers should elaborate his scheme. The scheme was propounded in the other House, and was then carried into effect. The changes introduced by that scheme were the bases on which their Army now rested, and he would like to put it to their Lordships whether those changes were any more effective than those which had been introduced by Lord Cardwell? The Egyptian War was, no doubt, a severe test for the new system; but, at the same time, those operations had notoriously dislocated their whole Army system. The Army they sent out, although a good one in itself, exhausted their resources altogether; and if the war had lasted, they would certainly have been driven to very great straits both for men and material. His noble Friend (the Earl of Sandwich) had stated that £3,500,000 had in the first two years been spent upon dépôt centres under Lord Cardwell's system; and what good were they now? But no man could form an idea of the enormous sums spent in abolishing the Purchase system and establishing the new scheme. Probably, it would not be too much to say that it cost £12,000,000 or £14,000,000. The old Purchase system might not have been a good one; but the question was, Was it worth while to pay so much to abolish it? Spent upon our men, that sum of money would have been sufficient to fill up the ranks of the Army and Reserves to their full strength—for, as the illustrious Duke upon the Cross Benches (the Duke of Cambridge) had often said, it was all a question of money. If they wanted men, they must pay for them; if they did not pay for them, they could not have them. That was why they had denuded battalions of Militia far below their normal strength, as well as the Army generally, to the deplorable position he had described. He hoped, however, that his noble Friend would not press his Motion; and one reason why he did so was that they had no right in that House to initiate a question of an increase of expenditure. If they asked that the ranks of the Militia should be filled up, they should point out how that was to be done, and that it could be done without increasing the pay of the Militiamen and the Linesmen. For that reason, though he looked upon the debate as a most valuable one, and as one proving the truth of what his noble Friend had said, he did not think it would be advisable to press the Motion to a Division.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he had listened to one or two of the speeches made in the course of the debate with some little astonishment. The noble Viscount who spoke last (Viscount Bury) began with a Philippic against the changes introduced by Lord Cardwell and Mr. Childers. But he was cautious enough to omit all reference to the period which elapsed between the two Administrations when noble Lords opposite held Office. He did not wish to say anything against the administration of the noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Cranbrook) or Colonel Stanley; but he thought the noble Viscount must have heard the noble Viscount's (Viscount Bury's) speech with something like dismay. The noble Viscount spoke of all the money spent on dépôt centres by Liberal Governments; but was he not himself, in some measure, responsible while he was in Office? Was all the money spent on the Militia depôts spent by the Liberal Government? Then, as to the statement that the changes made by Lord Cardwell and Mr. Childers were absolute failures, and that we had no greater Reserves than in 1870, he begged absolutely to deny it. In proof of that, he would ask whether, in 1870, we could possibly have done what we did last autumn, when we sent 28,000 men out of the country? Two of the noble Lords opposite who had spoken were extremely bitter against the organization of the War Office, and against the permanent officials in Pall Mall; but they appeared to forget that there was a military as well as a civilian element there, and that there were distinguished Generals at the War Office whose advice was taken by the Secretary of State for War on all occasions. There was a distinguished General who presided over the Auxiliary Forces, and he would like to know where they could get better advice? He should now confine himself to answering the speech of the noble Earl on the Cross Benches (the Earl of Wemyss), who had brought the Motion forward; and, in doing so, he must say he was glad the noble Earl did not postpone recurring to his military experiences until we had experienced a great disaster, because then their Lordships would have been deprived of an eloquent speech and an interesting debate. But there was something singularly inconsequential in the Motion and the speech. The noble Earl began by stating that the military organization was defective. Indeed, he (the Earl of Morley) could only look upon the Motion as a censure of the military organization of the present day. The noble Earl chiefly found fault with the defective state of the Regular Forces; but the remedy he proposed was not to improve the Regular Forces, but to endeavour to recruit the Militia up to its full Establishment, and even to add to that Establishment. [The Earl of Wemyss: Hear, hear!] He should be glad if the noble Earl would show him any sequence between the two. The noble Earl based his Motion on the assertion, first, that we had sacrificed our First Line to the Reserve; and, secondly, that our recruiting system had broken down. He based these assertions upon some remarks made by Mr. Childers, but which were somewhat different from what the noble

The Earl of Morley

Earl had quoted, and upon a very able article in The Nineteenth Century, by Sir Lintorn Simmons, though some of the statements were exaggerated. The only tittle of evidence the noble Earl had alleged was taken from an experience of two battalions. In one portion of the article by Sir Lintorn Simmons there was an important mistake, for he stated that the Home Army was 8,000 under its Establishment, and then he went on to say that this year it would be 17,000 or 20,000 under its proper strength, and that that state of things would go on until the deficiency was 30,000. He wished he knew what were the data on which Sir Lintorn Simmons had made that statement. As far as he knew, the recruiting this year was better than in former years instead of worse, and would more than meet the ordinary demands of the Army. It was now going on at the rate of 3,000 a-month, and had produced in the first six months of this year about 3,000 men more than were obtained in the first six months of 1882. An argument that had been used over and over again against the present system was that it had increased waste enormously, and to an extent that could not be met by recruiting; and it was assumed that all waste, whether from desertion, dismissal, or discharge, was entirely due to the unfortunate system of his noble Friend (Viscount Cardwell). Now, he would state the results of a comparison he had made between the last 10 years of the long-service system and the last 10 years of short service. In the last 10 years of the long-service system, ending in 1870, the desertions numbered in all 21,800, while in the 10 years from 1873 to 1882 they numbered 28,900, the increase being 7,000. That did not show that the whole or a fraction of the desertion was entirely due to his noble Friend's system of short service. But it was evident that the number was very considerable under both systems alike. Marking for desertion was only abolished in 1870, so that, in the 10 years of long service that he had instanced, deserters were marked, and that did not offer a very strong argument for a revival of the marking system as a check to desertion. It was to be noticed that before 1870 a man was struck off the strength of his regiment if he was absent for two months; but it had now been reduced to 21 days, therefore it was clear that this circumstance must be taken into account in comparing the desertions in the first period with those in the second period; and it would show an undue proportion of desertion in the latter period. He really believed that if they examined the figures carefully they would find that the desertion was quite as enormous in the 10 years of long service as in the 10 of short, if not more so. The other causes of waste might, for convenience, be classified together as discharges from various causes, and deaths. The result of the figures was this—that in the 10 years of long service 177,000 men left the Army on account of death or discharge. In the 10 years of short service was there an increase? No, there was a positive decrease of 4,000; and the loss in the 10 years from discharge and death was reduced to 173,000. Those were very remarkable figures, and showed that the waste of the Army could not be attributed to short service. It was often said that these results were all very well; but the recruiting was not successful, and could not keep pace with the waste. Now, what were the facts? The total average annual waste of the last 10 years of long service was about 20,000, and the total of recruits was about 15,000. The total average annual waste of the 10 years of short service, including a large number of men—3,500 on an average—who passed into the Reserve, was 24,000, and the average number of recruits was 24,400. In one case, the annual waste exceeded the numbers supplied by recruiting; and, in the other, the numbers of recruits exceeded the annual waste. The truth was that 10 or 15 years ago the Army was unable to furnish drafts for foreign service, and was also year by year reducing the Establishment by about 4,000 men. The noble Earl who moved the Resolution referred to the state of the battalions at Aldershot, and there was no question about their strength. If the noble Earl wished to have the whole Army placed on a war footing, and able to send all its battalions out of the country at a moment's notice, a much stronger Army would be necessary than they at present possessed. All that was now aimed at was that one Army Corps should be ready for immediate active service, with another in an advanced state of preparation; and, if more were wanted, it would be necessary to complete the 48 low-strength battalions with the Reserves. The noble Earl mentioned these low-strength battalions; but the last Returns showed that they had lately been recruited considerably beyond the figures quoted by the noble Earl, and that process was still going on. He (the Earl of Morley) fully admitted—and so did Mr. Childers admit—that the strength of these battalions was in many cases extremely low, and that none of them were on a Peace Establishment fit for the field. They were designed to act partly as recruiting depôts to supply foreign drafts, partly to perform such home duties as their strength allowed, and to afford cadres which could be expanded in time of war. But, at the same time, he must repeat it was unfair and misleading to fix upon two or three of the weakest of these low-strength battalions, and to say that they were miserable regiments, unfitted for service, and that the whole system had consequently broken down. It was also said that the Army Reserve was weaker in 1883 than in 1873. On January 1, 1873, there were 31,000 men in the Reserves, but 20,000 of them were pensioners over 40 years of age.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: The numbers might be greater in January, 1883, than in 1873; but that was at the expense of the First Line.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that the noble Lord who had made the comparison could not really think that these pensioners were efficient men who would be available to fill gaps in regiments on active service; for, if he did, he (the Earl of Morley) could not agree with him. On January 1, 1883, the First Class Army Reserve numbered 27,000 men, of whom 11,000 had been mobilized for service in Egypt; and a Reserve of that kind, with so large a proportion of useful men, was surely better than a larger Reserve with 20,000 pensioners. The noble Earl had forgotten to mention that nearly a third of the true Reserve last year was at the time fighting on the Nile, and that it was impossible that it could be in two places at once; the men could not serve with the Colours, and remain at home in the Reserve also. He (the Earl of Morley) would admit that on the 1st of January, 1883, the Army Establishment at home was below its numbers. There was, in fact, a deficiency of between 4,000 and 5,000 men; but since that time large numbers of men had returned from India, and, as their terms of service expired, went to the Reserve; and as the Reserves were further swollen by the return of men from Egypt, the total now would be somewhat over 30,000 men. The result had been described as a miserable one; but he did not consider it so at all, and he ventured to say that, by the 30,000 men just mentioned, the Reserve was stronger than it was 10 years ago; and he challenged any noble Lord to deny that it was so. He was at a loss to understand what was meant when it was said that the Militia received no attention. In 1867 its effective strength was 70,000; at the beginning of this year it was 104,400; and now it would be 109,000. Of course, the non-calling out of the Irish Militia was due to higher than financial reasons. At one time recruits were drilled for 14 days, and the period of training was 27 days; but the 14 days had been increased to 56, and even 63 in some cases. Could it be denied that the adjutants and permanent staff were more efficient than they used to be?

THE EARL OF LIMERICK said, that the Irish Militia were not included in the Return for 1867; they were not trained then.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, that on referring to the annual Returns he found that that was the case, and he apologized for having inadvertently taken that year. But he would take 1865, a year the Irish Militia were trained, and we then had 101,000, as against 109,000 this year. As to recruiting for the Militia, we had this year obtained 18,000 recruits, as against 13,500 in the first five months of last year; and during the same period 4,500 of the Militia had joined the Regular Forces. What was proposed appeared to him to involve an addition of 30,000 men to the Militia; and he thought it would be a long time before the country would consent to it. The ballot had been mentioned; but the report of a very influential Committee was against the adoption of that measure. He had endeavoured to show that the present system was anything but a failure, and he did not admit that recruiting was breaking down; indeed, on the whole, it was never more flourishing. He must admit that, even in its present flourishing condition, it was not to be anticipated that it would be able to make good this year the deficiency which all deplored. Other measures, which he had explained on a previous occasion, had been taken at home and in India to meet this difficulty, which he hoped might prove successful. He denied that either himself or the Secretary of State for War were at all disposed to treat the matter light-heartedly. They looked upon it as one of the greatest importance, and as such it was constantly engaging and receiving their careful attention. On the flimsy facts adduced it was unfair to say that the present short-service system was a failure; and, as the Resolution implied that the whole military organization was bad, he could not accept it, although he quite agreed with that part of it which spoke of the importance of the Militia.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK said, that no man could be absolutely free to take entirely his own way, and deal entirely by his own judgment with matters of administration. He himself, as succeeding Lord Cardwell at the War Office, which he had done twice, found a great number of subjects had been opened up which required to be settled. Many things had been done which could not be undone. It was impossible to alter them; and he had therefore to endeavour to make the best of the circumstances in which he found himself. Promotion was at a standstill, and he had to take steps to advance it by an expenditure the necessity for which Lord Cardwell must have contemplated. There was, for instance, the question of the abolition of Purchase. Upon that the expenditure had been enormous; and it was impossible to go back, for it was necessary to carry out a system which could not be stopped without reducing the Army to a state of greater chaos than it was before. So, also, with regard to brigade depôts. When he came into Office, he believed that £2,000,000 out of £2,500,000 had been pledged to be expended upon that scheme, and it was necessary to continue it. He had no desire to introduce anything personal into the discussion; but he mentioned these things to explain that he was obliged, without entering into the question whether anything better could be advised, to continue on a course which had already been entered upon and to give it a fair trial. It had been said that a civilian Secretary of State for War seemed to be isolated among civilians; but the illustrious Duke on the Cross-Benches knew that when he (Viscount Cranbrook) held that Office, he endeavoured to get the opinions of Staff and Regimental officers, and of Generals who had passed through all the grades of the Service. With regard to the Militia, the very facts to which his noble Friend behind him (Viscount Hardinge) had adverted would show that so far from not consulting the Heads of the Militia, he did exactly the reverse. Colonel Stanley, at that time Under Secretary of State, afterwards to become Secretary, was an active colonel in a Militia regiment; and, moreover, the appointment of the Committee on which the noble Duke sat was but an attempt to obtain from the Militia colonels themselves their opinions as to the best mode of dealing with the Militia. He thought the best thing they could do in that House was to avoid as far as possible anything that would tend to disturb the existing systems under which men were enlisted and officers joined. His noble Friend behind him (the Marquess of Hertford) had spoken of going directly back to long service. His noble Friend might say what he liked upon that subject; but it was an absolute impossibility to go back, thereby disturbing the existing state of thing in order to give effect to a vague and theoretic view, for this simple reason—that, under the long-service system, we could not get the recruits. We must look the facts in the face. The long-service system had failed, and, therefore, we had to adopt a system of almost entirely short service. He was far from saying that we had not many defects and difficulties to contend with. They had the defects which must come from the scheme of filling up the regiments first on the roster to their full strength in the manner in force at present. With regard to the enlistment of young men, he thought it should be an absolute rule that they should not send men to India until they were 20 years of age. That was no reason, however, why we should not accept recruits at the age of 18; because, by giving them the proper food and putting them under discipline for two years, they would make them stronger and fitter men for the purpose than if they left them to themselves in the streets. He was convinced that men of 19, who had been a year in the Army, were better than men of 20 picked up in the streets. The present Motion was one which he could not support, because he did not believe it to be correct. In the first place, he did not admit that he was to blame for the system under which we were living; yet, at the same time, it had been his duty to carry it into effect, and to give as great efficiency to it as he could. He did not believe that, even supposing the military organization to be inefficient at that present moment, it could be remedied by the means indicated by his noble Friend (the Earl of Wemyss) in his Motion. It was altogether out of the question. He had endeavoured to improve the condition of the Militia. He altered the Acts, in order to meet the contingencies to which some noble Lords had adverted this evening, with a view to improve as far as possible the condition of the depôts; and, at the same time, he endeavoured to get at the best way of improving the Militia drill. A great stimulus was given to Militia recruiting by producing some of the men at Aldershot, and showing the materials of which the Militia was composed. Those noble Lords who spoke from behind him had mentioned certain circumstances which, in their judgment, militated against the recruiting of the Militia. These were subjects which were very well worthy of attention; but if noble Lords would look at the Returns of the Inspector General of Recruiting, they would find that there was a most enormous loss in the Militia between the time at which a man agreed to enroll, and the time at which he came up for training. He believed he might say, without exaggeration, that on the average 25 per cent were wanting at the time of training. That was an enormous amount, and it was most desirable, therefore, to find some means of bringing the men to training after they had enlisted. Many a man used to take the 10s. and spend it on his immediate wants, without any intention of presenting himself at the depôt; and, though they did not now give the 10s., there was the same difficulty in bringing up the men. For many years we had not been able to fill up the Militia to its full amount; but his noble Friend took only a part of the recommendations of the Committee, and left out the rest. The Committee recommended practically what General Peel had recommended—namely, that there should be a fixed amount—75 per cent of the existing number—and that the Militia Reserve should be in excess of that. This was perfectly right, and it was a very excellent system. They had to ask themselves if it was essential that they should have the Militia Reserve 30,000 in excess of the 131,000 constituting the Militia? So far as he was concerned, if they could double the Militia Reserve, he would be delighted; but they had to look at the facts. Could they get the Militia Regiments filled up to the strength which they desired? In that House they were at liberty to theorize as much as they pleased; but in “another place” everything their Lordships in that House discussed freely and in theory must be discussed practically, and with a view to expenditure; and he ventured to say it would be no use to ask the House of Commons to give the money which would enable them to have 30,000 additional Militiamen beyond the Establishment of 131,000. He strongly felt that this country was not in quite so lamentable a condition as his noble Friend would have them believe. For upwards of two centuries, with the exception of William III., no foreign enemy had trodden the soil of England, and William III. could hardly be considered as a foreign invader, because he was received with open arms by considerable sections of society in this country. He laid great stress on the Reserve. He wished it were greater; he wished the Army had been kept up to that greater standard that would have enabled them, to some extent, to fulfil the duty of bringing up their Reserves to a higher level. The failure there was the want of money; they kept their Army at a certain amount, and it practically amounted to this—they had an Army which was called upon to perform a great variety of duties, a great portion of which was done abroad, and as the men were sent abroad, they necessarily had to deplete the Force at home. If they were obliged to deplete the battalion at home to a certain extent to supply the battalion abroad, they must recruit the Army at home by getting new men. He was not sure that they ought not then to call out a Militia battalion; but when both battalions were abroad, there ought to be a new dépôt for a third battalion, and one battalion of Militia should be called out. But this country had been so much accustomed to conduct little wars, with a Peace Establishment, that they could not get it to do that. At that moment they had an Army of Occupation in Egypt, and they expected the Minister to come down to Parliament, and to have his men in two places at once. The thing was impossible. They had sent their best men out of the country to act as an Army of Occupation abroad, and in doing so had depleted their regiments at home; and unless they took upon themselves the expense of bringing out third battalions, or calling out the Militia to supply the place of the battalions abroad, they would always experience those difficulties, whether they had long service, or short service, or a mixture of both. He sincerely hoped that his noble Friend would not press his Motion to a Division. If he did, while agreeing with him in the desire to have the Militia recruited up to its full extent, and that the Militia Reserve should be efficient, he could not say that these things were essential to our military organization. He agreed with the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Hertford) that what they had to remedy first was the First Line. In the first place, let them assist the Government, without regard to Party, by showing that they were all earnestly desirous to have the Army up to a high position; and that, whether by the support of their votes, or by money, they would not shrink from giving what was needful to put the Army in an efficient state. He did not speak of invasion, because he believed there never was a time at which, if invasion were threatened, this country could bring to the front so many armed and well-trained men as she could do now. Even in the Napoleonic Wars, England had a Reserve that was brought to the front at one moment on the threat of invasion. But a great country like this had to look a great deal beyond that. It had to support its diplomacy by showing its strength in reserve, and by showing it in various parts of the world. They should also show that it was neither afraid to give the money nor the men to keep its Army upon a proper footing. If both Houses were agreed to do that, and to bring the Army into such a position, whether by long or by short service, or by an admixture of the two, then they would have done the essential thing for the country, and the next thing would be to bring the Militia into an efficient state; but the Line should be the first thing to be considered. But do not let them suppose that, by carrying that Motion, they were doing much for either of those objects.

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said, he considered that the debate had been one of great importance; still, it was absurd to suppose that they could upset what they had recently done; the men would not know what they were doing, or going to do. Whether they were right or wrong, nothing could be worse in those military matters than constant changes. Let it be distinctly laid down, so that it should be fully known, what was to be the condition on which the men were to serve, and they might depend upon it that there would be much greater facilities for securing men than there could be if their minds were perplexed by constant changes. In former days, the men did not know much about those discussions; but now, with the march of popular intelligence, and the diffusion of public prints, the men knew just as well as their Lordships did what was being talked about; and they studied and judged for themselves whether they were benefited or not by the recommendations that were made with the view of bringing up the numbers of the Army. He had listened for several hours to the various remarks which had been offered that evening, with many of which he agreed, although from others he differed. But what was the upshot of them all? Why, more money; it was the old story, and he was afraid he had repeated it ad nauseam; and unless the country, by its Representatives in the House of Commons, chose to pay more money for the Army, none of those things which had been recommended could be done. Take, for example, what the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbrook) had said with regard to raising a third battalion, when two battalions of a regiment were abroad. That could not be done without more money. He dared say the country would, on great occasions, find the additional money required, but not for a little war. Every one of the things they had heard of that night, however, meant money; and without more money none of those recommendations could be carried out. There was no question that the Army was under the Establishment, as was also the Militia; and the object of them all must be to get the Army made as efficient as possible. He was glad to hear the noble Viscount say that the Government must, without regard to Party, be supported in trying to introduce a system which would provide the number of men required to fill up the ranks of the Army. To bring those men into the ranks of the Army was the first problem; and then, after they had done that, they might try to fill up the Militia; but to try to fill up the Militia before they filled up the Line was like putting the cart before the horse, because the Militia would be of very great value to them after the Army was completed. Both the noble Marquess at the head of the War Office and the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War (the Earl of Morley) were endeavouring to find the best means of bringing the Line up to its full strength. Until that had been done they could not force recruiting for the Militia, because by so doing they would injure recruiting for the Line. They were now endeavouring to carry out a plan for attracting recruits more readily to the Army; and if noble Lords would support those endeavours, the chances were that they would do better than they had been doing. But they were recruiting now under a more easy condition than they did a short time ago. He agreed with the noble Viscount that it was impossible to get men at the age at which they actually wanted them. They had gone down to a lower age—18—and by so doing were opening the door again for the entrance of younger men, and that alone had produced a considerable effect on the numbers, for many young men were coming in; but many would be wanted this year, and more next, as the discharged men would be in greater numbers. He believed that the more they opened the recruiting of the Army, with every condition of long-service, short-service, or middle-service, the better. In fact, they ought, as it were, to have a sort of Free Trade in enlistment. Some men might prefer the long, some a medium, and some the short service; but to talk of going back to the long-service system, pure and simple, could not be done. It was absurd, because they could not get the men. Such an elsewhere in large towns by senior medical students, and also the cases investigated by the Procurator Fiscal and found to present no element of suspicion. I have no reason to suppose that the number of post mortem examinations in cases of uncertified deaths is decreasing; but questions have arisen in the accounts of Procurators Fiscal whether a post mortem examination was reasonably necessary in particular cases.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—SUSPECTED CASES OF INFANTICIDE IN SUTHERLANDSHIRE.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether two cases of suspected infanticide in March and April last were reported by the Police to the Procurator Fiscal of Sutherlandshire; whether it is true that in one case the dead body of a child was discovered in an ashpit, and in the other there was evidence that a child which had been born had disappeared; and, whether the Procurator Fiscal held any inquiry into the cases; and, if so, when the Crown authorities received his precognitions?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Sir, two cases of suspected infanticide were reported by the police to the Procurator Fiscal of Sutherlandshire—one in March, and the other in April or the beginning of May. In one case the body of the child has not been found, and in the other it was found near the house where the accused person lived. The precognitions in both cases were reported to the Crown Office on the 6th of this month. In the first case, the child was born on 14th March, and the first witness was examined on the 27th of March. The delay in the proceedings is accounted for by the Procurator Fiscal by the necessity of finding the reputed father, who had absconded, and whose evidence was essential. The delay in the second case has not yet been satisfactorily explained, but an explanation will be called for.

HARBOURS OF REFUGE (SCOTLAND)—HARBOUR ON THE NORTH-EAST COAST.

MR. BAXTER asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he can now state what arrangements have been made for sending down Commissioners to inquire as to the best site returned as uncertified is afterwards duly certified. There is no annual return of uncertified deaths; but I understand that the Registrar General some time ago decided that it was desirable to have one. In the second place, there is a considerable number of deaths with respect to which trustworthy information is obtained, though they are not certified by qualified practitioners; for example, the large number of poor patients who are attended to in dispensaries or for a harbour of refuge on the north-east coast of Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Sir, my right hon. Friend has asked me to say that arrangements are in progress, and are almost completed, for sending down Commissioners.

MR. BAXTER: Will the hon. and learned Gentleman tell me who the Commissioners are?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): I am not as yet in a position to give the names.

ENDOWED SCHOOLS—MIDDLE-CLASS SCHOOL AT TUNBRIDGE.

MR. J. G. TALBOT asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether a final decision has been arrived at with regard to the proposed Middle Class School to be established at Tunbridge or Tunbridge Wells; and, whether, if not, he will consent to receive a representation from the inhabitants of Tunbridge, who consider themselves aggrieved by the proposed establishment of the School at a distance from their own homes?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the scheme for establishing a middle-class school in or near the parish of Tunbridge, as approved by Parliament and the Queen in Council, requires that the site proposed by the Governors shall be submitted to and approved by the Charity Commissioners. The Governors did submit a site at Tunbridge which did not receive the approval of the Commissioners, and in signifying their disapproval the Commissioners indicated their opinion that the school should be at Tunbridge Wells. The Governors have now intimated their intention of proposing another site, which will be duly considered. As the question of approving the site is one which, according to Act of Parliament, is vested in the Charity Commissioners, it is not competent for me or any other authority to interfere in the matter.

QUESTIONS.

REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS AND DEATHS (GREAT BRITAIN)—UNCERTI-FIED DEATHS.

DR. CAMERON asked the Lord Advocate, Whether his attention has been called to an article in the "Lancet" of 23rd June, setting forth that, while the average proportion of uncertified deaths in the large towns of England is less than two and a-half per cent., in Scotland, according to the Returns of the Registrar General, the proportion in the eight principal towns in 1881 and 1882 was nearly twenty per cent.; and, whether it is true, as stated by the "Lancet," that the post mortem examinations in cases of uncertified death is decreasing, in consequence of the stringency of the Exchequer in disallowing fees, and—

"That, in many counties, Procurators Fiscal declare that pressure is put upon them for the purpose of diminishing expenditure in their direction?"

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B.
BALFOUR): Sir, I believe the discrepancy noticed in The Lancet between the numbers of uncertified deaths in England and Scotland is more apparent than real. In the first place, the Registrar General in Scotland makes up his return of uncertified deaths weekly, while the medical practitioner may certify the deaths at any time within 10 days, so that a considerable proportion of deaths obey the signals; and, if it is a fact that these men had been on duty for 15 hours, and, notwithstanding this great strain, they had been discharged by the Company?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, I have communicated with the London and North-Western Railway Company, and am informed that the engine driver and fireman had worked a special goods train from Chester to Carnarvon, and that, there being no load for them to take back, they were authorized to return to Chester with their engine alone; but, in order to obtain this authority, the men, in their anxiety to get home to Chester, wilfully made a mis-statement to the effect that they had commenced work at 12.45, instead of 8 o'clock, that morning. I am informed that for this falsehood they have both been dismissed. The signalman at Llandudno Junction exercised great presence of mind when the engine ran through that station in telegraphing to the signalman at Colwyn Bay, as the Colwyn Bay staff was thus enabled to take measures for protecting the line.

RUSSIA AND PERSIA.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true, as stated in a telegram from Teheran, dated 3rd July, that a Treaty has been concluded between Persia and Russia in regard to the north-eastern frontier of Persia, and that, according to the wording of that Treaty, Merv is to be considered Russian territory, and, in the event of England or any other Power protesting against the Treaty, Persia is to refer them to Russia; if so, whether Her Majesty's Government will lay any information it may have received on the subject upon the Table of the House?

MR. E. STANHOPE asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is true that a Treaty has been concluded, or that negotiations for a Treaty are in progress, between Russia and Persia relating to the frontier of Persia; whether Her Majesty's Government has addressed any remonstrance on the subject to the Government of Russia; and, if so, with what result; and, whether he will lay upon the Table any Correspondence that may have taken place upon the subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, in reply to these Questions, I may state that a Treaty was concluded in December, 1881, between Russia and Persia, with the purpose of "accurately defining the frontier of their possessions east of the Caspian Sea." That Treaty, which has been presented to Parliament (C. Asia, No. 1, 1882) defined the frontier up to the neighbourhood of Baba Durmez. Her Majesty's Government have not received any information of the conclusion of a further Treaty between Russia and Persia.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: The Question I have asked is, whether Merv is to be considered Russian territory?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: We have received no information as to that.

MR. E. STANHOPE: But will the noble Lord answer that part of my Question as to whether Her Majesty's Government has addressed any remonstrance on the subject?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: As Her Majesty's Government have received no information as regards the Treaty, Her Majesty's Government are clearly not in a position to make any remonstrances.

EGYPT—AHMED BEY MINSHANI.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government or the Egyptian Government have as yet recognised, or intend to recognise by any official marks of approbation, the gallantry and humanity displayed by Ahmed Bey Minshani, on the day of the massacres at Tintah, July 13th 1882; and by Hassan Fuad and Shekeeb Bey at Mahallet-el-Kebir, on the same day, in, at considerable personal risk, suppressing the riots, saving the lives of Europeans, and affording large numbers of Christians shelter and means of escape to Ismailia, as detailed in Major M'Donald's report to Lord Dufferin of April 30th, in the Egyptian Papers, C. 3632; and, whether care has been taken, and will be taken, not only to discover and punish those implicated in the massacres, but to reward in as public a manner as possible those Egyptians who during that time gave assistance and shelter to Europeans?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the question of rewarding the persons referred to, and others who acted in a like praiseworthy manner, is a matter for the consideration of the Egyptian

Mr. Theodore Fry

Government. Inquiry is being made as to how that Government has acted. The Papers presented to Parliament show that the Egyptian authorities have made every endeavour to discover the persons implicated in the massacres, and to bring them to trial.

ACTS OF PARLIAMENT—PRINTING AND DISTRIBUTION.

MR. LEWIS FRY asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether it is the fact that many Acts of Parliament, classed as "Local Acts," which are of great importance to the public in the localities they affect, such as Towns Improvement and Gas and Water Acts, are out of print; whether copies of these Acts can be obtained at all; and, if so, upon what terms; whether it is not right that the public should be able to obtain copies of all Acts of Parliament at a fixed and reasonable charge; and, whether he would consider the propriety of supplying local and public institutions, such as free libraries, with copies of all Acts (both public and local) without charge; and, also, of reducing the charge for the public general Acts of each Session with which it is very desirable that all Her Majesty's subjects should be acquainted?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, my hon. Friend is, perhaps, not aware that under present arrangements the Queen's printers, and not any Government Department, have in their hands the sale of Acts, both Public and Private. The Government have, therefore, no official knowledge whether any Local Acts are out of print. The Queen's printers are bound to sell to the public any Acts that may be required at a price not exceeding 3d. per folio sheet for Private Acts and 1½d. for Public Acts; but there is some doubt whether they are bound to reprint, unless the sale of not less than 25 copies is guaranteed. The present arrangement comes to an end in about two years, and will then be open to reconsideration; I should hope arrangements might be made for facilitating the sale; but I doubt whether the price of the Public Acts could be reduced below the present very moderate price of 1d. per sheet for the Acts of the current year. My hon. Friend further suggests that copies of the Acts should be presented to free libraries and others. Apart from the objections to gratuitous distribution, I doubt very much whether such local libraries, whose space is necessarily limited, would welcome the four or more annual bulky volumes of Private Acts, very few of which could possibly be of the slightest use to their readers.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE—CHANCERY DIVISION.

MR. W. H. SMITH asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been called to the arrear of business in the Chancery Division of the High Court; and, whether steps will be taken forthwith to remedy the great public injury resulting from the present state of the business of the Courts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, there was, no doubt, a very large amount of Business in arrear, and the attention of the Lord Chancellor had been called to it. There had already been 80 causes referred from the Chancery Division to what was now called the Queen's Bench Division. He could assure the right hon. Gentleman that every effort would be made to relieve the Court of Chancery as much as possible.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACTS—EXTRA PAY TO PRISON SURGEONS.

MR. GIBSON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Government have come to any final decision as to the claim of the surgeons of Irish Prisons for additional remuneration for the extra work cast upon them under the Peace Preservation Acts; whether the Irish Prison Surgeons were not promised by the Irish Executive at the time the duties were imposed that they would be suitably remunerated for this extra work; and, whether any offer has been made to the Irish Prison Surgeons on the subject?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Government have decided that they cannot entertain claims of this character merely on the ground of a temporary increase of work; but the cases of any prison officers who can show that they were put to any extra expense will be specially considered. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is, no doubt, aware that this was the principal ground upon which the claims of the police were entertained. I am not aware that any promise of extra pay was made to the prison surgeons, or that any special offer had been made to them on the subject.

MR. GIBSON: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Dr. Carte, on behalf of the prison surgeons, had an interview with the late Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster), in the presence of Mr. Burke, at which it was promised distinctly that favourable consideration would be given to their claims for extra services under the Peace Preservation Acts; and whether, if on inquiry he finds this to be so, he will have the facts considered?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am not aware of any such interview; but I will make inquiries about it.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE—LORD CHIEF JUSTICE, &c. (PATRONAGE).

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked Mr. Attorney General, What arrangements have been made with regard to the patronage formerly vested in the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas and the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; and, under what Statute they have been made?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, that in the Session of 1881 a Bill was introduced dealing with this subject; but there had been a great deal of opposition, in which he thought the right hon. Gentleman had assisted somewhat. A similar Bill had been introduced in 1882; but it was found impossible to proceed with it. No such Bill had been introduced this Session; but there was an intention to introduce an amended Judicature Bill, in which the question referred to might be dealt with. The amount of patronage was so minute that he could scarcely say it existed at all.

ITALY—THE NEW TREATY OF COMMERCE.

MR. ERRINGTON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether under the new Treaty of Commerce with the King of Italy any concessions have been obtained respecting the admission of English woollen goods into Italy on more favourable terms than hitherto; if not, whether Her Majesty's Government have reason to anticipate that a revision of the Italian Customs Tariff, in a sense favourable to freedom of commerce, is likely soon to take place; and, if he will state when the Treaty will be in the hands of honourable Members?

Mr. Trevelyan

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the new Treaty of Commerce with Italy provides for a "most-favoured-nation" treatment, and does not contain any special stipulations as to duties on particular goods. Her Majesty's Ambassador at Rome has been asked to report on the question of the proposed revision of the Italian Tariff. The Treaty is contained in the Parliamentary Paper (No. 23 Commercial, 1883), and was distributed last Friday.

ARMY—DOVER CLIFF.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether all due precautions have been taken to prevent injury and loss by the falling of the face of the cliff at Dover, and other injuries, consequent on the firing of the powerful guns in battery at the end of Dover Pier?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, the advisers of the War Office had been consulted on this matter, and they had recommended that certain precautions should be taken in the event of the guns being fired.

IRELAND—COUNTY CESS COLLECTION —CAPTAIN ALISEN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Is it a fact that Captain Alisen, an officer in the Antrim Artillery Militia, is also a collector of county cess for the barony of Upper Antrim; and, whether it is competent for a collector of county cess to live out of his district?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the Secretary of the Grand Jury informs me that Captain Alisen, of the Antrim Artillery Militia, is a county cess collector for the barony of Upper Antrim. It is competent for a collector of county cess to live out of his district, the statutory prohibition which once existed having been long since repealed.

INDIA—CHOLERA AT BOMBAY.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether the deaths from cholera at Bombay during the last fortnight of May numbered 25; whether it is true that, as the "Bombay Gazette" of the 5th June states—

"There is a good deal of cholera still in the districts, there being in the Thana and Poona collectorates alone nearly 500 deaths in one week;"

whether in the last week of May there were 118 deaths from cholera in Calcutta alone; whether these facts were made known by Her Majesty's Government to the Egyptian Board of Health; and, whether it was represented by Her Majesty's Government that the quarantine regulations might be safely removed or relaxed in the case of vessels from India arriving at Egyptian ports?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, the figures given by the hon. Member regarding cholera in certain places in India are generally correct; but I may say that cholera has been little, if at all, more prevalent in Indian ports during the last six months than it usually is. In Calcutta the deaths in April were 459, against 318 in April, 1882; in May they were 383, against 380 in 1882; and in June 150, against 254. The health statement of Indian ports is always telegraphed fortnightly for communication to the Sanitary Boards in the Levant; and the cholera deaths in Bombay are telegraphed weekly to the Consul General at Cairo. Her Majesty's Government have objected to the imposition of special measures of quarantine against arrivals from India with clean bills of health, and having no suspicious cases on board after a voyage of 10 days.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether it was true that at a meeting of the Alexandria Board of Health the English delegate protested against immediate action being taken in reference to vessels arriving from India; and whether it was true, as stated in the Egyptian official journal, that a passenger landed at Port Said on the 18th of June and proceeded to Damietta a few days before the outbreak of cholera in that town?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Perhaps the hon. Member will give Notice of that Question to the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

INDIA (MADRAS)—THE EX-TAHSILDAR OF CONJEVERAM.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that the ex-Tahsildar of Conjeveram, who was sentenced to imprisonment for theft and forgery by the Madras High Court, has been released on bail; and, if so, on what authority has the release been effected?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, the case of ex-Tahsildar of Conjeveram is not one which would be reported to the India Office; but it appears from the Indian newspapers that he had been released by order of the Government of Madras.

IRELAND—DISTRESS IN GWEEDORE.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following statement in a letter lately published in a London paper by Mr. Ernest Hart:—

"I have recently been in Gweedore. I took with me copies of official reports, declaring that there was no exceptional distress in that part of Ireland, and nothing but what the resources of the Poor Law could deal with. . . . I found 14,000 persons in dire destitution and tragic suffering, utterly unrelieved by the Poor Law, the whole of the children in one district living on two biscuits a day each, distributed at the schools, and no small proportion of adults kept alive by a daily pennyworth of meal, made into a stirabout and given by the priests, chiefly in return for small local relief works set on foot and organised by them;"

and, whether he is still prepared to maintain that the existing system of relief is equal to the task of dealing with distress in Gweedore and the neighbouring regions?

MR. TREVELYAN: I am not aware, Sir, that it has been stated in any official Report that there is no exceptional distress in the Gweedore district. What has been stated is that there is no exceptional distress which could not be relieved by the operation of the Poor Law. That has been, and still is, the opinion of the officers by whom the Government is advised, and who are fully alive to their responsibility in giving such advice. I may say, with reference to the case as stated in the Question, that the whole population of the Gweedore district is under 5,000; and I have no doubt, therefore, that some paragraph must have been omitted which would throw light on the figures given.

MR. O'BRIEN: As to the right hon. Gentleman's statement that the Poor Law could relieve the destitution in Gweedore, I would like to ask him, is it not a fact that the two principal members of the Dunfanaghy Board of Guardians, instead of doing anything to relieve the destitution, at the Lifford Quarter Sessions last week obtained ejectment decrees against a number of these poor people; and is it not a fact that Father M'Fadden had to pay a half-year's rent out of charitable funds in order to save them from eviction?

[No reply was given.]

MERCANTILE MARINE — PASSENGER ACTS—INFECTIOUS DISEASES IN EMIGRANT SHIPS.

MR. MOORE asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table Dr. Bloxall's Report on Infectious Diseases in Emigrant Ships?

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL: Sir, it is proposed to publish the Report of Dr. Bloxall in the Appendix to the Report of the Medical Officer of the Board; and it is intended that in this form the Report shall be presented to Parliament.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION COURT—MR. RYAN.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he will draw the attention of the Irish Land Commissioners to the fact that a person against whom an unrefuted charge of disloyalty to Her Majesty the Queen has been made still remains officially reporting in their Court; and, if he will represent to them the undesirability of employing the staff of a political journal, taking a strong view of the working and policy of the Act, in a position which necessarily gives special and exceptional facilities for obtaining information?

MR. O'BRIEN: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers, I would like to ask him whether the official reporters to the Privy Council and the Green Street Commission Court are not gentlemen connected with the permanent staffs of certain Conservative newspapers; and whether, as a matter of fact, there are any professional shorthand writers available for such a purpose in Dublin except gentlemen connected with the Dublin Press?

MR. CALLAN: And, before he answers, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether what is called the "unrefuted charge" is anything more than an imputation conveyed by the hon. Gentleman, having been borrowed from the end of a Question put by another Member of this House?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, in the absence of the mention of any name, I must infer that the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) intends this Question to refer to Mr. Ryan, about whom he has already made inquiry. If so, I can only say that I have already given to the House all the information which I have on the subject; and I do not think the question is of such a character as would justify me in making to the Land Commissioners any such representation as is here suggested. I think the House viewed the matter in that sense when it was previously before them.

MR. TOTTENHAM: Then, Sir, are we to understand that the charge which I have distinctly made in the Question cannot be refuted?

MR. TREVELYAN: Why, Sir, what was the charge? It was that the reporter of a Dublin paper remained seated when the Queen's health was being drunk. [Cries of "Shame!"] I may say I join in that cry of shame. I made careful inquiries from a source of the most undeniable nature with regard to the obtaining of information; and I was informed that Mr. Ryan had never, on any occasion, that my informant or his informants were aware, given any open manifestations of disloyalty. The only possible way I have of getting any further information is to ask Mr. Ryan himself, and I must decline to do that. It is very questionable whether the Irish Government in Ireland, or whether the English Government in this country, should make inquiries if ever there was a report that a person did not take off his hat during the singing of the National Anthem.

MR. TOTTENHAM: Then, Sir, are we to understand that the members of the staff of a political journal are the proper persons to be official reporters?

MR. TREVELYAN: All, or almost all, journals may be said to be political; and when persons are retained for the purpose of taking shorthand notes by members of a Judicial Body I do not think the Executive ought to make any inquiries.

MR. CALLAN: Might I ask the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Tottenham) whether what he calls an "unrefuted charge"—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member was not entitled to put a Question to the hon. Member which did not relate to a Public Bill or Motion.

ARMY(AUXILIARY FORCES)—CHANNEL ISLANDS MILITIA.

MR. COLERIDGE KENNARD asked the Secretary of State for War,

If he will state the limit of age at which Commanding Officers of the Channel Islands Militia must retire?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: There is no Regulation which limits the age at which Commanding Officers of the Channel Islands Militia must retire.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSVAAL—ALLEGED FORCED LABOUR.

MR. W. E. FORSTER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the Government have any information with regard to a statement in the "Cape Argus" of June 12th, that two hundred refugees from Mapoch's stronghold have been allotted to the farmers; and, if not, whether, taking into account the fact that the "Cape Argus" is a highly respectable journal with good means of obtaining information, and that "allotting" men to farmers is generally understood to mean subjecting them to forced labour, the Government will take immediate steps to inquire into the correctness of this statement, and, if necessary, to secure the fulfilment of the fifteenth Article of the Pretoria Convention of 1881, which declares that—

"The Provisions of the fourth Article of the Sand River Convention are hereby re-affirmed, and no slavery or apprenticeship partaking of slavery will be tolerated by the Government of the Transvaal?"

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, I hold in my hand a copy of The Cape Argus; but I cannot find any paragraph of the nature referred to by my right hon. Friend.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Has my hon. Friend referred to the weekly supplement? He has, perhaps, seen the wrong paper.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I may, however, say that in consequence of my right hon. Friend having called attention to this matter we have written an inquiry to the officer administering the Cape Government, and instructing him, if the report proves to be true, to direct that the attention of the Transvaal Government may, through the Resident, be called to the 15th Article of the Pretoria Convention.

SOUTH AFRICA—ZULULAND—THE NATIVE RESERVE.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is a fact that the Zulu Native Reserve was expressly set apart—

"For the location of those Zulu Chiefs and people who might be unwilling or unable to come again under the authority of Cetwayo;"

and, whether there is any reason to doubt the correctness of the statements contained in Despatch No. 8 of Blue Book, C. 3616, to the effect that Uhamu, Umfanawendhlela, and Tyingwayo had signified such unwillingness; in No. 12, in which Umlandela's refusal to live under Cetwayo is also reported; and in No. 71, which includes in the same category Siunguza, Umgitjwa, Zakukazingo, John Dunn, and Hlubi; and, if not, whether the Government are in a position to carry out the promise made to those nine deposed Chiefs that sufficient locations shall be assigned for themselves and their people in the Reserved Territory?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, I have referred to the Blue Book, and I see the mistake into which the hon. Member has fallen. The Chiefs named in the first portion of the paragraph have certainly expressed their dislike to the restored power of Cetwayo; but they have neither claimed nor apparently desired to come into the Reserve Territory. As to the names set out in the second part of the paragraph, the context in the Blue Book will show that they are given as names of persons already in the Reserve Territory, and cannot, therefore, represent the deposed Chiefs, except, of course, the two—namely, Dunn and Hlubi. I presume that as there is in any English country probably more than one Jones or Robinson, so there are more than one bearing these names in Zululand.

SPAIN—EXPULSION OF CERTAIN CUBAN REFUGEES FROM GIBRALTAR—COLONEL MACEO.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government intend to take any further steps to secure the prompt restoration to liberty of Colonel Maceo, who was illegally arrested and handed over to the Spanish Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: It is not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take any further steps at present in this matter.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE "REPUBLIC OF STELLALAND" — MURDER OF MR. J. W. HONEY, A BRITISH SUBJECT, BY DUTCH BOERS.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the murder of Mr. J. W. Honey, a British subject, by Boers, in the country taken from Montsioa, the Bechuana chief, and now known as Stellaland; whether it is true, as stated in the "Scotsman" of June 30th, that he was last seen in the company of three Boers, one of whom was an official; that "his remains were found in the bush perforated with bullets and battered with stones;" and that the magistrates at Christiana declined to make any inquiry into the matter; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will instruct the British Resident at Pretoria to investigate all the circumstances of the case?

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: Sir, my answer on Friday covered the whole of this Question. I gave all the information we are at present in possession of. I may add that it appears to me that information is more likely to be obtained at Kimberley than at Pretoria; and, as far as the intervention of the British Resident is concerned, this affair did not occur in Transvaal territory, and as it had nothing to do with Natives, it would not come under any of the provisions of the Convention.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Is it not a fact that Mr. Honey was taken before the Transvaal authorities in Transvaal territories, tried there, and acquitted of the charges made against him.

MR. EVELYN ASHLEY: I have already given the House all the information I have on the subject. I can add nothing more.

THE CIVIL SERVICE—THE PLAYFAIR SCHEME.

MR. PULESTON asked the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he will now facilitate the granting of a Committee to inquire into the working of the Playfair scheme?

MR. COURTNEY: Two months ago, Sir, I told the hon. Member that I thought it would be altogether premature to institute an inquiry into the working of the Playfair scheme, and he can scarcely expect that I should now think it expedient, after so short an interval, and when we are looking to the end of the Session. The scheme is even now not in full operation, and it would be far too soon to arouse expectations and excite agitation by an inquiry into it. All who are best competent to judge would, I think, deprecate frequent and hasty change in the organization of the Civil Service, and would rather recommend that the new system should be left at rest until its normal action can be ascertained.

MINES—USE OF DYNAMITE IN MINING —THE ORDER IN COUNCIL.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to a Memorial presented to him from lead miners and others in South Shropshire on the subject of the use of explosives, Whether he can see his way to make any concessions in the Regulations under the Explosives Acts for those engaged in industrial and mining operations, with a due regard to the public safety?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, could not say he thought it safe that dynamite should find its way into the hands of any persons who wished to have it, without any security that they were proper persons to possess it. In that respect he could not modify the Order in Council. With regard to the miners, no man who was known to be a respectable character could have the smallest difficulty in getting a certificate; or if he did not wish for one the mine-owner could keep in a registered store all the dynamite required, and serve out enough for the day's work, the rest being retained in store. That, after all, seemed the safest and best way of using dynamite in mines. He was bound to say that complaints of inconvenience had not come to him so much from persons who used dynamite as from those who manufactured it. They were promoting Petitions everywhere upon this subject, because they thought it placed them at some disadvantage as compared with the manufacturers of gunpowder.

LITERATURE, SCIENCE, AND ART—THE ASHBURNHAM MANUSCRIPTS.

MR. ERRINGTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he has as yet been able to come to some arrangement for the purchase of the Stowe Manuscripts in the Ashburnham Library; and, if so, whether he is in a position to give the House any information as to the disposition of the manuscripts so purchased, especially those relating to Ireland?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to say that Her Majesty's Government have arranged to purchase the portion of the Ashburnham Manuscripts which is known as the Stowe Collection, for £45,000, subject to the House of Commons passing the necessary Vote in Supply. An Estimate for this purchase, with Papers on the subject, is in course of preparation. The greater part of the manuscripts will go to the British Museum; but certain Irish Papers will be deposited in Dublin. The Estimate will state which manuscripts it is proposed to send to Dublin, and the institution will be named in the Papers.

MR. RAIKES: Is there no prospect of other portions of the Ashburnham Collection—besides the Stowe Manuscripts—being purchased?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS): The only portion which Her Majesty's Government have purchased, and I think are likely to purchase, is the Stowe Collection.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—APPLICATION FOR LOAN.

MR. O'BRIEN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Daniel Murphy, of Balinclay, county Wicklow, has applied to the Land Commission for a loan to buy Lot 63 on the property of Mr. W. R. O'Byrne, said lot being advertised in the particulars of sale as being in possession of the owner; and, if Daniel Murphy's application has been entertained, why a similar application from the evicted tenant of the holding, Joseph O'Brien, was refused by the Land Commission, on the ground that he was not in possession?

MR. TREVELYAN: The hon. Member for Mallow appears to have been misinformed on this subject. The Land Commissioners report that they have not received any application from Daniel Murphy for a loan to purchase the lot referred to.

THE AGRICULTURAL RETURNS.

MR. DUCKHAM asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, Whether the Summary of the Agricultural Returns cannot be published earlier than heretofore?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, that every effort would be made to secure the publication of these Returns at the earliest possible date consistent with accuracy and completeness; but he was afraid that he could not hold out any hopes of their being published materially earlier than in previous years—namely, about the middle of August, as all the Schedules from occupiers had not yet been received.

NAVY—THE MEDITERRANEAN SQUADRON.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If he could explain to the House the nature of the evolutions in which Admiral Lord John Hay is engaged in exercising the officers and men on board the Mediterranean Squadron now under his command; if any special instructions in the practical working of floating and submarine torpedoes, also in the use of machine guns; how many of these are on board each vessel, and are they of the same calibre as those now in use in the French Navy; if he will, as early as possible, place upon the Table of the House Copies of all Despatches which may from time to time be received from Admiral Lord John Hay relative to the tactics in which he is educating the officers and men under his command; and, if he will furnish similar Despatches when received from the Admiral commanding the Reserve Squadron?

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Sir, the cruise of the Mediterranean Squadron, which will occupy some months, is undertaken for the purpose of exercising the squadron in steam tactics, and in fleet evolutions of every description, both under steam and under sail. Exercise in the use of torpedoes and machine guns will form part of the instruction given in the course of the cruise. I cannot give the hon. Member any authoritative information regarding the torpedoes and machine guns in the French Navy; but I believe that the latter are of larger calibre than ours, but much less rapid in their fire. The periodical Reports received from Admiral Lord John Hay, and the Report which will be made by the Admiral commanding the Reserve Squadron, are confidential, and such documents are not usually made public.

RAILWAYS (INDIA) — THE NIZAM'S TERRITORY — HYDERABAD AND CHANDA RAILWAY.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Under Secretary of State for India, If it is the fact that a London Company were in treaty with the Nizam's Government to extend the Railway from Hyderabad to Chanda, on condition of a guarantee by the Nizam of six per cent. on the paid up capital; whether it is true that the existing Railway to Hyderabad, built on a similar guarantee of six per cent., does not pay more than two per cent., the rest having to be made up by the taxpayers of Hyderabad; whether the existing Railway was built for strategic objects, and not for the commercial development of the country; whether objection was raised by a section of the Native population against the proposed extension, on the ground that another guarantee of six per cent. to be paid in interest to London promoters and shareholders would unduly tax the resources of Hyderabad; whether persons interested in the success of the London Company applied for the authorisation of the British Resident at Hyderabad to forcibly remove into British territory the leaders of the agitation against the proposed guarantee scheme; whether the attention of Government has been directed to the following telegram in the "Times of India," dated the 23rd May:—

"The deportation of obstructionists to the Chanda Railway scheme continues. Last night Mr. Aysagi Hoshang, a Parsi and a third class Talukdar, was deported from Secunderabad, with the aid of the cantonment magistrate, Major Ludlow, and his police. Several other residents of Chudderghaut are likely to be deported;"

whether Dr. Agornath, Principal of the Hyderabad College, was arrested in the night time, with the sanction of the British Resident, and carried by force into British territory, and is now said to be imprisoned at Sholapore; whether it is true that the offence of Dr. Agornath consisted in calling a public meeting for the purpose of discussing the terms of the Chanda Railway Concession, and to protest against its acceptance; and, if inquiry will be made into the reasons for the intervention of British officials at Hyderabad on behalf of a Company of English Railway promoters?

MR. J. K. CROSS: Sir, in answer to a Question on the 11th of June, I informed the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. E. Stanhope) that for some time past the Nizam's Government has been in negotiation with capitalists in this country for the extension of the present State Railway to Chanda. The negotiations are still pending, and I can, therefore, only say that the guarantee proposed is a terminable one, and is less than 6 per cent. The proposals now under discussion were sanctioned by Sir Salar Jung before his death. The existing railway was not constructed for strategic purposes only, but for the commercial development of the country. At present it pays between 2 and 3 per cent; but the traffic is expected to be largely increased, if the proposed extension to the mineral districts of the State be made. The individuals referred to in the last part of the hon. Member's Question, who are not Natives of Hyderabad, but foreigners residing there, were deported by the Nizam's Government, with the concurrence of the Resident, for their part in a seditious agitation, dangerous to the public peace, and based on wilful misrepresentations of facts. These two foreigners are the only persons who have been deported. On their departure the agitation subsided. Dr. Agornath is not imprisoned at Sholapore. Neither the Government of India nor the Secretary of State have seen reason to interfere with the action of the Nizam's Government.

MR. O'DONNELL: Was not this Dr. Agornath appointed Principal of the Hyderabad College by the late Sir Salar Jung?

MR. J. K. CROSS: I could not answer that without Notice; but it would not affect the answer I have just given if it were so.

EGYPT—THE CHOLERA.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he can state what steps have been taken in Egypt for preventing the spread of cholera; and, whether Her Majesty's Government have given or offered to the Government of Egypt any, and, if so, what, assistance to further this object?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, I propose to give to the House a short summary of the information which has reached Her Majesty's Government from Sir Edward Malet and Consul Cookson regarding the measures taken for preventing the spread of cholera in Egypt. These measures are under the control of the Central Government in Cairo. Sir Edward Malet states that the Sanitary Board at Cairo is composed of Native and foreign doctors, among whom is Dr. Grant, the Medical Adviser of Her Majesty's Consular Court. They have, from the beginning of the outbreak, sat every evening, in conjunction with the Minister of the Interior and General Baker; and Sir Edward Malet adds that doctors, medicines, and food have been supplied to the infected places; and he expresses the opinion that the Government have done all in their power to stamp out the disease. At Alexandria, Consul Cookson states that a Commission has been working hard in inspecting nuisances and suggesting sanitary measures; and he trusts that good results will ensue from the appointment of sub-committees, to whom the Government have left, on Mr. Cookson's representation, great latitude of action. An independent British Committee has, moreover, been formed to visit the houses of British and Maltese residents at Alexandria. The infected houses have been isolated by cordons of police. With regard to the steps taken by Her Majesty's Government, I may state that a Departmental Committee has been appointed by my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board on cholera precautions generally; and a competent medical authority connected with the India Office is about to be despatched to Egypt under the direction of the Board. The Egyptian Government has been informed of the desire of Her Majesty's Government to afford them every assistance in the difficult task they have to perform.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: May I ask when this Committee was formed by the President of the Local Government Board?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I think Questions relating to this Committee had better be addressed to the President of the Local Government Board.

MR. ONSLOW: Will the noble Lord say whether this competent medical authority has had any experience of choleraic epidemic?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: At the proper time, either I or my right hon. Friend will be perfectly ready to state the name of this gentleman to the House, and I feel perfectly certain that it will meet with general approval.

MR. ONSLOW: Might I suggest, as we have a number of troops there, whether it would not be advisable to telegraph for medical officers from India, who have had practical and great experience in the treatment of cholera?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Questions as to the Army Medical Department would be more properly addressed to my noble Friend the Secretary of State for War; but I may state at once that every precaution is being taken, and I feel certain that my hon. Friend will see that both with regard to the English and Native troops Her Majesty's Government are most anxious to do everything to prevent disease.

MR. O'DONNELL: Will the noble Lord inquire into the alleged isolation of the infected districts? Will he see whether it is true, as stated in the German Press, that Damietta has lost by migration more than half of its population, which have escaped on all sides through the cordon and gone by boats over the lakes; that, although the Sanitary Commission are sitting, they have neither soldiers nor police nor any trustworthy representatives to maintain a cordon effectively; and that, to all intents and purposes, no means exist for limiting the spread of the disease at present existing?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: No, Sir; I cannot give accurate or detailed information on these various points; but, as far as I have read the papers, it would appear that a very different complaint has been made—namely, that the cholera cordon has been kept up with such strictness that very painful scenes have been the result. As I am touching upon this subject, I may, perhaps, touch upon its more pleasant side—namely, that during the last few days there has certainly been a diminution of deaths in the very district to which the hon. Member has alluded. In the Damietta district, on the 1st of July, there were 141 deaths; on the 2nd, 130; on the 3rd, 112; on the 4th, 111; on the 5th, 109; on the 6th, 107; on the 7th, 92; and on the 8th, 88. These figures show that, at all events, there has been a gradual diminution in the number of deaths in that district. At Mansurah there was also a diminution, though not so marked. On the 5th of July, the deaths there were 68; on the 6th, 39; on the 7th, 45; and on the 8th, 48; so that, on the whole, that shows a certain diminution as compared with the previous dates. There was a very slight increase in three other places; but in Menzaleh, where there were 11 cases on the 7th, the Return on the 8th gives no new cases at all.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether the diminution in the number of deaths in Damietta was not due to the fact that many thousands of persons had taken refuge in the surrounding villages; and whether inquiry would be made as to the number of unregistered deaths which were now occurring everywhere over a large space of country in small villages?

AFRICA (WEST COAST)—THE RIVER CONGO—NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN ENGLAND AND PORTUGAL.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, What is the present state of negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Portugal regarding the state of affairs on the River Congo; and, whether there is any probability of any Treaty being agreed upon?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, it is not in my power to make any statement on these matters at present.

MR. ONSLOW said, he would repeat the Question on that day week.

EGYPT—THE SUEZ CANAL.

MR. GOURLEY asked Mr. Attorney General, If his attention has been called to the opinion recently given by two English counsel relative to the concession of the Turkish and Egyptian Governments to M. de Lesseps for the construction of the Suez Canal; and, if he will be good enough to cause a copy of the concession to be printed and placed upon the Table of the House?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, the attention of Her Majesty's Government has already been directed to the opinion referred to by my hon. Friend. The concessions, &c., relating to the Suez Canal were laid before Parliament in 1876 (Egypt, No. 6).

WESTERN ISLANDS OF THE PACIFIC—THE NEW HEBRIDES—REPORTED ANNEXATION BY FRANCE.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is any truth in the report that the New Hebrides have been taken possession of by the French Government?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have no reason to suppose that there is any truth in the statement referred to.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES ACTS—STATISTICS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary of State for War, If he can state what were the numbers of diseased women in hospital in the protected districts previous to the abolition of compulsory examination; and, how many there are now in hospitals, specifying in both cases the respective numbers at each station?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, the number of diseased women in hospital at the time compulsory examination was suspended was 267. The number now in hospital is 134. If the hon. Member wishes for the information by stations, perhaps he will be good enough to move for it as a Return.

TREASURY SOLICITOR ACT, 1876—THE GOODS OF FELONS.

MR. ANDERSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If it be the fact that they have given, or are about to give instructions for the confiscation of the furniture of two widows at Port Glasgow, on the ground of forfeiture to the Crown, their husbands having been executed; and, if he is aware that these widows are in extremely destitute circumstances, having the one three and the other five children to support; and, if, under these circumstances, he will give instructions to the Edinburgh authorities not to proceed further in the matter?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, instructions have been sent by telegraph to suspend all proceedings for realizing the goods forfeited to the Crown on the conviction of the two Port Glasgow murderers until full inquiry shall have been made and a Report sent to the Treasury.

TURKEY—GREEK SUBJECTS OF THE PORTE.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Her Majesty's Government has been engaged in correspondence with the Government of the Sultan upon the alleged intention of the Porte to withdraw certain ecclesiastical privileges of the Greek subjects of the Porte; and, if so, whether he proposes to lay such Correspondence upon the Table of the House?

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Sir, this matter has been brought to the notice of Her Majesty's Government by Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople and Her Majesty's Minister at Athens, as well as by the Representatives of Turkey and Greece in this country. Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Constantinople has recommended the Porte not to act in such a manner as to promote irritation among the Greek subjects of the Sultan; but Her Majesty's Government do not consider that it is a question calling for their official intervention, at all events in its present stage, nor that any advantage would be gained by publishing the Correspondence.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS (ENGLAND) BILL — CLAUSE 8 — CHARGES ON HOLDINGS OBTAINED UNDER COUNTY COURT JUDGMENTS.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON asked the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, If he will inform the House whether he proposes that charges on holdings obtained by landlords from county courts under Clause 8 of the Agricultural Holdings (England) Bill shall rank after pre-existing mortgages and incumbrances on the property, or whether they will take priority of such mortgages and incumbrances as do charges obtained for improvements under 27 and 28 Vic. c. 114, s. 59?

MR. DODSON, in reply, said, that as the Bill stood these charges ranked in their natural order after pre-existing mortgages and incumbrances on the property.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE (CONTINUOUS SITTINGS) BILL.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked Mr. Attorney General, If the fact that the High Court of Justice (Continuous Sitings) Bill was allowed to pass its second reading on Thursday without opposition is to be taken as signifying that the Government intend to support the measure?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, that it must not be assumed, because, as a matter of courtesy to the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley), the second reading of the Bill was allowed to pass at a very late hour, that Her Majesty's Government intended supporting the measure. The Bill, as it now stood, could not be supported by the Government.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked whether the Attorney General considered it right that the Government should allow to pass the second reading a Bill of which the majority of the House disapproved?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES): That is an abstract Question into which I will not now enter.

PARLIAMENT—SPEECH OF MR. HERBERT GLADSTONE AT ACTON.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If his attention has been drawn to the report of a speech by one of the Junior Lords (the honourable Member for Leeds), at Acton, on 4th instant, when he is reported to have said that—

“He thought the Government would be prepared, as soon as they could find time, to take up the subject, and try and amend the Irish Land Act;”

and, whether the sentiments therein contained express the policy of the Government?

MR. BRODRICK asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the statement made by the Junior Lord of the Treasury in a speech delivered at Acton on Wednesday last—

“It must be remembered that the Land Act was not perfect, owing to concessions demanded by the Tories, and the Government were anxious to amend those defects; but they were aware of and deterred by the knowledge of the opposition which such measures would have provoked from the Tories, and the protracted discussions which would have come from the Irish Members. He thought the Government would be prepared, as soon as they could find time, to take up that subject and try and amend the Act ;”

whether the Junior Lord of the Treasury was authorised to announce an early re-opening of the Irish Land Question by the Government; and, whether Her Majesty's Government still adhere to the policy announced by the First Lord of the Treasury in March, that—

“ We think it an essential part of our duty to make it clearly understood that we can give no encouragement, either on the ground of crime or on any other ground, for entertaining hopes of the disturbance of the provisions of the Land Act contained in this Bill. . . . It would be a violation of our duty were we now to give encouragement to a demand for new sacrifices which we do not think in the main justice requires ? ”

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the hon. Member has judiciously in his Question mentioned “ the report ” of the speech ; but he has not committed himself to the opinion that the report is necessarily an accurate one. The only report I have seen of the speech was not so much a report as an account—an extremely succinct account—which it was impossible to accept as an accurate report. I have made inquiry of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone), and, as far as I can gather, the position taken up by him was precisely that which has been taken on several occasions by the Government, and it is to this effect:—I stated, as clearly as I could, and very minutely, in a speech at the early part of last year, and again, though less minutely, in a speech this year, that there were certain points in the Irish Land Act with respect to which the Government had always considered it was desirable for the House again to open. These were the date of the judicial rents, and certain particulars as to leases. The third point has been re-opened by the House itself on the urgent representations of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and I am not at all sure that it was wise for the House to commit itself by an abstract promise of that kind. But that has been done. It was in reference to points of this class that the hon. Member for Leeds expressed a hope that the Government would be prepared, as soon as they could find time, to take up the subject and try to amend the Act. The quotation which the hon. Member for Surrey [(Mr. Brodrick)] has made from the speech refers to alterations in the Act of a totally different character—alterations which we regard as being of a fundamental character; and with respect to these no engagements or opinion at all was expressed by the hon. Member for Leeds.

MR. BRODRICK: Might I ask the Prime Minister whether the Junior Lord of the Treasury was authorized to make any announcement on the subject?

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member for Leeds is not the Junior Lord of the Treasury any more than any other Lord ; but any Lord of the Treasury is perfectly in his right in announcing what the Government and the Prime Minister have already repeatedly announced.

INDIA (FINANCE, &c.)—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT.

MR. R. N. FOWLER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, When he will be in a position to fix a day for the consideration of the Indian Budget?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, all I can say upon this subject is, that we cannot venture to fix a day for the discussion of the Indian Budget until the House has disposed of the most important and urgent matters which it has before it—namely, the Committee stage of the Corrupt Practices Bill and the Committee stage of the Tenants' Compensation Bill.

EGYPT—SUEZ (SECOND) CANAL—PROVISIONAL AGREEMENT WITH M. DE LESSEPS.

MR. GOURLEY asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If it be true that (subject to the approval of the British Government) a satisfactory understanding has been arrived at between the English Directors of the Suez Canal and M. de Lesseps relative to the construction of a parallel Canal; and also for the reduction of the tonnage tariff; and, whether he can now inform the House of the nature of the alleged arrangement?

MR. CHARLES PALMER asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he is prepared to make a statement respecting the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and the Suez Canal Company; and, whether the time has arrived when he is prepared to receive representations and assistance from the commercial community, in accordance with his promise made on the 26th of June last?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have to say very little upon this subject; but in saying that little it must not be supposed that I am going to recede from the statement which I made on a previous occasion, in as far as it expressed our belief that there was a fair and reasonable expectation of making progress in our communications with M. de Lesseps. But we have not yet arrived at a point in those communications at which we can make an explicit statement to the House. We were most happy to receive to-day a letter from the hon. Member for Hull (Mr. Norwood), setting forth what he believes to be the views of the commercial community, and certainly the points so set forth are those to which in the main the Government has given its attention. Not from the hon. Member alone, but from others who are well informed on the subject, we shall be happy to receive communications, and now is the proper time for addressing communications to the Government.

MR. CHARLES PALMER asked the Prime Minister whether it was clearly to be understood that the commercial community in general would have an opportunity of expressing their views before any Treaty was concluded, and more especially that the House would have the Treaty submitted to it, and have the opportunity of expressing its views upon it before the Treaty was ratified?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am not sorry that my hon. Friend gives me a further opportunity of stating the intentions of the Government. No engagement will be entered into by the Government with regard to the Suez Canal except subject to the approbation of the House.

MR. BOURKE: I wish the right hon. Gentleman would answer this Question, which is of very great importance, whether any concession will be necessary in case a parallel Canal is proposed and adopted by Her Majesty's Government, or in case any other Canal is proposed to be adopted? The right hon. Gentleman has already answered the Question about a Treaty which the hon. Member has put; perhaps he will tell us with whom that Treaty is to be made? At any rate, the right hon. Gentleman will, perhaps, answer the Question with respect to the future concession. If not, I will put it down for another day.

MR. GLADSTONE: The word "Treaty" was used by my hon. Friend, but was not used by me. I think I said "arrangement." I have, however, great hopes that upon a very early day either I or one of my Colleagues will be in a condition to make an explicit statement to the House. I hope, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman will allow the question to stand over.

POST OFFICE—THE CHOLERA IN EGYPT—MAILS FROM THE EAST.

MR. W. H. SMITH: Can the Postmaster General inform the House what steps have been taken to provide for the transmission of the overland mails from the East which were not allowed to be landed at Brindisi, and what future arrangements will be made with regard to mails coming homeward through the Suez Canal?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, we received information from the manager of the Peninsular and Oriental Company on Saturday that a mob of people had refused to allow the mails to be landed at Brindisi, and the course we adopted was this—a telegram was at once sent ordering the vessel to proceed to Trieste and land the mails there. When I went to the Post Office a short time since we had not been able to ascertain what length of quarantine the Austrian Government would require at Trieste, and consequently it is impossible to say positively when the mails will arrive in London. With regard to the next steamer, which will bring a much heavier mail, the opinion at the present moment is that it would be better, under the circumstances, to order the vessel to proceed direct by sea to England, and instructions will be given to that effect.

Subsequently,

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE wished to ask, as the right hon. Gentleman said that the next mail would be a heavy one, and instructions had been given for it to be sent by sea to England, whether the Government thought it necessary to establish a quarantine at Plymouth or other ports, or what precautions were to be taken to prevent the importation of cholera?

MR. FAWCETT said, that he had communicated with the Privy Council on Friday last. Every care had been taken to disinfect the bags by soaking them in tar. The Sanitary Committee of the Privy Council thought that was a sufficient precaution, and the matter rested with them.

VISCOUNT FOLKESTONE said, that such a process would not disinfect the passengers and crew on board the vessels.

MR. FAWCETT said, he thought the noble Lord would see that that Question was not one for the Post Office. The Question ought rather to be addressed to the Local Government Board or other authority whom it concerned.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—SIXPENNY TELEGRAMS.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE asked the Postmaster General, in reference to the Scheme suggested by him for the reduction of the minimum charge for Post Office telegrams to 6*d.* and described as Scheme 1 in the Treasury Minute of the 14th June 1883, proposing that—

“Free addresses should be abolished, and a ½*d.* charged for each word, including the address; minimum charge 6*d.* ;”

whether he is aware that, if that scheme should be adopted, it would effectually prevent there being any 6*d.* telegrams whatever, and increase the charge for telegrams of twenty words from twenty-five to fifty per cent.; and, whether he is aware that Scheme 2, viz. :—

“Address of receiver to be free, but that of the sender to be charged for; 6*d.* to be charged for the first five words, and 2*d.* additional for each subsequent five words,” would also preclude the possibility of 6*d.* telegrams being used, and would increase the charge for telegrams of twenty words thirty per cent.?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, it will no doubt be the case, as stated by my hon. Friend, that if either Scheme 1 or Scheme 2 mentioned in the Treasury Minute were adopted, the charge for messages containing 20 words in the body of the telegram might be greater than it now is. I cannot, however, agree with him that, under this scheme, no telegrams would be sent at the minimum charge of 6*d.*; on the contrary, I think the number of such telegrams would be very large. It was stated on Thursday last that no decision as to the particular scheme to be adopted would be come to by the Government until next Session. I may add, however, that if a charge were made for the whole or any part of the address, or if the charge for 20 words in the body of the telegram were greater than it now is, it would be necessary, as free addresses are allowed and the present tariff is fixed by Act of Parliament, to introduce a Bill to give effect to the new arrangement. The House would, therefore, have an opportunity of discussing the question.

POST OFFICE—THE NEW PARCEL POST.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Postmaster General, Whether, in the new parcel post service, extra servants are to be employed in the carriage to rural districts; whether the present staff of messengers are not in many places quite able and willing to discharge the extra duty in consideration of the additional pay, their salaries being very small at present; and, whether, if the present messengers are employed, they are to be provided by the Government with the means of carriage, or are to provide it themselves?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I may say that extra servants will be employed when necessary in the conveyance of parcels in the rural districts. In many places the messengers will be able to discharge the extra duty without assistance, and in all cases, where the circumstances warrant it, extra pay will be given. Where the present foot service is replaced by a mounted service, either an allowance to meet the expense will be made to the present messengers, or they will be transferred to another walk, and a mail cart service provided at the expense of the Government.

LAW AND JUSTICE (SCOTLAND)—THE RECENT DISASTER ON THE CLYDE.

DR. CAMERON asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, in view of the exceptional magnitude of the recent disaster on the Clyde, and the fact that inquiries by procurators fiscal into accidents attended with loss of life in Scotland are conducted in secret, and that their Reports to the Crown Office are never made public, he will instruct some competent independent official to assist at the inquiry and furnish a report on the occurrence for presentation to Parliament?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR): Sir, I am asked by my right hon. and learned Friend to say that at his request Sir Edward Reed, late Chief Constructor of the Navy, a Member of his House, has proceeded to Scotland, and is now holding a public inquiry into the disaster on the Clyde.

ARMY—THE STAFFORDSHIRE REGIMENT.

MR. O'KELLY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the series of assaults and robberies committed by soldiers of the Staffordshire Regiment at Athlone; and, whether he will take steps to protect the public from the recurrence of these outrages?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I am informed that the only disturbance which has recently occurred at Athlone was on the 24th of June, when there was a drunken quarrel. It was alleged that a civilian had been assaulted by soldiers of the North Staffordshire Regiment; but when the commanding officer investigated the case, the civilian was not forthcoming, and the soldiers could not be identified. On the 4th of July a soldier was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment for stealing a watch while drunk. With these exceptions the troops at Athlone are said to have been particularly well-conducted.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—THE RAILWAY PASSENGER DUTY.

In reply to Mr. FRANCIS BUXTON,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. CHILDERS) said, with reference to the Railway Passenger Duty Bill that it would be committed pro forma in order that it might be reprinted, and be in the hands of Members some days before the question was discussed. He would take care that due Notice should be given.

PARLIAMENTARY OATH (MR. BRADLAUGH).

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to put a Question to the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister with reference to a letter which appears in several newspapers this morning purporting to be addressed by Mr. Bradlaugh to the right hon. Gentleman, in which Mr. Bradlaugh informs him that it is his intention at an early day "to take my seat for the borough of Northampton," and goes on to say—

"In doing this I shall disregard the Orders of the House made this Session as being in the teeth of the law, and therefore null and void."

I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has received such a letter, and, if he has, what course he proposes to take in the matter?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I received on Friday a letter from Mr. Bradlaugh, which I see has been printed in the papers. It runs as follows:—

"Sir,—In accordance with the requirements of my constituents, I beg respectfully to inform you that I shall, in compliance with the law, at an early date take my seat for the borough of Northampton. In doing this I shall claim to disregard the Order of the House made this Session, as being, to use the words of George Grenville, in the teeth of the law, and therefore null and void. I am confirmed in this view by the judgment of Mr. Justice Field in the suit brought by myself against Mr. Erskine, when, in answer to my hypothesis that the House of Commons had passed a Resolution forbidding me to take the oath, his Lordship said that he could not assume that the House would do an act which in itself would be flagrantly wrong. As the Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1866, and the Standing Orders of the House make no other provision than that the oath shall be taken and subscribed in manner therein prescribed, I beg to inform you that I shall so take and subscribe the oath in the manner binding upon my conscience. When I so took and subscribed the oath on the 21st of February, 1882, I sought to obtain the opinion of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice on the legality of the oath so taken by me, but the Court refused to allow a friendly action to be argued or tried. If any legal decision could be obtained, or if the House would discharge me from the services it by force prevents me performing, so that a new writ would be issued, I should be relieved from the painful necessity of finding myself once more in collision with the House; but I cannot and must not passively permit my constituents to be robbed of the voice and vote to which they have a constitutional right.—I have the honour to be, &c., C. BRADLAUGH."

I am glad, Sir, the Question of the right hon. Gentleman has given me the opportunity of placing the House in possession of this information. Her Majesty's Government have, in more than one form, suggested to the House the different modes in which they have thought that an escape would be found from the many difficulties attending the subject; but our recommendations have not received, in any case, the approval of the House, and therefore, of course, it will rest with those who have advised the House, and whose advice has been accepted by the House, to act upon the information I have given. I am glad of this opportunity of placing the matter before the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, the concluding observations of the right hon Gentleman render it necessary for me to call the attention of the House very shortly to the position in which we stand. Of course, I do not ask the House to reopen the question as to the propriety of Mr. Bradlaugh being allowed to go through the form of taking the Oath. That is a point on which the House has decided, and recently decided, by a very considerable majority. But I shall call attention to the fact that from this letter we are led to infer that it is Mr. Bradlaugh's intention, at such time as he may select, to come before the House and endeavour to override that decision to which the House came some weeks ago by some action on his part. In fact, we may pretty clearly understand from the language of the letter that Mr. Bradlaugh's intention is to come before the House as he did two years ago and administer the Oath to himself as he did on that occasion. I need not remind the House that his proceedings on that occasion met with the censure of the House; and, unquestionably, if the House has already determined that it will not allow Mr. Bradlaugh to go through the form of taking the Oath, it cannot sit by and allow such a taking of the Oath as that to which I have alluded. That being so, I apprehend from the notice we have received that we may expect our proceedings will be interrupted at some uncertain period, and therefore we are called upon to act in order to prevent a scandal in the proceedings of this House. I do not think that is a position in which the House ought to be placed. I have by circumstances been obliged to take a part on several occasions which I would much rather had been taken by the Leader of the House for the protection of Order and, as I think, the dignity of the House, and I regret to find myself again obliged to take a similar course on the present occasion. I have always endeavoured, when I have had to propose anything with regard to Mr. Bradlaugh, to confine myself to what seemed to me to be absolutely necessary. When on the last occasion of his presenting himself and tendering himself to take the Oath, the House decided that he should not be permitted to do so, I thought it unnecessary to make any further Motion, because I assumed that Mr. Bradlaugh, whatever his opinions might be, would bow to the decision of the House, and not put us to any further inconvenience as long as that Order was in force. It appears that that is not his intention, and therefore it is necessary to take some steps for the protection of the Order of the House. It is quite impossible that we can expect the great bulk of Members of the House to be here at all times and at all hours when Mr. Bradlaugh might present himself, and, therefore, I can see no course open but to make a Motion similar to that made by me two years ago which prevented Mr. Bradlaugh's intrusion on the proceedings, until he gives an assurance that he will not disturb them. Therefore, I make this Motion entirely in what I may call a spirit of self-defence, and for the preservation of that Order which I think is threatened to be disturbed, in the same terms as my former one. It is—"That the Serjeant-at-Arms do exclude Mr. Bradlaugh from the House until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House."

The words are the same as in the former Resolution. It will be recollected that some question arose about the phrase "precincts of the House;" but when the former Resolution was proposed in the same terms as this the House maintained that Mr. Speaker and the Officers were justified in putting on that Resolution the interpretation which it was intended to bear, and excluding Mr. Bradlaugh from the precincts. On the former occasion the words were proposed when Mr. Bradlaugh was present; but I shall now move this Resolution as he is not present. If you, Sir, think it more proper that I should mention "precincts," of course I will make the Motion in that form; but I understand from the decision come to on the former occasion that it is unnecessary.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Serjeant-at-Arms do exclude Mr. Bradlaugh from the House until he shall engage not further to disturb the proceedings of the House."—(Sir Stafford Northcote.)

Mr. Gladstone

MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish to ask, Sir, whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in making this Motion without Notice?

MR. SPEAKER: I understand that the right hon. Gentleman makes the Motion on the ground that it is a question of Privilege. The hon. Member for Northampton declares his intention to disregard the Orders of the House, and it therefore becomes a question of urgency on the part of the House to decide what is to be done. That being so, the right hon. Gentleman is quite justified in the course he has taken.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Are you, Sir, satisfied that the word "precincts" is unnecessary?

MR. SPEAKER: On a former occasion when a similar Motion was passed by the House Mr. Bradlaugh attempted to force himself within the doors of the House. Having regard to the Resolution passed by the House, I directed the Serjeant-at-Arms to exclude Mr. Bradlaugh by force, and the House approved of that course. Therefore, I presume the House will support me in taking, if necessary, the same course again.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am one of those, Sir, who, rightly or wrongly, believe that a Member elected by a constituency derives his right from the constituency to go through all the Forms at the Table necessary for him to take his seat in the House. I merely state that to let the House know that I shall be obliged to challenge a decision of the House on the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman. I am not going into this matter at any length; there are only two points on which I would call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. The first is, that I understand that the Whips of the Party of which the right hon. Gentleman is the Head have issued a Notice to their followers to come to the House this evening; and I would put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it is quite in accordance with fair play to bring forward this Resolution without any Notice, having brought together all those who are in favour of it to vote for it, while those who might be opposed to it were not aware that it would be brought forward? The other point is, that Mr. Bradlaugh has asked the House to void the election. He finds himself in an exceedingly difficult position. He has no wish to put himself in antagonism with the House, but he desires that his constituents should be fully represented here; and if the right hon. Gentleman would only move for a new Writ for the borough of Northampton, or support me were I to move for it, I should not complain of the course taken by the House. But I think it is somewhat hard to say that Mr. Bradlaugh is not to take his seat, having been duly elected, and that owing to this action the constituency is to be punished by not being represented by the number of Members the Constitution gives to it. I shall not detain the House, but I feel it my duty to divide on the Question.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I think it is but natural on the part of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, on an occasion of this kind, to propose to the House the measure which he thinks necessary to give effect to the decision of the majority. It would not be my province, or that of the minority, to make any such proposal. But I own I do feel it within my province to make an appeal to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), and to express an hope that he will not divide the House, because it is part of my duty, on the one hand, to ask the House to make great sacrifices of its time, and on the other, to endeavour to avoid, as far as possible, unnecessary sacrifices. It appears to me that we who are the minority have had ample opportunity of arguing the case in every form in which it has been brought forward. The majority of the House have courteously consented more than once to hear Mr. Bradlaugh at the Bar. We cannot say that we have not been fully and fairly heard. I deeply regret the decision of the majority, and all that I felt on former occasions I still feel; but I think that respect to the majority, and regard to the time of the House, and to the extreme urgency of the position in which we stand with reference to Public Business, ought to prevent us from interposing any obstacle to a Motion if that Motion be reasonable in itself. The question is, is it reasonable? Certainly not, from my point of view. But the unreasonableness of it lies in the unreasonableness of the original decision of the House. From the point of view of the right hon. Gentleman it is a strictly reasonable Motion. It is strictly consequent on the Resolution of the House. He declares it to be a Motion of self-defence, and undoubtedly, being a Motion to defend the House against the consequences of the course formerly taken by the House, it is quite natural that the House should adopt this course. Under those circumstances the matter is a very simple one, and it is unnecessary to go over the ground we have gone over before. This Motion is a necessary corollary of the steps taken by the House on a former occasion; and although I am not an approving party to any portion of the procedure, I would deprecate exceedingly the offering of any further opposition to the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman. I will not encroach any further upon that valuable commodity of the House—time, and I will appeal to the hon. Member to adopt a similar course in respect to this Motion.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I am not going to detain the House. I only wish to say that several hon. Members below the Gangway here are as anxious to avoid any waste of time as the right hon. Gentleman; but this is a matter on which we must divide, because we feel that upon every opportunity when steps are taken which we consider to be illegal or unconstitutional we are bound to resist them to the best of our power. On these grounds some of us will feel bound to divide the House.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 232; Noes 65: Majority 167.—(Div. List, No. 183.)

MR. NEWDEGATE: I wish to make a suggestion to the right hon. Baronet the Leader of the Opposition. [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that there is no Question before the House, and if the hon. Member wishes to put a Question to the right hon. Baronet, it should be confined to any Bill or Motion before the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I am very anxious to confine myself to the Question, and am most unwilling to intrude unnecessarily upon the House with reference to a subject which is still before it. ["No, no!" and cries of "Order!"] The House has just taken a very necessary precaution, and I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon—[Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: I must repeat to the hon. Member that he is out of Order. When the House was engaged with Questions the right hon. Gentleman interposed with a Question which has been disposed of. The House is still engaged with Questions put to Ministers of the Crown, and if any hon. Member has a Question to put to any Minister he will be in Order; but the hon. Member is not in Order in the course he now takes.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I apologize, Sir. I did not intend to go beyond your ruling. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon who has moved the Resolution now adopted, which has been found necessary to correct and enforce a former decision of the House, whether he will move that this Resolution be made a Standing Order of the House?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish, Sir, in the first instance, to put the question to you as to whether it is competent for me to make that Motion?

MR. SPEAKER: The question is one of great importance. It is not for me to restrain the power of this House; but as this question affects the political rights of a Member of this House, it would not, I think, be competent for the right hon. Gentleman to move that the Resolution be made a Standing Order.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MINISTERIAL STATEMENT.

RIVERS CONSERVANCY AND FLOODS PREVENTION BILL.

BILL WITHDRAWN.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise, Sir, for the purpose of fulfilling an engagement I entered into with the House on the part of the Government, to the effect that we should this day make as comprehensive a statement as time and circumstances would justify with regard to the state and prospects of Business, and I will preface it by saying that I shall not mention the Bills of comparatively minor importance; but the number of those I shall mention is considerable, and the House will feel that we have redeemed the pledge we have given with regard to the work of the Session. I shall close my remarks by moving that certain Orders for the consideration of the further stages of Bills be discharged

Mr. Gladstone

—the most convenient course to take, I think, if the Government have made up their minds that they must abandon them, so that they shall be at once removed from the Order Book, and the minds of Members relieved from all further care in respect of them. I am afraid the prospect I have to present is not at all a cheerful one with regard to the duration of the Session; because, even if the House consent to make considerable sacrifices the Session cannot, under the most favourable circumstances, reach any but a late termination. In the first place, I may say there are certain Bills with respect to which the House perfectly understands it is the intention of the Government to submit them to the judgment of the House definitively, and therefore I need not dwell upon any of them. These are the Bills which have been through the Grand Committees, and the three Bills that are before the House—the Corrupt Practices Bill, the Tenants' Compensation Bill for England, and the Tenants' Compensation Bill for Scotland. The other Bills which we propose to proceed with are as follows. We think it of great importance to take the sense of the House on the National Debt Bill. We believe that any differences of opinion on the Bill are not differences of detail, requiring time to dispose of, but that may be dealt with in a single and probably not very long discussion. Then there is a Bill which is of great importance to a profession which is itself of the utmost weight and importance—namely, the Medical Bill; and I am encouraged to hope with regard to that Bill the difference of opinion upon which is small, and we propose to proceed with it. With regard to Scotland, we propose to proceed with the Local Government Bill for Scotland, in the belief that it is generally acceptable to those whom it more immediately concerns, and, that being so, we do not anticipate any very great difficulty in its conduct through the House. I then come to Irish Bills. There is the Registration of Voters Bill; the Bill for pauper relief—which I have mentioned because, although it has not actually passed the House, it has gone through all its stages except the third reading, therefore may be considered as having all but passed; the Bill for the re-organization of the Police Service; and there is also a Bill which Her Majesty's Government are anxious to introduce, which they think may probably be received with favour by the House—I mean a Bill for the promotion of tramways in Ireland. That is an announcement which contains the answer which I promised some time ago to give to my hon. Friend the Member for County Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry). Those are the Bills with respect to which we propose to proceed. With regard to the melancholy list of Bills that we will find it necessary, or at least that we think it our duty to the House at once to drop, the first of those is the Rivers Conservancy and Floods Prevention Bill, and, second, the Ballot Act Continuance and Amendment Bill, with regard to which, of course, we shall place the general law as it now subsists in the Continuance Bill; but we shall get rid of the question of the amendment of the law. The third is the Bill relating to Charitable Trusts, and the fourth the Bill relating to Scottish Universities. That is a Bill of very considerable importance, and its provisions are both weighty and beneficial; but it certainly touches some matters that are of a rather high nature, and which we should not think it justifiable to press on the House at a period of the Session when we could not have a reasonable chance of carrying it forward. Then there is a Bill which comes from the House of Lords, called the Representative Peers (Scotland) Bill, which I believe excited a good deal of difference of opinion, and we do not propose to proceed with it. There are two or three other Bills which we feel it necessary to drop, but, at the same time, which we drop with very great regret. One of them is the Bill for police superannuation, the second is the Bill relating to naval discipline, and the third is the Bill relating to Irish Sunday Closing, with respect to which, of course, we should place the present law in a general Continuance Act. With regard to these Bills, which are on different grounds, I must express a very earnest hope, on the part of the Government, or those who may be the Government, that it may be possible to bring them in at an early period next Session. Naval discipline ought not to continue in suspense, and the Irish Sunday Closing Bill is one which largely interests public opinion in Ireland, and it is very highly disagreeable to us to drop

it. The Police Superannuation Bill is a Bill of very great local importance for the healthiness and efficiency of the force on which we are dependent for the maintenance of civil order; but there are questions which it raises in relation to the charges imposed under it, with which it will not be in our power to grapple in the present Session. Those are the eight Bills we propose at once to drop, and I shall move for the discharge of the Orders for the further stages upon these Bills. There are three other measures, one of them not yet introduced, and two others that have been introduced, but have not made progress, with regard to which we wish to suspend our judgment for a time, and to form that judgment according to circumstances as they may present themselves perhaps 10 days or a fortnight hence. There is, first, the Welsh Intermediate Education Bill, dealing with a subject of great interest with regard to the education of that country, and the others are the Detention in Hospitals Bill, and the Criminal Law Amendment Bill. In regard to these measures, we ask the House to allow us a little time before arriving at a final decision. I think that the list I have given will be found to include all of what would be commonly considered the important Bills of the Government. Such a Bill as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has referred to to-night in regard to railway passengers will, as a matter of course, form part of the Budget, and Bills of that class I do not refer to in detail; but I have spoken of nearly a score of Bills, and these will, I think, dispose in the main of the subjects upon which, as far as the Government are concerned, the length of the Session may depend. But besides these Bills there are one or two points which I should wish to mention. It is necessary now to refer to the subject of the Grand Committees. I need not refer to the particular nature of the pledge we gave; but it was to this effect—that if we asked the House during the present Session to arrive at any new Resolutions with respect to these Committees, it should be done in the course of the present month, when the House will be in full attendance and competent to deal with such matters of importance and comparative novelty. Now, we stand thus. I will not undertake to anticipate at this moment what will take place with regard to the several Bills that have been before the Grand Committees; but it is our opinion, looking at the labours of these Committees, that they have proved to be in the present Session, and promise to be hereafter, a great success, and afford very material assistance to the House in the great work of maintaining, or perhaps I ought to say, with due respect, restoring its legislative efficiency, in enabling it to overtake the large and constantly increasing mass of work, which the necessities of the Empire require it to confront. There are two courses which might be taken with regard to the Grand Committees—one, to propose an experimental renewal of them for the next Session only; and another, to submit to the House some plan of a general and more comprehensive character. I do not wish at present to enter upon the question which of these two courses is the better; and it is quite plain that we could not submit at this time a plan of a permanent nature with regard to Grand Committees, without setting aside the Legislative Business which we have in hand. That, I think, we should not be justified for a moment in contemplating, and, consequently, we do not intend to make any extended proposal at the present time. If such a proposal is to be made at any time, it must stand over for the present year. Then the question arises whether it would be wise to advise the renewal of those Committees which we have had already. Now, Sir, undoubtedly, with the opinion we entertain about the working of the Grand Committees, it will be our duty to make proposals with that object. But proposals for a temporary and experimental renewal of the Grand Committees, if such should be the form in which we should ultimately think it wise to proceed, clearly ought not to be made until we come nearer to the time when we can know what Business the House will have to do. The circumstances of last autumn were very peculiar. It so happened that a large number of important and practical questions had to be thrown over for want of time, and we were able to see in the autumn what Grand Committees we should specially want and might make use of for the purpose of trying our experiment. As far as we can anticipate the legislation of next year, we do contemplate the introduction of certain Bills; and in a country like this the renewal of the Grand Committee with respect to trade and such matters could hardly ever be out of place; but then, again, we may not be able to say, with respect to other matters, what measures it might be the duty of the Government to introduce next Session which might be found of such a nature as to fit them for the consideration of Grand Committees. In fact, the experimental question with respect to next Session ought not to be considered piecemeal, but as a whole. It would be more satisfactory to the House, and far better, that the subject should be reserved until we can see, if not upon a larger scale, yet, at all events, for the coming Session, what is the exact amount of the proposals we should wish to make with a view to the greater despatch of the Public Business. I hope, therefore, that it will be understood, as far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned, that they have been confirmed in their favourable views of the working of these Grand or Standing Committees as a means of expediting a large portion of the Business of the House by the experience which the present Session has afforded them, and they would consider it a breach of duty on their part were they to allow these Committees to drop. But they do not think that circumstances permit them at present to act either upon a large or upon a more contracted scale, either with a view to a permanent or great scheme, or with a view to another experimental trial; and whatever course they may think proper to adopt, they think that the proper time to propose it will be when Parliament has again been summoned together after the Recess. Then comes the question as to what ought to be the course of procedure. There are many Members, undoubtedly, who have expressed their readiness that we should ask for what is called the whole time of the House. As far as Tuesdays and Wednesday are concerned, that is a proposal which we intend to make for the residue of the present Session. Mondays and Thursdays are always in possession of the Government. Fridays are already in their possession as far as Morning Sitings are concerned, and we do not propose to ask the House for the Evening Sitings on Fridays, for several considerations. One is, that it is not usual for the Government to make that request to the House. We are asking the House for Tuesdays and Wednesdays somewhat earlier than usual; but it is not usual to ask for Friday evenings. We are very unwilling entirely to close the door, as far as the Rules of the House are concerned, against the introduction, at the option of independent Members, of subjects which they might deem of great practical and urgent importance. What we do earnestly hope is that, viewing the position in which the House is placed, independent Members will be disposed to waive for the remainder of the present Session—I make this appeal merely to their judgment and discretion—their right of pressing on the consideration of the House the discussion of subjects with regard to which they do not contemplate any immediate practical result. I do not mean subjects which contemplate legislation, because there may be subjects connected with the policy of the Government, for instance, which hon. Members may think it right to question, and they may find opportunities for doing so on these Friday evenings. On the other hand, if they do not take advantage of these Friday evenings, I hope the House will be inclined to allow those evenings to be turned to account by going into Committee of Supply. For the present, the only Motion I shall make will be a Motion for the discharge of certain Orders. With regard to obtaining a larger proportion of the time of the House, the form of proceeding which I propose is this. To-morrow it is quite understood that matters will stand as they are. But on Wednesday morning at 12 o'clock, if I find the proposal I now make is agreeable and suitable to the House in the circumstances, I shall propose that Government Orders on Tuesdays and Wednesdays have precedence during the remainder of the Session, and in that case I believe it would be agreeable to the House if on Tuesdays the House were to meet at its usual hour, in lieu of meeting for a Morning Sitting, and then again for an Evening Sitting. With regard to the course of Business to be taken first, I would say one word on the state of the Civil Service Estimates. We are able to go on a little longer with Civil Service Estimates generally; but there are a very few Votes of a non-contentious character, with respect to which it so happens that more money is required, and on Thursday as the First Order of the Day—I believe it will constitute no material interruption to the present course of Business—we must ask for some money for these particular Votes. Further substantial progress with the Civil Service Estimates must be reserved for a future day. On Monday next we propose to take the Navy Estimates, and on Tuesday we propose to devote the first part of the evening to a Bill which I trust will then be in Committee—namely, the Tenants' Compensation Bill. On that point, however, it is not for me to say how much longer time the House may think it proper to take in discussing the remaining clauses of the Corrupt Practices Bill; but I am unwilling to contemplate the possibility that that Bill will not be out of Committee several days short of Tuesday week. Assuming that the Tenants' Compensation Bill will have got into Committee on Tuesday evening, we shall propose to break off the consideration of that Bill at about 10 or half past 10 o'clock, in order to allow of the resumption of the adjourned debate on the Resolution of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) on the subject of the payment of a certain amount of money as a contribution to the expenses of the warlike operations in Egypt. That, Sir, is as much as I can say at present with regard to the exact course of Business, it being understood that the Corrupt Practices Bill and the Tenants' Compensation Bills for England and Scotland form the substance of the engagement we are bound first to redeem, as far as carrying them through Committee is concerned. I have but a few words to add. With regard to the Bills of private Members, the Government have no choice but to say that it is impossible that they should be able to discharge the duties under which they themselves lie, and, at the same time, offer any accommodation to those Members who have Bills before the House. Those Bills, I am sorry to say, are generally in an extremely backward state; but, backward or forward, we are not able to depart from the arrangement I have now sketched out, for the purpose of allowing those Bills to be promoted, should the House be prepared to make to us the gift of time for which we ask. I said at the outset that this was not a brilliant prospect; and I think that if hon. Gentlemen will think well in their own minds and consider the number of days that the Corrupt Practices Bill has taken in Committee, and the probability that it may still require a few more days, and the work to be done on the Tenants' Compensation Bill and upon the Bills which have come back from the Grand Committees, and then the measures which I have stated it is our intention to proceed with, they will see that there is a good deal of legislative work in prospect. I speak on the 9th of July. And although the number of days allotted to Supply in the present Session down to the present date has been very considerable, yet the Business of Supply, like other Business, grows and extends. Then it so happens that there are one or two questions of public importance, involving our policy abroad, that will have to be discussed in Supply. It would, therefore, be sanguine to say that less than eight or nine days would suffice to do what remains to be done. I do not like to enter into minute computations. To those who are experienced in the Business of the House, I think it is quite plain that we have much to do, and that we cannot, in circumstances the most favourable, hope for an early deliverance from our labours. I hope, however, that the House will think that we have made a reasonable contribution towards the attainment of that happy period by the eight measures which we now propose to abandon; and I would, in the first instance, move that the Order of the Day for the Rivers Conservancy Bill be discharged.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for the Second Reading of the Rivers Conservancy and Floods Prevention Bill be read and discharged."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I cannot say that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman has been altogether comfortable as regards the prospects of Business. The right hon. Gentleman has frankly told us that there are eight Bills which he proposes at once to strike off the Order Book altogether. But, having taken that course, the right hon. Gentleman has accumulated no less than 14 measures which he hopes to proceed with. I must say it is hardly likely that we shall see our way, in an ordinary Session, to dispose of those measures. From my own experience of the conduct of the Business of this House, I am bound to say that Ministers rather fall into an error in trying to keep too much on the Order Book, and retaining it there too long. I have not the least doubt that the right hon. Gentleman will do his best to get the whole of the 14 measures through. But, looking to the character and magnitude of some of these Bills, I venture to think that he will find it a difficult task. However, with regard to those he proposes to drop, I suppose he will be altogether justified. I would venture, however, to say a word with regard to Saturday Sittings. We are now making the Government masters of the whole time of the House, excepting on Friday evenings, and I think we have a right to demand that they shall not impose upon us the burden of Saturday Sittings. I mean Saturday Sittings for the purpose of legislation and bond fide work, because sometimes, at the end of a Session, a Money Bill requires to be passed through, when the House will sit for an hour or two; but Saturday Sittings for the purpose of legislation are an intolerable burden, and I take this opportunity of entering a caveat against them. Then, with regard to the Estimates, I shall be glad to know what the Votes are which are non-contentious; but I must express some little doubt as to the prudence of beginning on Tuesday a discussion on the Agricultural Holdings Bill and breaking it off about half-past 10. I do not think that course will be conducive to the saving of time. The right hon. Gentleman has not committed himself to any date, but I hope he does not contemplate keeping us here till all these 14 measures are passed, and all the Estimates are voted; but if he does, I am afraid it will be very long indeed. What I would suggest is, that when we have made a little further progress in the course of another week or two, he should take courage and sacrifice a few more measures. I quite understand what the right hon. Gentleman has indicated with regard to the discussion of questions of policy in Committee of Supply. He contemplates that we shall have an opportunity of discussing questions in regard to Egypt, South Africa, India, and also the very important question in regard to education.

MR. RICHARD said, that if the Welsh Intermediate Education Bill should not be passed this Session there would be in Wales deep, general, and bitter disappointment. Last Monday the Prime Minister gave a positive assurance that the Government did not intend to abandon the Bill. Wales had given the present Government a very loyal and all but unanimous support. He much feared that if this Bill were abandoned the effect would be to produce general discontent, and a feeling that, for their loyalty, the Welsh people had been unworthily requited by very shabby treatment.

MR. GUY DAWNAY asked the Prime Minister to use his influence with the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) to induce him to withdraw his Resolution on the franchise, which no doubt was very interesting, but was of a purely abstract character, in order that he (Mr. Dawnay) might proceed with his Resolution with reference to the state of affairs in Zululand.

MR. LABOUCHERE said, he did not propose to withdraw his excellent Resolution in favour of a Resolution referring to Zululand. He knew his Motion would not, after one evening's discussion, be accepted; but he meant to ask the House to project itself into the future. After the appeal of the Prime Minister he felt that he had only one thing to do, and that was to say that, so far as he was concerned, he would not interfere in any way with the course of Public Business by pressing the Resolution which stood in his name. He trusted the hon. Member for the North Riding (Mr. Guy Dawnay) would follow his (Mr. Labouchere's) excellent example, instead of bringing on some wild-cat Resolution about Zululand.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, that the Secretary for War had promised an early opportunity to discuss the Reserves Vote and the Medical Vote, and he hoped the noble Lord would redeem his promise.

SIR HUSSEY VIVIAN said, he concurred in the regret expressed by the hon. Member for Merthyr Tydvil (Mr. Richard) at the abandonment of the Welsh Education Bill, which might have been passed with a comparatively short discussion, and the abandonment of which would be received with great disappointment in Wales. Welsh Members would be very glad to sit on a Saturday to proceed with the Bill.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he hoped the Prime Minister would kindly consider the possibility of giving an opportunity for the discussion of his Motion on the subject of emigration from Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman would admit that under any circumstances this was a matter of paramount importance; but, after the recent action of the American Government, it might be considered to have acquired the character of urgency. He did not wish in any way to hamper the Prime Minister; but he trusted that an opportunity might be afforded of discussing the question, either upon the Estimates or in any other form in which it might be most convenient to the Government. If the right hon. Gentleman granted facilities for this discussion, he (Mr. J. Lowther) was quite ready to forego proceeding with his Resolution calling attention to the shortcomings of the Government.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, said, he would remind the House that the Arrears Act passed last year, gave a certain sum of money for Irish emigration. He imagined that the money was nearly all spent, and he wished to bring before his right hon. Friend the Prime Minister the fact that if nothing was done this Session all assisted emigration must cease—which, to his mind, would be a misfortune—because he believed much good had been done by it; and by no persons could such a decision be heard with so much regret and lamentation as the unfortunate people themselves. He understood his hon. Friend to say that Bills were to be brought forward for the extension of tramways in Ireland, and he was exceedingly glad to hear it; but he hoped they were not to suppose that nothing was to be done for emigration. As to South Africa, he would reiterate his conviction that the House would not be fulfilling its duty of taking its share in important Imperial questions without some discussion on that subject before the end of the Session. They were, of course, all aware that very little time remained; and on that ground he would avoid asking for a debate on a special Motion for South Africa, and would content himself with a discussion on the Vote. He hoped, however, that the Vote would be brought on at a sufficiently early hour to admit of a real discussion taking place.

MR. RAIKES said, he thought the House would agree with the right hon. Gentleman in postponing the question of reviving the Grand Committees. He trusted that on Friday evenings, after the Motions, operative Supply might be set down, and not Bills which had no chance of passing this Session. He should also like to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister intended to complete the Committee on the Tenants' Compensation Bill before he took the Report on the Corrupt Practices Bill?

MR. RYLANDS reminded the House that the state of Supply at the present time was extremely unsatisfactory. The total number of Votes in the Army, Navy, and Civil Services Estimates was 193, and of these upwards of 140 had yet to be passed. He thought Supply ought to have precedence over any Bill, except the Corrupt Practices and the Agricultural Holdings Bills, and those coming from the Grand Committees. If the Government still retained the idea of pressing forward some of the Bills of secondary importance which had been mentioned, the result must be either that those Bills would be very inadequately discussed, or Supply would be driven into a corner, or the convenience of Members would be seriously interfered with by the prolongation of the Session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, he hoped that the Scotch and English Agricultural Holdings Bills would be taken nearly together for the sake of facilitating the discussion.

COLONEL KINGSCOTE said, it would be inconvenient for Members interested in the Agricultural Holdings Bill to return from the Royal Agricultural Society's show at York next Tuesday for the sake of a discussion which would be broken off so early as half-past 10 o'clock.

MR. ONSLOW said, he was rather dissatisfied with the arrangement with regard to the Motion he had on the Paper, inasmuch as he had withdrawn it at a time when, if he had persisted with it, the Government would probably have been defeated. But he did so on the strict understanding that an opportunity for discussing it would be given before the 11th of July. He hoped, therefore, he was not to be put off with only the fragment of a night. As to the Congo, he trusted that if a Treaty were come to it would be laid on the Table during the Session, and that an opportunity would be given for its discussion.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he hoped that if the National Debt Bill were proceeded with it would be brought on at an early period. He was quite certain, from what he had heard, that that Bill would not pass through the House without great discussion and opposition. He wished also to refer to the question of emigration, and he hoped the Prime Minister would give no time to the discussion of that question in the direction of increasing it. At present he believed there were not at all too many people in Ireland, and a great deal of labour was wanted which could not be obtained. He hoped, however, the result of the Tramways Bill would be to secure employment for the people who were ready to work.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, the Prime Minister seemed to be under the impression that the Local Government Board (Scotland) Bill would not be opposed. That was a mistake. It would receive the greatest opposition, not only from several of the Scotch Members, but from himself. He could also entirely confirm what had fallen from the hon. Member who spoke last with regard to the National Debt Bill. He had no doubt that that Bill would provoke much opposition; but he thought it would be very unwise to break off the discussion on the Agricultural Tenants' Compensation Bill in the middle of the night. Perhaps the Prime Minister would say what Votes he considered non-contentious? He thought it would also be advisable to fix a day for their consideration.

MR. DILLWYN said, the Prime Minister had not said that it was determined to abandon the Bill dealing with education in Wales; and he very strongly appealed to him, in his reconsideration of the measure, that he would allow it to be one of the measures to be proceeded with.

VISCOUNT EMLYN said, he understood that in 10 days or a fortnight the Prime Minister would state whether he would proceed with the Bill referred to by the hon. Member who last spoke, and he suggested that it would be desirable to have the Bill introduced and circulated in the meantime.

MR. GLADSTONE: It has been said, Sir, by my hon. Friend behind me, that Tuesday would be an inconvenient day for the discussion of the Tenants' Compensation Bill, and I think that we had better allow the arrangements for Tuesday week to stand over for further consideration, with the view to suit the convenience of hon. Members as far as possible. It may be found convenient to divide the day, and have a Morning Sitting. With respect to the demands of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow), I am obliged to contest entirely what he has said. It is really not reasonable to ask that an entire night should be voted to the further consideration of the question of Indian Finance, unless the hon. Gentleman is prepared to sit here until Christmas. With regard to Zululand, I understand the obstacle in the way of discussing the matter has been removed by the spontaneous action of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere). The hon. and gallant Baronet the Member for Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) has asked me whether we can give opportunities for the discussion of the Recruiting and Medical Votes. As to that, we shall do the best we can. We are, however, committed to finish the Corrupt Practices Bill in Committee, and then it is proposed to carry through the two Tenants' Compensation Bills. When that part of our work is done we shall have every disposition to give time to bring on this important and interesting question in Supply. With regard to Welsh education, if the noble Lord (Viscount Emllyn) will communicate with my right hon. Friend about the production of the Bill, that will be the most convenient course. The Bill is, I believe, prepared and ready for introduction; but whether its introduction would be convenient at the present moment I will not undertake to say. I am bound to say, however, that I myself am extremely anxious for a Bill of that kind to pass; but this one contains very complicated provisions, involving a great deal of novelty, and I cannot think we ought to pass a Bill of that kind without sufficient discussion; and, therefore, the question will be how much time the House can give in that direction before it is completely exhausted. With regard to emigration, I quite feel that hon. Gentlemen ought to have an opportunity of testing the feeling of the House upon it, and the question of the Tramway Bill for Ireland will probably afford such an opportunity. If not, I shall be ready to revert to the subject on a future day. The Chief Secretary for Ireland has also something to say on that subject; but he does not intend to make a statement at the present moment. Then, I have been asked whether it is intended to have the Committee on the Tenants' Compensation Bill before the Report on the Corrupt Practices Bill, and I think that we should. I cannot give absolute pledges on the subject; but that is what we shall aim at. As to the question of the hon. Member for Guildford (Mr. Onslow) with regard to Congo, the hon. Member may depend upon it that if there be any Treaty—and I cannot throw any light on the probability of there being such a Treaty—we shall lose no time in bringing it under the notice of the House, so that the House may have an opportunity of pronouncing an opinion upon it. I have taken due note of what has been said about the Local Government (Scotland) Bill and the National Debt Bill; but I do not think it would become me to enter upon either of these subjects at the present time, when the question before us is the discharge of certain Orders. With regard to the non-contentious Votes, before the time comes my hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury will endeavour to make a statement with respect to them, and I have no doubt he will be able to do so.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked when the text of the Italian Treaty would be laid on the Table?

MR. BUCHANAN said, there was one important Bill relating to Scotland which the Prime Minister did not mention in the list of measures which he said it was the intention of the Government to proceed with this Session. It was the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, and he was sure the Scottish Members would be glad to hear from the Prime Minister whether it was the intention of the Government to pass that Bill during the present Session. There was another Bill which he should like the Government to go on with, and that was the Bill for the amendment of the Education Act of Scotland. With regard to the Local Government Board (Scotland) Bill, he could assure the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir R. Assheton Cross) that, so far from there being any opposition to that measure among Scottish Members on the Liberal side of the House, the more they considered it the better they liked it, and he was very glad that the Government had decided to proceed with it.

MR. R. POWER said, he agreed with the hon. Member for County Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) in the protest he made against any more time and money of the House being given to the helping of Irish emigration. He regretted, however, that the same hon. Member did not see his way to join the Irish Members on that side of the House when on three or four occasions they tried to reduce the money, the using of which he now thought was so injurious. He wished to ask the Prime Minister what had become of the Union Officers' (Ireland) Bill? Did he propose to massacre also the first legislative effort of the junior Member for Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone)?

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he wished to ask the Prime Minister whether he could not hold out some hopes that several important subjects which were not in the shape of Bills should receive attention before the Session closed? The first of these was the existing condition of India, and the proposed legislation in that part of the Empire. Her Majesty's Government had afforded the House no satisfactory information with respect to those matters, and all that had been ascertained was that India was gradually going from bad to worse. He thought, therefore, that it was very important that Government should give some early opportunity of discussing the disastrous results of their policy in that country. Another subject was the condition of South Africa, where a serious change of policy had recently taken place. The Government had abandoned their intention of sending out a High Commissioner, and had decided to receive Commissioners from the Boers instead. That, he thought, should be made the subject of discussion, as it doubtless had an important bearing upon affairs in the Transvaal. There were other questions of great importance to the trade and commerce of this country which were likely to be excluded from Parliament—such as French aggression upon Madagascar, the Congo, the Indo-Chinese Peninsula, all of which, although the names might be strange and unfamiliar, affected our trade and commerce much more than any of the Bills before the House. Then there was the question of the annexation of New Guinea and the adjacent Islands, which was of the utmost importance to our Australian Colonies and the development of their trade. Yet nothing had, up to the present, been said about it. The home question of housing the poor was also of the greatest importance. That, owing to the influence of the Government over the hon. Member who was to have brought it forward, had been postponed; but he would urge upon the Government that the housing of the poor was a subject of much greater importance than the long, tedious, and impracticable scheme now before the House. He wished to make one very brief protest against the management of Business by Her Majesty's Government. He could not help thinking that it was very unfortunate that the Tenants' Compensation Bill had been made to yield to the Corrupt Practices Bill, as it was very necessary that the former Bill should be sent to the Upper House in ample time to allow of full discussion. He trusted that Her Majesty's Government would see their way to devote some attention to the subjects he had referred to before the Session closed.

COLONEL KING-HARMAN regretted that the Government had also massacred another important Irish measure—the Sunday Closing Bill. That measure was looked forward to with pleasure by all classes in Ireland. [Mr. CALLAN: No, no.] He (Colonel King-Harman) insisted that it was a Bill called for loudly by all classes in Ireland. He hoped, therefore, that the Government would reconsider its decision regarding that Bill.

MR. J. N. RICHARDSON said, that he had not intended addressing the House until the Prime Minister actually moved that the Order for the Sunday Closing (Ireland) Bill be discharged. But as his hon. and gallant Friend opposite (Colonel King-Harman) had introduced the subject, he must not hesitate to supplement his remarks, and to enter as strong a protest as he possibly could against the conduct of the Government in respect to this Bill. Indeed, he felt so strongly about the conduct of the Government, that he should have to be careful lest his feelings caused him to say something which he might afterwards regret. This Sunday Closing Bill for Ireland had been taken up by the Government at the instance of deputations representing every class in the community, which waited upon the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland before the opening of Parliament, and his action was supported by the most unanimous expression of opinion from the districts affected which had ever proceeded from the inhabitants likely to be affected by a social measure. The Bill passed through the House of Lords without a Division very early in the Session, and this, coupled with the fact that the Irish Government pledged itself to pass the Bill, caused the mind of its supporters to be quite easy. They took no pains to get a private measure of a similar nature through the House, and here was the result. Why, the Government had placed the supporters of this measure in the position of the historical donkeys which were coaxed over their journey by carrots being judiciously held to their noses. ["No, no!"] Well he certainly felt himself in that position. The conduct of the Government was a direct breach of faith with the supporters of the Bill. On the 27th of April last, replying to a deputation of Irish Members, the Chief Secretary for Ireland used these words—

"The Irish Government could never acquiesce in the Sale of Liquors on Sunday (Ireland) Bill not being passed into law this Session."

There could be no firmer pledge than that; and yet the Government came and announced the throwing over of the Bill. Now, he must state, in the most emphatic manner, that he acquitted his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland of any change of mind on this subject. He was convinced that the right hon. Gentleman was of the same mind still. But other influences in the Government had prevailed. He must point out that, in this matter, the Government were teaching a very bad lesson to their Irish Supporters. He, himself, had hitherto been one of the firmest and closest supporters of Her Majesty's Government. Many of the strongest supporters of the Bill were among the supporters of the Government, and from the principal opponents of the measure the Government received nothing but opposition. The hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. War-ton) and the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) were opponents of the Government; but the Government now played into the hands of those hon. Gentlemen, and they were throwing their own followers overboard. He supposed it was too late to induce the Prime Minister to go on with the Bill; but, at any rate, he would supplement the appeal made by the hon. and gallant Member opposite.

MR. GLADSTONE explained that the existing Act would be continued.

MR. WARTON said, he thought that the Government had adopted a very reasonable course in this matter, and hoped that the Government would not facilitate measures being brought forward on Saturdays by private Members.

COLONEL NOLAN hoped the Government would next Session take the matter of Sunday Closing entirely into their own hands. He was very glad to see that the Government intended to bring in a Bill to establish tramways in Ireland.

MR. STEVENSON protested against Sunday Closing being described as the "fad" of a private Member. It was the demand of great numbers of the people of the country. If there was not any progress to be made with the Irish Bill this Session, he hoped they would give facilities to pass the cognate measure relating to this side of the Channel.

MR. CORRY said, he could not be regarded as a consistent supporter of Her Majesty's Government; but he should say he heard with very much regret the announcement that the Irish Sunday Closing Bill was to be abandoned for this year, after the various representations made by the Chief Secretary that there was no chance of the Bill being dropped. That step would cause immense discontent and dissatisfaction among his constituents. He trusted, however, that the measure would be again brought in early next Session and passed into law.

MR. MAC IVER wished to know the intentions of the Government with regard to the Bankruptcy Bill. He hoped that the House would have timely Notice when the Bill was to come before them.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said his hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Buchanan) had asked whether the Government intended to proceed with the Burgh Police and Health (Scotland) Bill, and he wished to repeat the question, although, as far as he was concerned, he hoped the Bill would be at once abandoned. It was a Bill of upwards of 600 clauses, many containing a great deal of contentious matter, and it would be utterly futile to endeavour to proceed with it at this late period of the Session. With regard to the Local Government Board (Scotland) Bill, however, that was a measure which the majority of the Scotch Members highly approved of; and he trusted the Government would endeavour to pass it this Session. It was down for second reading for next Monday, when he was afraid there was little chance of its being reached; and he would suggest that it should be set down for Tuesday, on which day there would be a very good chance for it.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in the absence of his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, hoped that the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) would take an opportunity of consulting his right hon. Friend on the Bankruptcy Bill.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL said, he rose to support the request of the hon. Member for Edinburgh that they might be favoured with some information with regard to the Education (Scotland) Bill as well as the Police Bill. The Education Bill was a small one, and he believed it was generally acceptable to Scotch Members, and also was a Bill that was anxiously looked forward to by many people in Scotland. Under these circumstances, he hoped Her Majesty's Government would state what their intentions were with regard to it.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, that while the Government believed the Police Bill to be one of great importance, he feared that if many parts of it were made contentious, the measure could not be passed this year, and they should be obliged to drop it. The case of the Education Bill, however, was materially different. That was a comparatively small measure, and he could not think that it would be the subject of much argument. It was the intention of the Government to proceed with that Bill.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE said, with regard to the remarks of his hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate, so far as he was concerned, his objection to the Police Bill only applied to a few clauses specially affecting his own constituency. If the Lord Advocate would withdraw those clauses, which had no necessary connection with the Bill itself, he did not see why the rest of the Bill, with the co-operation of the Scotch Members, should not go through this Session, even although its length was so extended, because the majority of the Amendments ought not to occupy much time.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON said, the question ought to be how to press forward the legislation which was most desirable for the country and most beneficial to the majority. He would say a word as to the Irish measure. Let no one complain of him, an English Member, for mentioning an Irish Bill, for the greater part of their time for many years had been devoted to Irish measures. Anything which tended to the amelioration of Irish misery and distress must be matter of the highest importance. The House had heard a great deal about Irish landlords. But the amount of money taken by Irish landlords from the people of Ireland was small compared with that which had been swallowed by the Irish publicans. It was proved that the Bill passed by late Government had saved the Irish people £3,000,000.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Baronet was not entitled to go into the merits of the question.

MR. CALLAN said, notwithstanding the interest which the hon. Baronet professed to take in Irish poverty, he (Mr. Callan) could not help remarking that the other night the hon. Baronet came down to the House and waited up until 4 o'clock in the morning to prevent the Irish Members doing something to relieve Irish poverty. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel King-Harman) called the Registration Bill a Party Bill. He was not surprised at the hon. and gallant Member opposing the Bill, as it was well known a proper registration of voters would make his own seat for the county of Dublin exceedingly insecure. As to the speech of the hon. Member for Belfast (Mr. Corry), he wished to say that he spoke in the presence of the two Representatives of Dublin, the two Representatives of Limerick, the two Representatives of Waterford, and the two Representatives of Cork, and these four cities were all opposed to the extension of the Act to them. As to the Union Officers' Bill, he hoped it would pass, as it was a Bill for the benefit of a very well deserving class.

MR. M. BROOKS said, there was no doubt, that notwithstanding all that had been said, that there was in Dublin at least a very strong feeling against the extension of the Sunday Closing Act to that City.

MR. GIBSON said, he differed with the hon. Member (Mr. M. Brooks). In his opinion the feeling of the vast majority of the people of Dublin ran counter to what the hon. Gentleman had said, and in favour of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged."

SIR JOHN HAY said, that in his opinion, and in the opinion of the vast number of naval officers he had consulted, the Bill was not one which, in its present shape, would be of any advantage to the Navy, and he was excessively glad that the Bill was not to be proceeded with.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Order for the Second Reading be discharged."

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, that the statement made by the Prime Minister on this subject would be received with great regret by the Police in Great Britain. It would have been better not to have brought forward the Bill at all than not to press it to a conclusion. In the case of the Scottish Police there was no superannuation at all. He hoped, however, that the Bill would be mentioned in the Queen's Speech of next Session, and pressed forward early.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON hoped that, on account of the opposition the Bill had encountered, it would be introduced early next Session, so as to allow of the questions it raised being thoroughly threshed out.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said he was glad of the opportunity to express his extreme regret that the Bill would not be passed this Session. It was due in justice to the Police Force of the United Kingdom. But, unfortunately, it had encountered such a strong combination of violent opposition from the side of the House to which the hon. and gallant Gentleman belonged, that the Government, seeing no chance of its passing, had no alternative but to withdraw it.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (CORRUPT AND ILLEGAL PRACTICES) BILL.—[BILL 7.]

(Mr. Attorney General, Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Chamberlain, Sir Charles Dilke, Mr. Solicitor General.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 6th July.]

[SEVENTEENTH NIGHT.]

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Miscellaneous.

Clause 41 (Punishment of bribery or treating committed in houses open for refreshment).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he had promised to make a statement in regard to Clauses 41 and 42. Having considered the matter he had come to the conclusion that it would be better to withdraw both of these clauses, the first of which rendered any person occupying premises kept open for public refreshments and entertainment in which any intoxicating liquor was sold, liable to indictment or summary conviction for illegal practices if he permitted any act which constituted bribery or treating within the meaning of the Act. Clause 42 involved the forfeiture of the licence by any person licensed to sell intoxicating liquors, when proved guilty of suffering either bribery or treating to be committed on his premises. The object of these clauses was to transfer the power of dealing with these offences from the Election Judges to the licensing authority, who at present had the sole power of dealing with a person carrying on a business of this nature for an infringement of the licence, and of exercising and controlling power over the mode in which the business was carried on. Of course, it would be necessary, in the first instance, before any action could be taken, that there should be a report from the Election Judge. In the event of any person being convicted after he had been reported, the licensing authorities would take into consideration all the circumstances of the case, and would have the same powers as the Election Judge. He found it would be necessary to modify Clauses 41 and 42 for the purpose of substituting the licensing authority for the Election Court or the Special Commissioners, and he proposed to introduce a new clause on the Report. He would place the new clause upon the Paper as soon as it was possible, and, of course, he would afford ample time for the consideration of the question before he asked the Committee to pass the clause. He hoped this course would have the effect of removing the opposition which had been raised to the clause.

Question proposed, "That Clause 41 stand part of the Bill."

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINOK said, he had placed an Amendment upon the Paper to leave out in the first part of the clause the words "premises kept open for public refreshment," in order to insert the words "used either solely or partially for supplying refreshments, or for pleasurable resort and entertainment, &c." He was glad to hear the statement which had been made by the Attorney General, and, as he entirely acquiesced in the suggestion of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he would not press the Amendment, which he had only placed on the Paper as an act of justice to a particular class of individuals.

MR. LEWIS said, he was not in a position to state what course it would be desirable to take in the matter, until he had an opportunity of seeing what the new clause was. He confessed, however, that he did not understand why they should stigmatize a particular occupation or business in this way; and, therefore, he wanted to see how far it was intended to carry legislation in this direction. He thought it would be better to deal with the matter through the Licensing Court, rather than through the Election Court or the Special Commissioner. As to Clause 42, he was of opinion that it was altogether wrong. He would not, however, discuss the matter now, but would defer any observations he had to make until the new clause was brought up.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he thought no one ought to object to the course which the Attorney General proposed to take. There were strong objections to these clauses in their present form, and it would be better to save the time of the Committee by withdrawing them now, in order that a modified clause might be brought up on the Report.

MR. TOMLINSON said, he hoped that, in bringing up the new clause, the Attorney General would take into consideration the Amendment he (Mr. Tomlinson) had proposed to move—namely, the omission of the words “suffers to take place,” with the view of inserting the words “knowingly permits.” The object of that Amendment was to require that any act constituting bribery or treating within the meaning of the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts should have been done with the permission, knowingly, of the occupier of the premises.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would consider all the Amendments which had been placed on the Paper; and he thanked the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) for postponing his observations until the new clause was brought up.

Question put, and negatived.

Clause 42 (Forfeiture of licence by person licensed to sell intoxicating liquors when guilty of committing or suffering bribery or treating on his premises).

Question, “That the Clause stand part of the Bill,” put, and negatived.

Clause 43 (Removal of incapacity on proof that it was procured by perjury) agreed to.

Clause 44 (Amendment of law as to polling districts and polling places).

MR. CALLAN said, he thought the adoption of this clause would materially increase the expense of an election. In Ireland there had been no complaint of the present system. He believed the practice there was to divide the county into Petty Sessional districts, constituting each one into a polling place; and he thought that was a most efficient and a most convenient mode of proceeding. He believed that the extension of this clause to the boroughs in Ireland would occasion a great deal of confusion; and he, therefore, trusted that it would be modified.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN asked whether the Attorney General accepted the Amendment which the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had placed on the Paper for extending the operation of the clause to boroughs as well as to counties?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the Amendment had not been moved.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN remarked that as the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) was not present to move the Amendment, he (Mr. J. Cowen) would move it instead. He had understood that the Attorney General had made an agreement with the hon. Member in regard to certain Amendments by which he had undertaken to deal with them himself; and it was scarcely fair, as far as the Committee were concerned, that that understanding should be departed from, because the hon. Member for Wolverhampton did not happen to be present. The object of the Amendment was to meet the case of large borough constituencies; and in the absence of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton he begged to propose the Amendment which appeared in that hon. Member's name.

Amendment proposed, in page 30, line 3, after “county,” insert “and borough.”—(Mr. J. Cowen.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he did not intend to be discourteous to the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler); but he thought both the hon. Member for Wolverhampton and the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) would see that the Amendment could have no result if it were inserted here. The effect of inserting it would be to provide that every county should be divided into polling districts, and that separate polling places should be assigned to each district, no matter how small the borough constituency might be—for instance, the borough of Portarlinton and various other small Irish boroughs which had never hitherto been divided into polling districts would have, in future, to be divided, and separate polling stations provided. It was a very different thing in regard to a county; but in the case of small boroughs it was quite unnecessary to divide them, and the only effect would be to impose a large additional expense upon the candidate.

MR. CALLAN said, they had now abolished the employment of cars, and it would be necessary in such a borough as Drogheda, which extended for more than five miles into the county of Louth, to have various polling districts. He knew that in one part of the borough there were about 80 voters resident who were at least five miles from the centre of the borough; and as it would be impossible in future to provide them with carriages these voters would be obliged to walk to the polling place, a distance of from three to five miles, in order to vote. The case of Galway was a similar one, and in that instance they would oblige many of the voters to walk a distance of more than five miles. He, therefore, hoped the Attorney General would promise on the Report to see whether this difficulty in regard to some of the Irish constituencies could not be removed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he would consider the matter both in regard to Ireland and England; but the two cases of Galway and Drogheda, mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, were separate and special cases. If there were any other exceptional cases in which the borough was not divided into wards, if any hon. Member would call attention to it he would see what provision ought to be made.

MR. CALLAN said, he had only mentioned Galway and Drogheda; but he believed there were other cases.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN remarked, that in England there were boroughs similarly situated—such, for instance, as Morpeth. He would not, however, press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. LEWIS moved, in line 7, to leave out "three," and insert "seven." The object of the Amendment, which stood on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Stafford (Mr. Salt), was to provide that, whenever it was reasonable and practicable, every elector resident in a county should have a polling place within a distance not exceeding seven miles from his residence.

Amendment proposed, in page 30, line 7, leave out "three," and insert "seven."—(Mr. Lewis.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'three' stand part of the Clause."

MR. ONSLOW said, he did not know how the Attorney General proposed to deal with this question. He knew a part of Cornwall in which the constituents were small farmers scattered over a wide district, and he wished to know who was to conduct the polling if it was required to be within three miles of the voters' residence? He believed that in many districts, if they fixed this as the mileage, a considerable amount of difficulty would be experienced, and that some of the voters might be left out because there would be no polling booth to which they could have access. He thought if the Attorney General would substitute "five" for "three" miles it would be an improvement, and it would be better than going as far as seven miles.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought the Amendment was a backward movement towards the law as it now stood. They had abolished the use of carriages to convey voters to the poll, and it was, therefore, necessary to bring the voters near to the polling booths. Something must be done to render the voting more easy, although, no doubt, the multiplication of polling booths would increase the expense.

MR. ONSLOW wished to put a case to the hon. and learned Attorney General. Supposing that a farmer were in the habit of attending a market at a considerable distance from his residence, would he be allowed to vote at the place where the market was held? He might be two or three miles away from his regular polling booth in the district where he lived, and it might not be convenient for him to go there. If, then, he came to the market on business, would he be entitled to go to that central place and record his vote there?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that no voter would be able to vote exactly where he liked; but, in a case such as that mentioned by the hon. Member, the voter could attend the Registration Court, and complain to the Revising Barrister of the polling district provided for him being inconvenient.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. WHITLEY said, he had a very important Amendment on the Paper, which he hoped would receive favourable consideration at the hands of the Attorney General. He proposed to add the following Proviso at the end of the 1st section of this clause:—

“Provided always, That it shall be lawful for any elector, on making a declaration before a Justice of the Peace, to the effect that he is unable to vote at the polling station at which his qualification is situate, to vote at such polling station as he may select, and such selection shall be made in manner following, that is to say, at least two days before the election the elector shall sign a declaration according to form in Schedule, and the returning officer, on receipt of such declaration, shall furnish the presiding officer, at the station selected, with a list of those voters who have selected to vote at such station; and he shall also notify to the presiding officer in which the voter's qualification is situate, that the said voter has elected to vote elsewhere, and the said presiding officer shall thereupon erase the voter's name from the list for that station.”

He wished to point out to the hon. and learned Gentleman, and to the Committee generally, that the present provision in regard to polling booths would not help working men in the city which he represented. In the city of Liverpool the vast majority of the working class were employed at a considerable distance from their residences, some of them five or six miles, so that it would be utterly impossible for them, under the new regulations, to vote unless they were prepared to sacrifice their day's wages. At present it was the practice to bring them up to the poll in carriages and omnibuses. By that means they were able to vote within their dinner hour, and then return to their work; but it would be utterly impossible for them to walk a distance of four or five miles to record their vote, and then return to their work within the hour; and the consequence would be that a large number of the workmen would be disfranchised. The Amendment simply carried out a principle which had already been adopted with regard to the county of Middlesex, where a voter could select the place at which he would vote. He proposed that an elector should make a declaration before a Justice of the Peace that he wished to poll at the place at which he was working, and not where he resided; and upon that declaration being made two days before the election, the presiding officer of the district in which the voter proposed to vote should have authority to record the vote, having received from the Justice before whom the declaration was made a notice that A or B had decided to vote in the place where he was working. He thought that in that way any attempt at personation might be avoided, and he assured the Attorney General that a privilege of that kind would be most acceptable generally to the vast majority of the working classes, who felt that, under the Bill as it stood, they would be, practically, disfranchised. The class most affected were the really hard-working and respectable members of the working class. Those who worked without any regular employment might be able to vote; but those who were in constant work would be, practically, disfranchised by the Bill. He hoped the Attorney General would consider whether, by altering the present clause, or by bringing up any other clause to effect the object which would equally serve his (Mr. Whitley's) purpose, he could not consent to this request. He (Mr. Whitley) had not met the Bill in any captious spirit. Indeed, he was anxious that it should pass; but he was also anxious to secure that the working classes especially should have the privilege of enjoying their votes. He would, therefore, be glad if the Attorney General would accept the Amendment, or bring up another clause to carry out the view expressed in the Amendment in any way that might seem best to himself. He could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that if he did so he would earn the gratitude of a large number of working men who would otherwise be disfranchised. As he had pointed out, there was a precedent in the case of the county of Middlesex, where it was provided that a voter whose name was upon the register should be able to make an application to be allowed to record his vote in another district.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD remarked, that the application would have to be made to the Revising Barrister.

MR. WHITLEY said, he only wanted to effect that object. He was quite careless as to the way in which it was carried out. He begged to move the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 30, line 9, after the word "electors," to insert the words,—“Provided always, That it shall be lawful for any elector, on making a declaration before a justice of the peace, to the effect that he is unable to vote at the polling station in which his qualification is situate, to vote at such polling station as he may select, and such selection shall be made in manner following, that is to say, at least two days before the election the elector shall sign a declaration according to form in Schedule, and the returning officer, on receipt of such declaration, shall furnish the presiding officer, at the station selected, with a list of those voters who have elected to vote at such station, and he shall also notify to the presiding officer in which the voter's qualification is situate, that the said voter has elected to vote elsewhere, and the said presiding officer shall thereupon erase the voter's name from the list for that station.”—(Mr. Whitley.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, they were all agreed in the desire to prevent anything like the disfranchisement of any voter; but he thought the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) would see that the Amendment he proposed went far beyond what was necessary. The proposal made by the hon. Member was to allow any person to go to the Revising Barrister, to give in his name, the place where he resided, and to state the name of the district in which he wanted to vote. It might be advisable to give such power to the voter in boroughs if they were bringing forward a new Registration Bill; but that was not the case at present, and his own opinion was that it was desirable for a man to vote among his neighbours by whom he was known, and that he should go to the poll with his neighbours. If the hon. Member knew the extent to which personation was carried on at elections, he would be induced to see that the only check upon it was that a voter should poll where he was known. Therefore, any suggestion of this kind would require careful consideration, and it would be necessary to see what safeguards there were by which the voting could be surrounded. The Proviso moved by the hon. Member was very loosely drawn. It stated, in the first place, that it should be lawful for any elector, on making a declaration before a Justice of the Peace to the effect that he was unable to vote at the polling station in which his qualification was situate, &c. Now, he confessed he could not understand what those words meant. How could a man's qualifications be situate in a polling station? He did not wish to be hypercritical; but he really did not see what his hon. Friend meant, and he did not think the words of the Proviso would carry out what was desired. The other parts of the clause were drawn with equal looseness. As he had already said, it might be proper, if they were introducing a new Registration Bill, to consider the question; but they ought to be chary how they provided that a man on the eve of an election should vote at some different place from that at which, according to the register, he was entitled to poll. He was afraid that the Amendment would open the door to a large amount of personation. He had every desire to facilitate the power of the elector to vote; but the Amendment moved by the hon. Member was of too dangerous a character to justify its insertion in its present form.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he could not help thinking that the objection which the Attorney General had raised to the Amendment of the hon. Member was illusory. As a matter of fact, people did not vote in the presence of their neighbours, and the only way to prevent personation was to have a personation agent in attendance—some person acquainted with the district from which the voter came. The Attorney General seemed to think it was desirable that every man should march to the polling booth with his neighbour; but if that were done it would have no beneficial effect, because each man would go in singly to vote, and would be left by his neighbours at the door of the polling booth. It therefore seemed to him that the objection of the Attorney General came to nothing; and as to the verbal criticism of the hon. and learned Gentleman, it would be got rid of by the insertion of words showing that the polling station was to be "in the district" in which the qualification was situated. If they prolonged the hours of polling into the hours of darkness, he believed that deeds of darkness would prevail. He thought it had been the impression of Parliament hitherto that it was not desirable to extend the hours of polling. He knew that there had been a strong effort made in that direction; but the general feeling of Parliament had been against it. It was thought that they would facilitate corrupt practices by allowing an election to take place at a late hour. The Proviso moved by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) would get rid of a difficulty in the case of persons engaged in labour. As the Attorney General did not promise to bring up any clause upon the subject himself, and as there was no promise of any future legislation in that direction, he certainly should support the Amendment.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had pointed out serious objections to the Amendment in point of form. Another objection was that it was proposed to add it to the sub-section of a clause which related to county elections only, whereas the contention of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) applied only to borough elections. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) did not see why they should insert the Proviso in the middle of a clause which related entirely to county elections. The hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) had referred to the question of extending the hours of polling, and had asserted that the feeling of Parliament was strongly against such a change. That was not so, because in the last Parliament the question was discussed on several occasions at some length; and not only was the feeling of the House in favour of the proposal, but the hours of polling in London had been extended.

MR. CALLAN remarked that, by the law as it stood at present, no application could be made to the Revising Barrister to transfer an applicant from one polling place to another until next September. He (Mr. Callan) knew from experience that if they adopted the Proviso of the hon. Member for Liverpool, they would have to keep up a very extensive and expensive staff of personation agents. He knew some voters who would require at least half-a-dozen of these personation agents to prove whether they were the proper persons to vote or not.

MR. EDWARD CLARKE said, the additional objection which had just been made from the Treasury Bench by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board was also an objection, upon a matter of form, to the place in which this sub-section was proposed to be inserted. He hoped the fact that the objections were substantially objections to matters of form would induce the Government to give some facility such as was asked for, in order to enable large bodies of working men to record their votes. He knew something of what occurred in a large constituency, where there were a considerable number of working men. He had undergone two contested elections in one of these constituencies, and he must say that serious difficulty was experienced in getting the votes recorded at all. It must be remembered that under the state of things constituted by the present Bill there would be no power to convey voters to the poll. Although in the elections which took place in the Metropolis in 1880 the poll remained open until 8 o'clock in the evening, he knew that there was very great difficulty, in the borough he was specially referring to, in getting working men up to the poll on both sides, even by a very extensive use of carriages. The use of these conveyances was now forbidden, and he was satisfied that in a large district of that kind it would be impossible, even if the hours were extended until 8 o'clock, to get up the full strength of the working men to the poll, unless there were some provision of this kind. He thought it a most desirable provision to add, both in regard to large constituencies in boroughs and also county constituencies, where there was a good deal of time sacrificed by requiring the voter to vote in the place in which his qualification was situated. It was quite true that in the counties a voter could, by giving notice to the Revising Barrister, select the place at which he should record his vote. But the Revising Barrister sat in the month of September, and the list of voters came into operation in the following January; and it might be that the election did not take place until November, and by that time it might have become a matter of importance for the voter to vote in another district altogether. He trusted that the Attorney General would give proper consideration to the matter, and bring up some clause in order to deal with the subject.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, the Attorney General had criticized the manner in which the Amendment was drawn up; but he thought some of the clauses of the Bill itself were very much open to the same objection. He believed that everyone connected with the large manufacturing towns would be desirous of affording facilities for the voting of large gangs of working men who were employed at a distance from their place of residence. In his own district there was a considerable number of shipwrights and engineers who possessed a right to vote, but whose work was situated some six, eight, or ten miles away from the place where they resided. What the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) wished was to give these men facilities for voting without obliging them to lose a day's wages on the polling day; and if that object were not met in the present clause, it might be met in some other way. He (Mr. J. Cowen) was quite sure the difficulty did arise, and, if some provision was not made to guard against it, it would disfranchise a large number of working men.

MR. TOMLINSON said, it appeared that the only objection raised to the Amendment by the Government was that it would give facilities for personation; and he thought that objection had no foundation. It was quite true that if the elector appeared before the Revising Barrister, and showed that he was working in another part of the constituency from that in which he lived, facilities might be given for changing the polling place; but that was not what was wanted in the present case; and in regard to the personation, he failed to see how the Amendment would assist anyone who desired to commit that offence. This provision would enable an elector, on the eve of the election, to apply to the Returning Officer for leave to vote in another district; and, in that case, the name of the voter would be struck out of the list for the district in which he resided, but where he might not be very well known, and would be inserted in the list for the place where he worked, and where he could be identified. In fact, the Amendment afforded security against personation, inasmuch as it required the voter who applied for the change to make a declaration before a Justice of the Peace, and thereby to afford evidence for his identification. If some such modification were not made, he thought a good many electors who belonged to the working classes would be disfranchised.

MR. STANTON wished to point out that the register must be prepared some little time before the election took place, and the lists were usually prepared at the end of the year. In the case of working men, they were constantly changing their places of abode, and, in a good many instances, were constantly changing their places of work; and if, on a sudden, an election took place, and if the Returning Officer, a few days before the election, when his hands were full of all kinds of arrangements, were to find himself surrounded by 300 or 400 working men who wished to change their place of polling, he would have his labours in connection with the election enormously increased. He (Mr. Stanton) did not think it practicable or possible to change the lists in the short time fixed in the Amendment. A very large number of the lists of voters would be required for distribution all over the borough or county, and the Returning Officer would find it absolutely impossible to conduct the election under this Proviso. He thought the objection of not being able to poll might be met by giving the working classes a couple of hours during the middle of the day instead of the dinner hour, or by extending the hours of polling generally, or by adopting a system of voting such as he (Mr. Stanton) and other hon.

Members were prepared to support—namely, in the shape of voting papers.

MR. LEWIS said, that the question was only one of a choice of evils. He did not think that he should have supported the Proviso of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) if the Bill did not go a great deal further by getting rid of the use of conveyances, notwithstanding the fact that, in many instances, they would have the infirmities of human nature to deal with, and very long distances to travel. All they had to consider was this—whether, for the sake of that idolatry they were all more or less going through with regard to the Bill, it was necessary to say that it was a high crime and misdemeanour to take a man to poll in a cab, or to pay a shilling for conveying a working man or an infirm person to the poll. He failed to see how they were to deal with the question when it arose in regard to the great constituencies of the country, or how they were to provide men with an opportunity of polling at a great distance from the place where they worked. One hon. Member suggested that there should be an hour for polling in the middle of the day; and another suggested that the hours for polling generally should be extended. The present proposition was to allow an elector to make a declaration before a Justice of the Peace, and to get his polling place changed. As it was only a choice of evils, and as the Amendment would prevent the necessity on the part of a working man of travelling for many miles, he should not oppose the Amendment.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) said the Bill got rid of the power of carrying voters in conveyances to the poll; but it was only since 1880 that they had the power of doing that. Suppose on the day of polling 200 or 300 people went to the Returning Officer and said they wanted to go to another polling station, and to have their names struck out from the list in which they appeared, how was the Returning Officer to know the persons who made the application, and be satisfied that they were not cases of personation? Take the case of Liverpool. The place of a man's work might be some distance from the place where he resided. It was said that they might have personation agents at the polling booths; but unless the personation agents lived among the people, how could they know who they were? They could not send a personation agent out of the district in which he was acquainted with the electors; and, therefore, this practical difficulty in respect to personation agents would still exist, and upon that ground he opposed the Amendment.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, it was quite true, as the Attorney General had pointed out, that before 1880 it was not lawful to pay for conveying voters to the poll. But the law in 1880 was considerably altered; and the hon. and learned Gentleman must remember that the law in 1880 was not so stringent as it would be made now by this Act. At that time a man could exercise charity by ordering carriages to convey voters to the poll; but at the present moment, if any man did such a thing, he would bring the most serious consequences, not only upon himself, but upon innocent persons. Now, in the first place, he did not think this was a personation matter at all. He took exactly the view of the Bill which had already been stated, although in far better words, by the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis). He was not at all in love with the clause nor with the Amendment; but he admitted that the Amendment would be better than nothing. He was sure, from his own experience, which was not very small in electioneering matters, that the ban which had been placed upon the employment of conveyances would disfranchise a large number of voters. At the same time, he knew perfectly well that many hon. Members who voted with the Attorney General wished to see a large class of these electors disfranchised solely upon the ground that such electors did not agree with themselves in political opinion. [Cries of "No!"] At any rate, that was his experience, and it was not a very small one. There were many voters who, like the right hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), desired to see nobody represented or have a vote except they happened to agree with him in opinion. The Liberal Party thought that a large portion of the electors living away from the polling places were likely to vote in a different way from that in which they would vote themselves; and, therefore, they desired to prevent them, as far as possible, from being taken to the poll. They all knew the difficulty of getting electors to poll unless the polling place was handy. If the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) went to a Division he should support the Amendment.

MR. W. M. TORRENS said, the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down told the Committee that he had had some experience in elections. So also had he (Mr. Torrens), and he deprecated this Amendment most decidedly. He would tell the Committee why. In London there had been an extension of the hours of polling; and he was bound to say, from his own personal observation, that nothing in the world could work better or more orderly, and he only wished the Government could be induced to extend that provision to their fellow-citizens in the country towns. If there was one thing he found it hard to eradicate from the minds of what were called half-educated people, it was the notion that personation, when it was done honestly, was not wrong. He would tell the Committee what happened to himself at the last Election, and he would leave the Committee to judge whether he was dealing with an imaginary case. In the course of the contest he had an interview with a foreman of a large establishment, and he took occasion to ask him if they had voted there. "Oh, yes," he said, "we all voted before 9 o'clock this morning, excepting So-and-so; and we intend to put that all right. I will take care that if he does not come up by 3 o'clock I will go and vote for him." This was said in perfect good faith, and the man evidently thought he was doing something perfectly right. Of course, he (Mr. Torrens) regarded the idea with horror, and told the man to do nothing of the kind, adding that he would only vitiate the election. The reply he received was—"Mr. Charles is as well entitled to vote as any man in England, and we must take care that his vote is not lost." That was a danger which the Committee might not realize. Persons of this class had a notion that if a man was qualified his vote ought to be given, and he was afraid that if the Committee consented to pass this Amendment they would only be giving facilities for personation. He would give the Committee another experience he had obtained of a different character. In the Metropolis, thanks to the exertions of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, the poll was now kept open until 8 o'clock. At 7 o'clock on a winter's evening he had gone to the furthest suburb of the borough he represented in order to see how things were going on. He found that there was a great portion of the constituency in that part of the town who worked in the centre of London, but who lived at Stoke Newington. They could not give up their day's pay in order to vote; but they hastened from their work to be in time, and they were in time. They came in from the centre of London, and went into the polling booth with such order, regularity, and as silently as a troop of ants. If the Committee was to take the same course in regard to other borough constituencies, and extend the hours of voting, they would have orderly voting; but if they attempted to carry out the Proviso moved by the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) they would only bring about personation, and render elections liable to be vitiated without any real cause.

MR. WHITLEY said, he understood that the principal objection of the Attorney General had reference to personation. He should be the very last to desire to do anything to encourage personation; but he did not think there was the slightest difficulty on that head. He believed that a certain amount of personation did exist now; but there would be no danger of personation if the Amendment were adopted, and if it were not, great numbers of the working classes would be practically disfranchised. His experience was that it was only the most respectable of the working classes who would avail themselves of the privilege. The Amendment required every man taking advantage of it to make a declaration before a Justice of the Peace, and he would know that in making that declaration he would render himself liable to a serious punishment if he made a false declaration. It would be found that men who were prepared to make such a declaration before a Justice of the Peace would be the last men to attempt anything in the shape of personation. The difficulty he proposed to deal with was no imaginary one. The hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. Torrens) said that an extension of the hours of polling might meet the case. Probably it might in some localities, and in regard to large boroughs he was not at all opposed to extend the hours of polling; but, at the same time, a measure of that kind would not remedy the evil in a place like Liverpool. They had in Liverpool tried, on one or two occasions, to prolong the time for election in connection with parochial affairs; but a strong feeling was expressed against voting in the dark hours. In the summer, when the days were long, there was no difficulty in this respect; but in the winter time, in some parts of Liverpool, it would be absolutely dangerous to conduct elections. He gathered from the remarks of the Attorney General, that the only thing they had to guard against was the possibility of personation; and he certainly was of opinion that personation would be prevented if they required a man who wished to change his polling place to make a declaration before a Justice of the Peace some three or four days before the day of polling. The names of such men would then be transferred from the place at which they resided to the place where they worked, and they would be easily identified. If the Government declined to concede this privilege, they would virtually disfranchise a very large number of working men who were among the most respectable men in the borough, and who had a fair claim and right to the consideration of Parliament. They had already made it penal for anyone to hire a carriage and convey a working man to the poll; and under the Bill, as it stood, no working man could hire a carriage to convey himself and some of his fellow-workmen to the poll. Surely, under such circumstances, the labouring classes had a right to the favourable consideration of the House. Objection had been made to the way in which the clause was drawn; but he did not tie himself to the words of the clause. They might alter it as his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) had suggested, by inserting the words "in the district," after "polling station," or he should be perfectly contented if the Attorney General would bring up some clause to meet this very urgent case—a case which he could assure the hon. and learned Gentleman would in Liverpool alone affect from 15,000 to 20,000 voters. Surely a case like that was worthy of the attention and consideration of Her Majesty's Government. As he had already said, he did not think for a moment that the alteration he suggested would lead to personation, which he would be the last man to defend. The Attorney General said that men ought to go up to the poll in company with their neighbours and friends by whom they were known. That might be all very well in the borough of Taunton; but he (Mr. Whitley) represented from 60,000 to 80,000 electors—men who did not know their neighbours any more than the "man in the moon." The presiding officer would not know them, neither would their neighbours know them; but an opportunity would be afforded, if necessary, of making inquiries and identifying the voter by requiring a declaration to be made before a Justice of the Peace three or four days before the polling took place. He thought it would be a great hardship if the elector was not allowed to make that declaration; and he hoped the Government would seriously consider, if they found themselves unable to accept this provision, whether they could not bring up some clause of their own to meet the difficulty. By that means they would earn for themselves the gratitude of a large number of the working classes.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would appeal to the Committee to come to a decision at once upon the Amendment. As a matter of fact, up to that moment, they had made no progress with the Bill. The first clauses brought under the consideration of the Committee had been dropped, and it was now time that progress was made. He, and his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, had already several times pointed out the objections which were entertained against the Amendment and the form in which it was now proposed. In addition to the other objections, the Amendment would render the conduct of elections absolutely impossible. Towards the close of the poll there might be a large number of voters in a borough desiring to record their vote at a particular polling place under the Amendment, and the Returning Officer would have no means of checking their votes. He would be altogether unable to cope with the difficulty at the last moment.

MR. WARTON said, he did not think the Committee ought to listen for one moment to the suggestion made by the President of the Local Government Board that, although they had been sitting for an hour, they had made no progress with the Bill. No doubt, they sometimes went rather quickly, and sometimes rather slowly; but the real question to consider was how they could best do justice to a large number of their fellow-subjects. The first objection to the Amendment was one taken by the Attorney General as to the manner in which it was worded; but that objection was hardly worth serious consideration, because, in two minutes, the Committee could obviate it by altering the phraseology of the Amendment. The next objection was that the clause was in the wrong place; and that was an objection which was got rid of quite as easily. In point of fact, the Attorney General had pooh-poohed and sneered at the Amendment; but, after it had undergone some discussion, the hon. and learned Gentleman began to see that there might be something important in it after all; and, finding that a considerable number of Members did attach importance to it, another Member of the Government got up upon the Treasury Bench to tell them they ought to divide, because, so far, they had made no progress with the Bill. Now, it seemed to him that the Government had not given the slightest consideration to the proposition; and, if they had any real desire to make progress, they would not have met the Amendment with ridiculous criticisms about the words in which it was framed. The adoption of the Amendment would facilitate the polling of working men; and, upon that ground, he (Mr. Warton) would support it.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he had one or two verbal Amendments to propose which would remedy the objection raised to the Amendment by the Attorney General. In the first place, in line 9, at the end of the 1st sub-section, after the word "electors," he would move to add the words "in any county or borough."

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, in line 1, after the word "elector," insert the words "in any county or borough." — (Sir Hardinge Giffard.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would accept that Amendment, and also any other Amendment the hon. and learned Gentleman had to propose, in order that they might divide upon the Amendment of the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) in the form in which hon. Members opposite desired to put it.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD moved, in line 3, after the words "polling station," to insert the words "in the district."

Question, "That those words be there inserted," put, and agreed to.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD moved to extend the time for making the declaration from two to four days, and also after the words "the elector shall sign," to insert the words "and forward to the Returning Officer." It appeared to him that two days were too short a time for the declaration to be made and sent to the Returning Officer, and he proposed to strike out "two" and insert "four." The second Amendment made provision for the reception of the declaration by the Returning Officer.

Amendment proposed, in line 5, leave out "two," and insert "four." — (Sir Hardinge Giffard.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed, in line 6, after the word "sign," insert "and forward to the Returning Officer."

Amendment agreed to

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment by inserting, in line 11, after the words "presiding officer," the words "of the district." — (Sir Hardinge Giffard.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GORST rose to Order. He wished to make a suggestion to the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Amendment—namely, whether it would not be as well in the last words of line 4 to insert an Amendment requiring the district in which the voter resided to be notified to the Returning Officer?

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he did not think that would be necessary.

Question put, and agreed to.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that now the Amendment had been amended he should ask the Committee to reject it altogether.

Question put,

"That the words 'Provided always, That it shall be lawful for any elector in any county or borough, on making a declaration before a justice of the peace, to the effect that he is unable to vote at the polling station in the district in which his qualification is situate, to vote at such polling station as he may select, and such selection shall be made in manner following, that is to say, at least four days before the election the elector shall sign, and forward to the returning officer, a declaration according to form in Schedule, and the returning officer, on receipt of such declaration, shall furnish the presiding officer, at the station selected, with a list of those voters who have elected to vote at such station, and he shall also notify to the presiding officer of the district in which the voter's qualification is situate, that the said voter has elected to vote elsewhere, and the said presiding officer shall thereupon erase the voter's name from the list for that station,' be there inserted."—(Mr. Whitley.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 30; Noes 79: Majority 49.—(Div. List, No. 184.)

MR. E. S. HOWARD said, he thought the Amendment he was about to propose would not be objected to by Her Majesty's Government, because the Committee had agreed to the abolition of payment for conveyance of voters; and this was an attempt to remedy the inconvenience which some voters would suffer in consequence of that abolition, by bringing the poll nearer to their doors. The clause proposed that every county should be divided into polling districts, and a polling place assigned to each district in such a manner that, so far as was reasonably practicable, every elector resident in the county should have a polling place within a distance not exceeding three miles from his residence, provided that no polling place should be constituted which contained less than 100 electors. That meant that the electors should have the polling places nearer to themselves, and if it were carried out there was no doubt there would be a great increase in the number of polling places where the population was scattered, and a corresponding increase of the expenses; but he did not think they ought to complain of the latter, because the expense of polling places would be as nothing compared with that of conveying voters to the poll. At the same time, he did not see why needless expense should be incurred for clerks, messengers, and officers, as well as a waste of time. It was his experience that in many of the outlying districts in his county the poll, even where there were 300 or 400 electors, was closed at 1 or 2 o'clock in the afternoon, and that the rest of the day was spent by the officers in chatting with the persons who came in with the election agents. Now, the adoption of his Amendment would utilize the staff during the whole day, because, where the electors were widely scattered in any polling district, he proposed that the poll should be taken at such two places successively as might be determined upon by the local authority, with the proviso that the poll should be open for not less than three hours at each place. At the risk of not having stated the case as strongly as he might have done, having regard to the time of the Committee, he would conclude his remarks by pointing out that the Amendment was only permissive in its character; and if the local authorities did not think it practicable they need not put it into effect. He trusted, under all the circumstances, that the Amendment which he now begged to move would receive the favourable consideration of the Attorney General.

Amendment proposed,

In page 30, Sub-section 2, at end, add:—
"Where in any polling district the electors are widely scattered, the poll may be taken successively at two places which shall be determined upon by the local authority in such manner to equalize as far as possible the distance to the poll to be traversed by the surrounding electors: Provided, That the poll shall be open for not less than three hours in each such place."—(Mr. E. S. Howard.)

MR. CHEETHAM said, he rose to support the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Cumberland, which, if it were adopted, would provide an especial convenience in counties where the electors were scattered, and where the character of the district rendered communication difficult. In counties like Cumberland and Derbyshire the means of conveyance to the poll had always been especially necessary; and he thought that the restrictions which they had put upon the conveyance of electors in the earlier portion of the Bill placed them under a strong obligation to bring the poll nearer to the door of the elector. He apprehended that the expense would not be so much in the cost of the stations to be provided as in the staff necessary to carry on the business of the polling; and, therefore, if they made the staff do double duty in the manner proposed by the hon. Member, it would make a great difference in the cost on the side of economy. He trusted the Attorney General would see his way to accept this Amendment, or one of a similar character.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, while he could not complain of the Amendment of his hon. Friend being brought forward, he hoped that the Committee would perceive that the question involved in it did not naturally arise on this Bill. It ought to be rather an appendage to the Ballot Bill than to a Bill for the suppression of corrupt and illegal practices at elections. He should be quite willing to consider the hon. Member's proposal in connection with the Ballot Bill; but he could see at once a considerable disadvantage in it, and that was that it would give one staff to two different polling districts, or, in fact, it would cut one polling district in half. In that way they would disfranchise, to a certain extent, persons who went away from their homes in the morning and could not get back before the polling place in their district was closed. Nor did he think it would add to economy in the matter of the staff, who, when they had finished at the first place, would have to follow the presiding officer and catch him up at the second polling place. He trusted his hon. Friend would not press his Amendment.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he had been on the point of rising to ask whether the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Cumberland was in Order. The Committee had passed a clause making the payment of voters' travelling expenses illegal, by which means a large number of persons had been disfranchised. Hon. Members on those Benches would, therefore, have to call upon the Government to find some machinery by which those voters who were too poor to pay the necessary travelling expenses would be able to get to the poll. It was all very well to say that the Ballot Bill would offer a more appropriate opportunity of introducing the Amendment of the hon. Member; but the Ballot Bill would not make its appearance that Session, and they could not wait until then for machinery necessary to enable the persons he had indicated to record their votes, because no one could say what a year might bring forth. What he desired to impress on the Government was that they must settle some means of getting voters to the poll before the Bill passed.

MR. GORST said, he thought the idea of the hon. Member for East Cumberland an excellent one, although it would take too long to discuss it at that moment, and defend it against the strictures of the Attorney General. But he hoped the hon. Member would not be disheartened by the manner in which his suggestion had been received, and that when the Ballot Bill was before the House he would bring it forward again. The Amendment would be more appropriate to that measure, and he gathered from the Attorney General's remarks that he was not unfavourable to its principle. Having put a stop to the conveyance of voters, some means must be devised, in the case of districts where the electors were scattered, for getting the electors to the poll.

MR. E. S. HOWARD said, that, on the principle that a bird in hand was worth two in the bush, he should have liked to have taken the sense of the Committee with regard to this matter. As, however, it was to be taken up again he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WARTON said, that in line 10 the words "who have" evidently ought to be "which has." He would, therefore, move to make the alteration.

Amendment proposed, in page 30, line 10, leave out the words "who have," in order to insert the words "which has."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, they might as well discuss the question as to whether the Committee has or the Committee have. It was usual for the words to take the form in which they appeared in the clause, and it was hardly worth while altering them.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. RANKIN said, he wished to propose the Amendment standing on the Paper in his name, which was, after the words "Much Wenlock," to insert the word "Leominster." The object of the 3rd section of the clause, into which his Amendment would be incorporated, was to treat certain large boroughs—East Retford, Shoreham, Cricklade, Much Wenlock, and Aylesbury—as if they were counties. These places were more like counties than boroughs, and his desire was to include Leominster, the circumstances of which place were similar to those of the places enumerated in the sub-section. Leominster had a large number of voters scattered over a very extensive area—about 25 square miles—and many of the electors lived further than three miles from the polling station; and as conveyances were not to be allowed, and many of these people were poor agricultural labourers, they should be treated as though they were electors for a county.

Amendment proposed, in page 30, line 16, after "Much Wenlock," insert "Leominster."—(Mr. Rankin.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'Leominster' be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said that certain boroughs in this country had for a long time been treated as counties. In 1867, East Retford, Shoreham, Cricklade, and Much Wenlock were treated as counties at the request of their Representatives, and at that time nothing was suggested as to the exclusion of Leominster. He would ask the hon. Member not to press the proposal.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he had no doubt he should be corrected if he were wrong; but to the best of his recollection there were four places originally included, and that Much Wenlock was added in 1867, which place was included on the representation of a very distinguished man, the present Lord Forester, who, at that time, represented the borough. It seemed to him (Mr. R. N. Fowler) only reasonable that Leominster should be added in the same way on the Motion of its Representative.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, there were a large number of other boroughs in the country which could make the same claim, and which it would be difficult to exclude if the request in the case of Leominster were acceded to. For instance, he should be prepared to move that Wolverhampton, with its 25,000 electors, and its area extending 10 or 12 miles, should be included. Wolverhampton was not all one town, but was a variety of towns grouped together; and it seemed to him that any argument that applied in the case of Leominster equally applied in the case of his borough. [MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: No, no!] He (Mr. H. H. Fowler) claimed to be better acquainted with the place than the hon. Member for Eye. He did not think the Committee ought, on a simple off-hand Motion of this kind, without any inquiry, but simply on the Motion of the Member representing the borough, to adopt a change of this kind. He was sorry that he had not been present when the clause dealing with polling places was considered; but, at the proper time, he proposed to bring up a new clause, providing that all large boroughs should have polling places provided at a distance of not more than a mile from the residence of the electors, provided there were not more than 100 electors in each place. Without questioning the claims of Leominster, he objected to any exception being made in its favour, unless many other places were included.

MR. H. T. DAVENPORT wished to point out that there was a great difference between the boroughs of Wolverhampton and Leominster. In the case of Leominster, the district was a very large one, and the polling places were very far apart; but in Wolverhampton the polling places were scattered all over the borough.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT hoped the hon. Member for Leominster (Mr. Rankin) would not allow himself to be deterred by the dictatorial instructions of the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler), because, as the hon. Member who had just sat down had shown, there was an immense difference between the boroughs of Wolverhampton and Leominster. He (Mr.

Ashmead - Bartlett) might, with much reason, propose the inclusion of the borough of Eye; but, for the satisfaction of hon. Members opposite, he would state that he did not intend to take that course. What was the difference between Much Wenlock, Aylesbury, and the borough of Leominster? Why should Much Wenlock and Aylesbury be treated as counties, and not the borough of Leominster? Because five places had already been treated as counties, it was no reason why another borough, under similar conditions, should not be treated in that way also.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 39; Noes 93: Majority 54. — (Div. List, No. 185.)

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE said, the next Amendment was in his name, and it was one which it was hardly necessary to explain at any length. Its object was to provide a polling station for every 500 electors. It was not unnatural that there should have been some considerable discussion to-night upon this subject, and he thought that hon. Members had a perfect right to endeavour to remedy the evils in this Bill with regard to the difficulty that many electors would have of getting to the poll. It might be argued that this was not the proper place to insert such an Amendment as this, and he was not himself sure that this was the best part of the Bill in which to insert it. He made his proposal, however, as much as anything else for the purpose of hearing the views of hon. Members, and of having a discussion on the question. It might be said that the proper place for such a proposal would be in the Ballot Bill; but they had heard that that measure was to be dropped this Session. Well, before that measure passed a great many things might happen. As disabilities were to be created by this Bill, and as a provision preventing the use of conveyances for taking voters to the poll had been adopted, unless some such alteration as that he proposed were accepted many electors would be disfranchised. He begged to propose his Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 30, line 18, after "county," insert "Provided also that in every county and borough, whether a district borough or not, there shall be at least one polling station for every five hundred electors."—(Sir William Hart Dyke.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Hart Dyke) seemed to think that his Amendment required no explanation; but it would have been advantageous if he had given the Committee some explanation of it. What, for instance, did he mean by polling station? Did he mean to retain those words? [SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE: Yes.] A polling station was not a polling place, but was only a building in which a voter polled. A polling place might be a market place, and, if this Amendment were accepted, in such a place as a market place they would not be able to poll more than 300 voters; and it seemed to him that in very many cases they might have as many as 1,500 voters who would require to poll in a market place. Polling stations and polling places were very different things. In the case of county voters residing in a large area surrounding a town, the people were accustomed to come by railway to the place where there were hotels to dine, and so forth; and it might be convenient for them to vote in that central place—the necessity for them to go elsewhere putting them under very great inconvenience. No doubt the intention was that they should not have too many voters coming to the same polling place, and that the voters should not be inconvenienced by having the polling place too far away. He thought the right hon. Gentleman's desire would be met by the clause as it stood, as it provided that every elector resident in a county should have a polling place within a distance not exceeding three miles from his residence.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he thought that no district containing 500 electors should be without a polling station, and that, it seemed to him, was the clear object of the Amendment.

MR. GORST said, to his mind the meaning of the Amendment was perfectly clear, and it was only unintelligible to those who did not choose to understand it. There were provisions dealing with the representation of the people requiring local authorities to provide convenient polling districts; but none of them laid down any particular limit. They said generally what were convenient districts, but did not point them out. If there were 500 electors in any district, that was surely a district sufficiently large to have a polling place of its own. Probably some districts around central market towns might find it convenient to have their polling station in a market place; but other districts of 500 electors, which were not so situated, might require, and surely were entitled to have, their own polling place. He could not, for the life of him, see the objection to enacting either that, or something like it. Why should they not lay down a limit as to the number of electors in a district which should have a polling place? It did not at all follow that two or more districts should not have their polling places in the same town.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he was not surprised that some confusion arose as to this matter, and he had no doubt that his right hon. Friend (Sir William Hart Dyke) had full reason for introducing his proposal. He knew that the Ballot Bill was not to be passed this Session, and the words he proposed were, he (Mr. E. Stanhope) believed, practically taken from that measure. In the 2nd sub-section they gave the local authorities power to divide the county into polling districts, and to assign polling places to those districts; and the right hon. Baronet asked that they should so divide those districts as to have 500 electors for each polling place. It was desirable that polling districts should not be overcrowded, and the right hon. Baronet wished to give the local authorities power, whilst deciding the question as to the polling places, to have regard to the desirability of giving a polling station to each 500 electors.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, a difficulty arose upon this point—namely, as to what constituted a district. His impression was that the 1st sub-section, which provided for the division of the polling districts, and the assignment of polling places to each district, so as to give every elector a polling place within three miles of his residence, would meet the object of the right hon. Baronet. But directly they got their polling district, it did not matter whether 500 or 600 people polled at one place. If the district was a populous one, and the polling place was central, it would be convenient to send more than 500 people to that place; and it would not be satisfactory to say that, however convenient such place was, no more than 500 voters should poll in it. As he had said, there was some confusion at the polling places and polling stations. He had never heard as yet that there had been a block in a polling station in consequence of voters not having had sufficient accommodation.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, he must plead ignorance as to what was the definition the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General sought to draw between polling places and polling stations.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the right hon. Gentleman would see the distinction in the Ballot Act.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, that that was no answer. The Ballot Act had been the cause of introducing no little confusion into their proceedings on this Bill. On a former occasion some very reasonable—and, he made bold to say, necessary—Amendments were proposed to the Bill; but the Chairman, acting, no doubt, rightly enough upon that which was then before him, decided that these, although of great importance, and he might say even of urgency, would more appropriately be introduced into the Ballot Act Continuance Bill. Well, he (Mr. J. Lowther) understood that they were no longer hampered with that confusion. He understood the Prime Minister to say that that Bill, which many of them, months ago, were of opinion had no chance of passing, had been definitely withdrawn. The Committee, therefore, was now in a position to deal with this subject as a whole. The right hon. Baronet had proposed that facilities for polling should be given to every body of electors numbering 500. Well, he would not follow the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General into the subtle distinction between a polling place and a polling station, which, to his (Mr. J. Lowther's) mind, was one and the same thing. He had often heard that a polling district might be sub-divided into minute departments; but he would not ask what was the correct phrase for them. They all knew what his right hon. Friend meant. He simply desired to give facilities to voters to record their votes. He wished to ask whether the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Sussex (Mr. Gregory) with regard to voting papers, to which he attached considerable importance, would be taken up in consequence of the Ballot Act Amendment Bill having been withdrawn?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, that with regard to the distinction between a polling station and a polling place, the law required that every Returning Officer should provide a sufficient number of polling stations for the accommodation of voters entitled to vote at such a place.

MR. J. LOWTHER asked how the distances were arranged?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, there must be a polling place and a polling station. The polling station was the place at which people were to vote; and in a populous district or polling place it would be most convenient to let them go to a particular town.

THE CHAIRMAN: With regard to the point which the right hon. Member for North Lincolnshire (Mr. J. Lowther) submitted for my opinion, I cannot now express any opinion about the clause which I see in the name of the hon. Member for East Sussex. When that clause comes on I shall be ready to give my opinion. As to the other point respecting an Act of Parliament which is at present in force, what I know is that the Ballot Act is at present in operation.

MR. J. LOWTHER said, what he wished to ask was whether he or any other Member would be in order in moving an Amendment raising the question of voting papers or any other matter dealt with in the Ballot Act?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is premature to express any opinion upon that now.

COLONEL NOLAN believed that the Amendment would create no increased facilities, but would add to the expense.

MR. C. S. PARKER said, he would like to put it to the right hon. Baronet (Sir William Hart Dyke) whether the discretion of the local authority might not suffice to deal with this question? There was ample power given to the local authorities, and they had every motive to arrange for polling stations in the best way, with a view to the convenience both of the candidates and of the voters. He was afraid that the Committee was going too much into detail in this Bill. This was not a matter in which the Imperial Parliament should lay down rules for all possible cases; but it was rather a matter in which the local authorities might be safely left to make the most convenient arrangements.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE said, he was loth to take up the time of the Committee; but he thought it due to himself to explain why he had put the Amendment on the Paper. In the Ballot Act Amendment Bill, which was now not to be proceeded with, he saw in the 1st Schedule a proposed addition to Rule 15, providing that in every county and every borough, whether a district borough or not, there should be at least one polling station for every 500 electors. That provision, however, was not to apply to municipal elections. Seeing that these words were in that Bill, and observing the disfranchising effects of this Corrupt Practices Bill, he thought it fair to bring the question before the Committee. If this provision was fair and right, he thought it was not unnatural that he should bring it before the Committee, and ask them to consider this point carefully—namely, whether, as by a clause in this present Bill a great number of voters would be virtually disfranchised by being deprived of all means of getting to the poll, the Committee should not consider the advisability of inserting in this Bill the words which were proposed in the other Bill? With regard to the question of polling stations, the object of his Amendment was to place a polling station within the reach of every 500 voters.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, he thought that the right hon. Baronet's explanation was very reasonable. The provision for polling stations was intended to prevent a crowd of electors at one particular spot; but that would not meet the right hon. Baronet's view as to bringing people to the poll. A station was a building, and the object was that too many voters should not be brought to one particular building or booth.

Mr. J. Lowther

MR. ONSLOW said, he thought there was a great deal in the suggestion of the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Parker), that this matter should be left to the local authorities. That was at present done; and in the borough which he represented there were two polling places provided for Parliamentary Elections, although he thought that was one too many. For municipal elections there was only one polling station, and, so far as he knew, no more would be wanted, and this Amendment would only increase the expense. When a Returning Officer saw that, under this Bill, conveyances were not allowed to be used, he would, no doubt, decide that he must have more polling stations. He (Mr. Onslow), however, thought it would be very hard to lay down in this Bill that in every county and borough there should be, at least, one polling station for every 500 electors. Suppose there were 1,600 electors, how many polling stations should there then be? According to the Amendment of the right hon. Baronet, there would have to be four; but he did not believe that so many would be required. This matter had much better be left in the hands of the Returning Officer.

MR. RITCHIE said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, for he thought the right hon. Baronet could not have considered its effect upon borough constituencies. In the borough he represented (the Tower Hamlets), instead of 20 polling stations, which were now required, 90 would be needed under this provision. Such a number would be entirely superfluous, and would enormously increase the expense. He did not say that they might not have some more; but such an increase as would take place if this Amendment were adopted was not at all necessary.

MR. LABOUCHERE suggested the substitution of ballot boxes for stations. People found great difficulty in finding time to go up to the Presiding Officer to get their ticket and then put it into the ballot box. If it was said that the local authorities should not be interfered with, it must be remembered that they were already interfered with. The difficulty was that men had to wait until the Presiding Officer could give them their papers; and if it were laid down that only 500 people might place their papers in one ballot box, then, he thought, the difficulty might be overcome.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE said, he was prepared to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he observed that Clause 65, Section 2, prevented the application of this clause to Scotland. Clause 45, which would shortly be under consideration, allowed, as he understood it, the use of vessels and boats to convey voters at the expense of the candidates; but this clause did not apply to the Islands to which this Amendment referred. He should, therefore, ask leave to withdraw an Amendment which he had been asked to move, if the Attorney General would see whether some arrangement could not be made by which floating polling places might be provided and taken to the Islands to voters who otherwise might be disfranchised.

Clause agreed to, and ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 45 (Conveyance of voters by sea in certain cases).

MR. CRAIG-SELLAR said, the object of the Amendment he wished to propose was to enable candidates to act as heretofore in certain counties, especially Scotch counties, which were difficult of access, and in which the electors were widely scattered, and to enable them to bring electors to the poll at their expense. It was apparent that in this clause the principle was admitted that there must be certain exceptions made to the prohibition against the conveyance of electors. If there was no such exception with regard to Scotland the effect would be that 40 or 50 per cent of the voters would be unable to go to the poll. The object of his Amendment was to extend this exception to a slight extent. He proposed in certain counties to allow, in addition to sea conveyances, the use of land conveyances under certain circumstances; and, as a matter of fact, in those very counties intersected by arms of the sea, unless land conveyances were allowed as well as steamboats and other vessels, voters would not be able to vote. In the district of Lochgoilhead there were from 35 to 40 electors, and in order to vote they had to go by road about 18 miles to St. Catherine's, and then across Loch Fyne to Inverary. In the Islands of Colonsay, Oronsay, and Jura, there were

69 electors. They had to poll at Bowmore, in Islay, and had to be taken some 15 miles to Portaskaig by sea, and thence 15 miles more by road to Bowmore. At Arisaig, in Inverness-shire, there were 40 to 50 electors, and they had to poll at Fort William, 40 miles away by road. In the parish of Laggan there were 45 electors who had to go 30 miles by road to their polling place; in the parish of Fortingall, in Perthshire, there were 124 electors, of whom 33 were within five miles, 23 from 10 to 20 miles, and 10 over 20 miles from the polling station. Then, in Banffshire there were nine polling stations; and in No. 1, the electors were from six to seven miles from the polling station; in No. 2, seven to nine miles; in No. 6, 10 to 12 miles; in No. 9, 22 to 23 miles. In one polling district in Argyllshire—that at which he (Mr. Craig-Sellar) voted—there were 219 electors, of whom only some 15 were within five miles of the polling place. It was obvious that some provision must be made in order to enable those electors in the Highland counties to have the benefit of the franchise. The hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire (Dr. Farquharson) had suggested earlier in the discussion that the Returning Officer should authorize the employment of carriages, and charge the expense to the candidates; but the Attorney General had shown that that would not work effectually. Another hon. Gentleman had suggested that there should be perambulating stations, and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite (Sir John Hay) had suggested a floating station. He thought the Committee, however, were satisfied that neither perambulating nor floating stations would exactly answer the purpose. Then it had been suggested that additional polling places would meet the case. But additional polling places in these remote regions involved very great additional expense. In the county of Argyll at the last Election there were 14 stations, and the expenses were about £600; and the reason of that was that in that county there was not a sufficient number of men learned in the law who were able to act as Presiding Officers, and the Returning Officer had to import professional men from Edinburgh and Glasgow, who went down with their clerks, and charged from three to five guineas a-day. If, therefore, the suggestion of additional stations were adopted, the expenses would be increased enormously, especially as these stations would have to be provided and manned with Presiding Officers and their staff, whether there was a contest or not. Then, there remained his own suggestion, and he thought it would answer very well. He proposed that where the nature of the county was such that the electors were widely scattered, a certain amount might be paid for means of conveyance, in addition to the maximum amount allowed by the Bill. If that were adopted, he thought it very likely that the agents of the two candidates would meet and arrange for a coach or omnibus to go and take up the voters for both sides, and take them to the polling station, and in that way the expense would be comparatively small. That plan was adopted at the last Election, and he had no doubt that it would be followed in most counties. The Amendment referred exclusively to resident voters, and not to out-voters or faggot-voters, and he limited the distance to five miles. He did not insist on that figure, because three, seven, or ten miles would suit his purpose. Then there was the further safeguard to which he especially wished to call attention—namely, that, by the additional Amendment which he would move if this were carried, the Registration Officer and Revising Barrister—the Assessor and Sheriff in Scotland—would, when they revised the register each year, have to make up a list of the electors in each polling district who should be entitled to be conveyed, and none but these could be conveyed. The clause, so safeguarded, could not possibly be abused. He should probably be told that the object of the Bill was to diminish expense; but he did not think his Amendment would much increase the expense, and if it did there was something to be considered besides the mere expense. There was the question of the enfranchisement or disfranchisement of voters, and he was sure the Attorney General would not wish to disfranchise electors wholesale who were duly qualified. The danger had been recognized by the partial provision made in the Bill for such cases. He did not urge this Amendment on Party grounds, for it would apply equally to both Parties; he urged it in the interest of qualified voters who, without some such provision, would be unable to vote.

Mr. Craig-Sellar

Amendment proposed,

In page 30, line 31, after "thereof," insert "or where in any county, the electors are widely scattered, and where it has not been found reasonably practicable to divide the county, so that every elector resident in the county shall have a polling place within a distance not exceeding five miles from his residence."—(Mr. Craig-Sellar.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

DR. FARQUHARSON said, he hoped the Government would make a concession upon this matter. Under the provision of this Bill, as it at present stood, total disfranchisement must result in many parts of Scotland which were remotely situated from the polling place, and the Attorney General had already given some concession in that direction. But that concession was only a marine concession, and he hoped he would give a dry-land concession as well. He did not in any way wish to weaken the Bill, and he was sure that all who represented counties were grateful to the Attorney General for endeavouring to diminish the expenses; but he hoped that if the Attorney General could not accept this Amendment, he would be able to devise something which would diminish the chance of disfranchisement with regard to Scotch electors while not weakening the Bill.

MR. DICK-PEDDIE said, he entirely concurred with his hon. Friend in regard to this Amendment. He would not detain the Committee by an argument in addition to those which had already been submitted to it, as he thought they fully made out the case. He hoped the Government would make some concession.

MR. LEWIS said, it was pleasing to find this chorus of opinion amongst Scotch Members who had been persistently voting to their hearts' content against any conveyance of voters in England, Ireland, and Wales. Directly, however, the shoe pinched themselves they were inclined to cry out, and in most piteous tones entreat the Attorney General to allow them to pay travelling expenses for voters in certain cases. This Amendment would be a complete departure from the principle of the Bill; and hon. Gentlemen opposite who had felt there was some difficulty about the conveyance of voters by sea, ought to remember that there was an equal amount of difficulty in the conveyance of voters over mountains. If there was difficulty in crossing an arm of the sea there was quite as much difficulty in crossing mountains. As a matter of fact, he believed there were some men who would rather swim across an arm of the sea than climb over a mountain. Hon. Gentlemen from Scotland voted against the conveyance of patriots in England, Ireland and Wales; and he wondered that they had not a disposition to be straight and fair all round, and object to the conveyance of voters in Scotland also. For his part, speaking from an abstract point of view, the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Haddington Burghs (Mr. Craig-Sellar) was a very sensible Amendment; and in order to be consistent, if the hon. Gentleman went to a Division—which he doubted very much, for it was the practice of hon. Gentlemen opposite to propose an Amendment and then run away—he (Mr. Lewis) should vote with him. He cordially tendered his sympathy and his vote to the hon. Gentleman.
